L. Bliss and for which he promised and agreed to pay plaintiff $3,527.23, of which only the sum of $500 has been paid. The defendant Bliss appeared and filed what he denominated an "amended cross-complaint and second and separate answer," in which he designated one Alvin Hitchcock as a cross-defendant, and then proceeded to set up in several counts what he claimed to be the real transaction between himself and plaintiff and Hitchcock. In one of these counts he alleged that plaintiff and Hitchcock were partners. In another he averred that plaintiff was merely the agent of Hitchcock, who was the principal in the transaction set forth in his said pleading. In all of these counts the defendant averred that the agreement between the parties was different from that sued on by the plaintiff, and that from its alleged breach the defendant was entitled to recover a large amount of damages from both the plaintiff and Hitchcock. Upon the filing of this pleading the cause was set for trial and proceeded to trial without any order of court or other action of the parties bringing in said Hitchcock as a party thereto. The record does not disclose that he was ever served with the cross-complaint, nor that he ever made any answer thereto, although the judgment recites his appearance by counsel at the trial. The cause was tried before a jury. No special verdict upon any of the issues was requested, and the jury, having been instructed by the court, retired and presently returned a general verdict in the following words:

> "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find for the plaintiff, and assess the damages against defendant R. L. Bliss in the sum of $3,027.23, plus the 3 per cent. deducted as shrinkage from said last shipment together with interest."

To the form of the verdict as thus rendered the defendant Bliss made no objection at the time of its rendition, nor did he make any request of the court that the jury be directed to make any finding upon the issues tendered in his pleading, nor did he request that the cross-defendant Hitchcock be named in said verdict, nor that as to him the jury should return a verdict.

[1] If the verdict was defective in these respects, it was the duty of the defendant Bliss to have called the attention of the court to such defects before the jury was discharged in order that it might retire and correct its verdict. The Code provides for this procedure (Code Civ. Proc. § 619), and by failing to avail himself of it the defendant Bliss must be held to have waived the defects, if any such existed, in this verdict. Van Damme v. McGilivray Stone Co., 22 Cal. App. 191, 133 Pac. 995; Benson v. S. P. Co. (decided March 20, 1918), 171 Pac. 948.

[2] We are not, however, to be understood as deciding that the verdict was defective in the respects urged by the appellant and which forms his main contention upon this appeal. The action was upon a transaction for the sale of cattle by plaintiff to the defendant Bliss. The agreement, it is admitted by the defendant Bliss, was made by him with the plaintiff, Asebez. His contention, however, was that its terms were other than those asserted by the latter in his complaint, and, further, that Asebez was either a partner of Hitchcock's or was his agent in entering into the agreement. Upon the defendant's own theory of the case he could have had no remedy against either Asebez or Hitchcock if the plaintiff succeeded in sustaining the averments of the complaint as to the terms of the contract between them. The verdict of the jury in the plaintiff's favor and for the amount sued for in his complaint is of necessity a finding against the defendant Bliss upon the averments in his cross-complaint, and hence necessarily a finding that no cause of action existed in his favor against either Asebez or Hitchcock. For both of the foregoing reasons therefore the appellant cannot here be held to complain.

[3] The appellant makes the further contention that the trial court committed an error in granting the plaintiff's motion made after the discharge of the jury and entry of the judgment to amend the verdict and judgment by striking therefrom the words "plus the 3 per cent. deducted as shrinkage from said last shipment, together with interest." The elimination of these words from the verdict and judgment had the effect of decreasing the defendant's liability and reducing the amount of the judgment against him, and to that extent was an order in his favor. He was not therefore aggrieved, and hence cannot question the propriety of the court's action in that regard upon this appeal.

Judgment and order affirmed.

GERARDI v. BONOFF et al. (L. A. 4137.)

TRIAL ⚷260(1)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

Where instructions given fully and fairly informed the jury as to the legal rights and duties of the respective parties and embodied defendants' theory of the case it was not error to refuse defendants' requested instructions thereon.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by V. L. Gerardi against Karl M. Bonoff and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellants. O'Melveney, Stevens & Millikin and A. I. McCormick, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff through being struck by the defendants' automobile while he was in the act of alighting from a street car upon which he had been a passenger. The street car was proceeding westerly along West Eleventh street in the city of Los Angeles on the evening of July 13, 1912, at about the hour of 6:30 o'clock. The automobile of which the defendant Karl M. Bonoff was the driver, and the defendant D. Bonoff was the owner, and was also an occupant at the time of the accident, was proceeding westerly along the northerly side of said street. As the street car approached the intersection of West Eleventh street and Bonnie Brae street, the plaintiff gave the signal to stop and the car slowed down and stopped at said intersection. The plaintiff alighted and was about to cross to the northerly curb of Eleventh street when he was struck by the defendants' automobile and severely injured. Immediately prior to the slowing down and stopping of the street car, the defendant's automobile had been driving alongside of the car on the proper side of the street and at a rate of speed variously estimated by the respective witnesses at from 15 to 25 miles an hour. The width of the street at that point did not permit an automobile to pass at a distance from the running board or lowest steps of the street car equal to 4 feet while passing the same. The complaint alleged that the defendants' negligence consisted in the fact that they were violating the provisions of the traffic ordinance of the city of Los Angeles then in force in the manner and at the speed at which they were operating their automobile immediately before and at the time of plaintiff's injuries; and also alleged that the defendants were negligent in operating their said automobile in a careless manner and at an unlawful and dangerous rate of speed. These averments were denied in the defendants' answer, and the cause proceeded to trial upon the issues thus framed. Upon the trial the defendants contended and offered some evidence to show that the street car slowed and stopped with unusual suddenness and without warning to the occupants of the automobile in consequence of which they were unable to check the speed of their machine in time to stop or to avoid the accident. There was evidence to the contrary upon these matters, and the appellants do not seriously insist that upon the whole the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict.

The most important of the appellants' contentions is that the trial court was in error in giving certain instructions in which it undertook to consider and apply the terms of the traffic ordinance in question and in refusing to give certain other instructions requested by the defendants having the same purpose. The provisions of the traffic ordinance applicable to the situation read as follows:

"Sec. 22. The driver of any vehicle in or upon any street shall keep such vehicle at least four (4) feet from the running board or lowest step of any street car that shall have stopped or that is stopping for the purpose of taking on or discharging passengers; and if, by reason of the presence of a vehicle or other obstruction at the place where such car shall have stopped or is stopping, or by reason of the narrowness of the street, it is not possible to preserve such distance of four (4) feet from such running board or lowest step, as herein prescribed, then such driver shall cause such vehicle to be stopped until the passengers shall have been taken on or discharged from such car.

"Sec. 23. It shall be unlawful for any person to ride, drive or propel, or to cause or permit to be ridden, driven or propelled, any vehicle at a rate of speed greater than four (4) miles per hour in passing any street car or interurban car that is slowing down or standing still in any public street; provided, however, that the provisions of this section shall not apply to any vehicle that is traveling in a direction opposite to that in which the car passed by such vehicle is proceeding and at least ten feet distant from such car."

"Sec. 80. Any person who shall ride, drive or propel, or who shall cause or permit to be ridden, driven or propelled any vehicle at a rate of speed greater than twenty (20) miles per hour and not greater than thirty (30) miles per hour, upon or along any street or portion of any street, in the city of Los Angeles, outside of the district described hereinbefore in this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punishable as in this section provided."

We have examined the instructions which the trial court gave with respect to the scope, effect, and application of the foregoing provisions of the ordinance and are entirely satisfied that they correctly interpreted and applied the same and that the appellants' criticism of these instructions as given have no substantial merit. We have also examined the instructions which the defendants requested and which the court gave in connection with those instructions which the defendants requested and which the court refused to give, and we find that the former embodied substantially the defendants' theory of the case, and that the latter were sufficiently covered either by the instructions which the court had already given upon the plaintiff's request or upon its own motion, or by those which the court had given at the defendants' request. Taken as a whole, the instructions given by the trial court very fully and fairly informed the jury as to the legal rights and duties of the respective parties in the premises; while, on the other hand, the defendants' instructions which the court refused to give are defective and misleading in respect to the terms and effect of the ordinance and in their assumption as to the facts of the case, and they were properly refused by the trial court. This applies particularly to those portions of the requested instructions which undertook to set forth the duty of the plaintiff in alighting from the car. The court had already generally instructed the jury upon this subject, and we are of the opinion that the defendants were in no wise prejudiced by the failure of the court to give defendants' requested instructions upon this branch of the case.

No other error being complained of, the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: SLOSS, J.; SHAW, J.

WHITING-MEAD COMMERCIAL CO. v. BAYSIDE LAND CO. et al. (L. A. 5555.)

APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑345(1)—TIME FOR APPEAL—STATUTES.

Provision of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 939 and 941B, that appeal from judgment must be taken within 60 days from entry, and that, if proceedings for new trial are pending, time for appeal shall not expire until 30 days after entry of order therein, is limited to cases where new trial proceeding is regularly initiated by filing and service of notice of intention to move for new trial within 10 days after receiving notice of entry of judgment or within 10 days after verdict, as required by section 659, and, if a new trial proceeding is not so initiated within 10 days, appeal from the final judgment must be taken within 60 days from entry.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Actions by the Whiting-Mead Commercial Company, a corporation, against the Bayside Land Company, the Fidelity Savings & Loan Association, and Ben Kelsey and others. From the judgment, plaintiff appealed. On motion to dismiss. Motion granted.

R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Bordwell & Mathews, of Los Angeles, and W. K. Young, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. In this case the motion to dismiss the appeal from final judgment on the ground that the appeal was not taken within the time provided by law was granted from the bench. As the matter involved the construction of certain sections of our Code of Civil Procedure relative to appeals, it is deemed proper to briefly state the reasons on which the decision of the court is based.

The final judgment herein was actually entered in the superior court on August 10, 1917, and the appeal was not taken until November 9, 1917, which was more than 60 days after the entry of the judgment. Our law substantially provides (sections 939 and 941b, Code Civ. Proc.) that an appeal from the judgment must be taken within 60 days from the entry of the judgment. It further provides:

> "If proceedings on motion for a new trial are pending, the time for appeal from the judgment shall not expire until thirty days after entry in the trial court of the order determining such motion for a new trial, or other termination in the trial court of the proceedings upon such motion."

Appellant relies on the provision quoted. Its notice of intention to move for a new trial was however, not filed within 10 days after notice of the entry of the judgment, as required by section 659, Code of Civil Procedure. In our opinion the provision relied on is limited in its effect to those cases where a new trial proceeding is regularly initiated by the filing and service of a notice of intention to move for a new trial "within ten days after receiving notice of the entry of the judgment, or within ten days after verdict, if the trial was by jury," as required by section 659, Code of Civil Procedure. If a new trial proceeding be not so initiated within such 10 days, no proceeding on motion for a new trial can be held to be "pending" within the meaning of sections 939 and 941b, and an appeal from the final judgment to be effective must be taken within 60 days from the entry of the judgment.

It was for this reason that the appeal from the judgment was dismissed.

STOW v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY. (S. F. 8450.)

1. STIPULATIONS 🔑14(12)—ENTRY OF JUDGMENT ON PLEADINGS.

In an action on a contract, when plaintiff attempted to introduce testimony defendant objected on the ground that the complaint failed to state a cause of action, whereupon plaintiff's counsel said, "If the complaint does not state a cause of action, of course, then, the easiest way to test that is by defendant making a motion for judgment on the pleadings," and such a motion was made and granted. Held, the language of plaintiff's counsel did not constitute a stipulation for entry of such judgment; it being merely a statement of that which, in contemplation of the court's view, counsel for plaintiff believed to be a speedy method of getting ready for an appeal.

2. NEW TRIAL 🔑38—NONSUIT—JUDGMENT ON PLEADINGS.

Where a demurrer to the complaint had been overruled, and on trial before another judge plaintiff's evidence was rejected because the complaint was defective, and, plaintiff standing upon his pleadings, the court gave judgment against him, such judgment was not a judgment on the pleadings, but in effect one of nonsuit, the granting of which, if improper, was ground for new trial.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑662(2)—REVIEW—RECITALS IN JUDGMENT.

That a judgment itself recites that it is entered on the pleadings is not controlling, and will not prevent a reviewing court from examining the entire record to learn all the facts.

4. NEW TRIAL 🔑38—GROUNDS—"ERROR IN LAW OCCURRING AT THE TRIAL."

Where testimony proffered by plaintiff was rejected upon the ground that it could not be relevant under the complaint believed by the court to be faulty, and, plaintiff standing on his pleading, the court gave judgment against him, new trial might be granted because of the court's ruling upon the exclusion of evidence under the complaint, as an alleged "error in law, occurring at the trial," made ground for new trial by Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 7.

In Bank. Petition by F. H. Stow against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for Alameda County for certiorari to review a motion granting a new trial. On transfer by petition to Supreme Court. Writ discharged.

Costello & Costello, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Raine Ewell, in pro. per. in Superior Court.

MELVIN, J. The District Court of Appeal granted a writ of certiorari to review the action of the superior court in granting a motion for a new trial in a certain action entitled Ewell v. McKenzie and Stow, in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Alameda. The contention of petitioner was that the judgment had been granted upon the pleadings; that therefore there were no questions of fact to review on a new trial; and that consequently a motion for a new trial would not lie.

The learned District Court of Appeal being satisfied that the judgment was rendered in response to a motion for judgment on the pleadings held, upon the authority of Gray v. Cotton, 174 Cal. 256, 162 Pac. 1019, that the attempt to obtain a new trial was unauthorized, and that the court was without jurisdiction to grant it. On rehearing the court reached the same conclusion as before and set aside the order granting a new trial as one made without jurisdiction by the court below. The Court of Appeal said, in part:

> "This matter was a hearing upon a motion for judgment on the pleadings purely and simply. It was presented in that form, as the record now shows, by the concurrence and consent of counsel for both sides in open court at the time the motion was granted. The judgment in the case shows it was a judgment based upon a motion for such judgment on the pleadings. No issue of fact was tried, and no issue of fact could be re-examined after such judgment. The only remedy which the party had for whatever error the court committed in granting a judgment upon the pleadings was by an appeal. The former opinion which the court rendered in this matter will stand as the opinion of the court."

Upon petition the matter was transferred to this court.

It is contended that both by reason of the stipulation of plaintiff's counsel in the trial of the case in the superior court and because of the contents of the judgment itself, this court is bound to accept the theory that the judgment was one given on the pleadings and involving no disputed issues of fact.

[1] Upon the record now before us it is shown that the course of events was substantially as follows: Action was commenced in the superior court, plaintiff's cause resting largely upon the alleged obligations arising from a certain written contract attached to the complaint as an exhibit. Demurrer to the complaint was overruled, an answer was filed and the cause being at issue was brought on for trial before a judge other than the one who had ruled upon the demurrer. A trial by jury was waived; counsel for the respective parties made their addresses outlining their respective theories and the proofs which they intended to offer in support thereof; a witness for plaintiff was called and sworn, and his testimony was sought to be introduced by plaintiff. Defendant's counsel objected to the introduction of any evidence on behalf of plaintiff on the ground that the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that the contract attached to the complaint as an exhibit was for an indefinite term. The objection was sustained by the learned judge of the superior court upon the ground that by the terms of the contract attached as an exhibit to the complaint an action on that agreement was not maintainable. Thereafter defendants moved to dismiss their cross-complaint and the motion was granted. Then they moved for judgment on the pleadings on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This motion was granted. The judge by affidavit has declared that in granting the motion last referred to, he did not take into consideration the allegations of the complaint at all, but only regarded the contract marked "Exhibit A." Subsequently, on motion for new trial the court, convinced that the conclusion regarding the insufficiency of the complaint had been erroneous, granted the motion, and this is the order which, it is contended, was beyond the jurisdiction of the superior court to make.

At the trial, after the court had expressed a conviction that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, counsel for plaintiff said:

> "Well, if your honor has that view of it, there is no use going any further; if the complaint does not state a cause of action, of course, then, the easiest way to test that is by the defendant making a motion for judgment on the pleadings, and, if that is granted, then I can settle that bill of exceptions very quickly."

This was followed by dismissal of the cross-complaint at request of counsel for defendants and the making and granting of the motion for judgment on the pleadings. At the oral argument on this proceeding the contention was made, in effect, that the suggestion by counsel for plaintiff in the court below amounted to a stipulation that judgment on the pleadings be entered. As counsel said in argument before this court:

> "I could not have made the motion if it had not been by consent."

We do not construe the remarks of counsel for plaintiff in the court below as amounting to consent that a judgment on the pleadings should be entered. Indeed he stoutly asserted at all times that his pleading was good. His suggestion to his opponent waived nothing. It was merely a statement of that which, in contemplation of the court's view of the law, counsel for plaintiff believed to be a speedy method of getting ready for an appeal. Petitioner's counsel, while conceding that the issue of law had been duly decided when the court passed upon his demurrer to the complaint, says that his motion for judgment on the pleadings was equivalent to a new demurrer, and that the suggestion from his opponent amounted to a consent to the withdrawing of the answer and a stipulation for a decision solely upon the sufficiency of the complaint to aver facts amounting to a cause of action. We cannot see that the language and conduct of plaintiff's counsel in the trial court created such a stipulation, and even if they could be so construed, it does not appear that as matter of record the answer was withdrawn. The situation therefore is this: Upon trial of issues under pleadings which had passed demurrer, proffered testimony was rejected upon the ground that it could not be relevant under the complaint believed by the court to be faulty; plaintiff stood upon his pleading; and the court gave judgment against him.

[2] Respondent takes the position that in essence this was a judgment of nonsuit, and with this view we agree. In the case of Green v. Duvergey, 146 Cal. 379, 80 Pac. 234, the court refused to permit the introduction of any evidence unless plaintiff would deposit a certain sum of money with the clerk. Plaintiff declining to obey this preliminary order a nonsuit was entered and a judgment of dismissal was given. Plaintiff's motion for a new trial was denied and on appeal the court reversed the order denying it, saying, in part:

> "The trial of a cause includes all the rulings of the court and the proceedings before it which conduce to the decision which it makes upon the issues in the case as the basis of its judgment. People v. Turner, 39 Cal. 370; Moore v. Bates, 46 Cal. 29. Any erroneous ruling, by virtue of which a party is precluded from introducing evidence in support of his cause of action as set forth in his complaint or his defense, is an error of law occurring at the trial. The action of the court in improperly granting or refusing a nonsuit is also an error of law, whether made upon the opening statement of counsel or after the close of the evidence in the cause. Craig v. Hesperia Land & Water Co., 107 Cal. 675, 40 Pac. 1057. Under these principles, the order of the court requiring the plaintiffs to pay into court the sum of $25,000, as a condition upon which they could proceed to trial, and the order granting a nonsuit upon the opening statement and admissions of their counsel, may be reviewed as errors of law occurring at the trial."

Respondent is of the opinion that in essence the judgment entered in the superior court in Ewell v. McKenzie et al. was a judgment of nonsuit, and that calling it by another name does not alter that fact. We are constrained to agree with this view and we believe that Green v. Duvergey, supra, supports our conclusion. In that case as in the Ewell Case the court declined to hear proffered testimony at the trial. In that case the refusal was regarded as error of law by this court on appeal. In the Ewell Case the judge who made the ruling excluding the evidence believed that he had committed error and sought to give appropriate relief. That one error was due to a misunderstanding of the court's power and the other to a misconception of the sufficiency of a pleading does not in our opinion make any difference in regard to the power and jurisdiction of the trial court upon motion for a new trial.

[3, 4] The fact that the judgment itself recites that it was one entered upon the pleadings is not controlling. The whole record is before us, and a recital in the judgment will not prevent this court from examining the entire record for the purpose of learning all of the facts. A new trial may be granted for errors in law, occurring at the trial and excepted to by the party making the application. Section 657, subd. 7, Code Civ. Proc. Judge Hayne in his work on New Trial and Appeal uses the following language (vol. 1, § 1, p. 9, Rev. Ed.):

> "But errors occurring at the trial, and having an indirect relation to the pleadings, may be ground for a new trial. So at the trial a party may test the question whether his adversary's pleading states a cause of action or defense by objecting to the introduction of any evidence under it, and the ruling upon such objection may be reviewed on motion for new trial."

Since the court's ruling upon the exclusion of evidence under the complaint was reviewable as an alleged "error in law, occurring at the trial," we must hold that no successful attack may be made upon the court's jurisdiction to pass upon the motion for a new trial.

The writ of certiorari is discharged.

REED v. REED. (L. A. 4213.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⚷443(7) — ACTION — COMPLAINT — CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1493, 1500, providing that a suit against an executrix to enforce a money demand on contract cannot be maintained unless a claim therefor has been presented to the executrix and rejected, complaint against an executrix, stating a cause of action for money on an implied contract against decedent, was insufficient because of failure to allege presentation of the claim to the executrix.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⚷444(3) — ACTION — POSSESSION AND TRUST CHARACTER OF PROPERTY.

If the intention of plaintiff who sued an executrix on a cause of action for money on an implied contract with decedent was to charge the executrix as trustee of specific property, the complaint should have contained allegations showing she had come into possession of the property, and that it was charged with a trust in favor of plaintiff.

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS 🔑453(2)—ACTION—JUDGMENT—PAYMENT OUT OF ASSETS.

Judgment against an executrix on a demand against decedent should have been made payable out of the assets of the estate in due course of administration.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Ella J. Reed against Ethel M. Reed, executrix of the estate of Henry A. Reed. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

W. A. Alderson, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Dennison & Towner, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial. We think the appellant's claim that the complaint does not state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action or to support the judgment of the court below is well taken. The action was against the defendant as the executrix of the estate of Henry A. Reed, deceased. It set forth that in the lifetime of decedent the plaintiff had given said decedent the sum of $2,250 as the purchase price of certain stock in a corporation known as the Southwestern Sugar Company, which said decedent agreed to transfer to the plaintiff for said sum of money. It further alleges that the corporation was insolvent, and that the stock was worthless; that the decedent represented to her that it was of great value and worth the price which she agreed to pay therefor, and by that means obtained from her the said sum of money and the agreement to purchase the stock, and that the decedent further represented that he would consider the money as a trust fund, and would guarantee plaintiff against any loss, and that if the stock should prove to be of no value, he would repay the money so paid by plaintiff. It is alleged that the representations made by the decedent were false and untrue, and that the stock was in fact of no value. There is no allegation that the plaintiff ever offered to rescind the contract and return the stock, or that any claim for the money sued for against the decedent's estate was ever made or presented by the plaintiff, or that the defendant, as executrix, ever received the money paid by the plaintiff to the decedent. There is nothing in the complaint sufficient to state a cause of action to charge the executrix as trustee of any specific property belonging to the plaintiff. The judgment itself purports to be a personal judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant Ethel M. Reed, executrix of the estate of Henry A. Reed, deceased, for $2,123.83 and costs. It is not made payable in due course of administration, nor charged against the estate of decedent.

[1-3] It is well settled that a suit against an executrix to enforce a money demand upon contract cannot be maintained unless a claim therefor is presented to the executrix and is rejected prior to the beginning of the action. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1493, 1500. The most that can be said of this complaint is that it states a cause of action for money upon an implied contract against the decedent. It is therefore insufficient because of the failure to allege the presentation of the claim. If the intention was to charge the defendant executrix as trustee of specific property, the complaint should have contained allegations showing that she had come into possession of such property, and that it was charged with a trust in favor of the plaintiff. No allegations tending to show such a case are contained in the complaint. Furthermore, there are no allegations to uphold a personal judgment against the executrix, and a judgment upon a demand against the decedent should have been made payable out of the assets of the estate in due course of administration. We find no ground upon which the judgment can be upheld.

The judgment and order are reversed.

BUTLER v. UNION TRUST CO.

1. JOINT ADVENTURES 🔑5(2) — ACTION FOR ACCOUNTING—PLEADING—VARIANCE.

Where in action to dissolve an alleged partnership and secure an accounting plaintiff alleged facts which he claimed created a partnership, which facts were found to be true and to show a joint adventure, the court did not err in refusing a nonsuit on the ground that the facts showed a joint adventure only, since a joint adventure is similar to a partnership, and the right to an accounting of profits in accordance with the agreement therefor and the obligations growing out of such agreement are governed by the same rules of law.

2. JOINT ADVENTURES 🔑5(1)—RIGHT TO ACCOUNTING.

Whether plaintiff, who contributed his skill in manufacturing fur garments, and defendant, who provided a shop, purchased furs, etc., were partners or joint adventurers, an accounting was necessary, where defendant breached his agreement before the time for division of net profits and termination of agreement.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1011(1)—FINDINGS BASED ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE — REVIEW.

Findings of court based on conflicting evidence are conclusive on appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by C. E. Butler, Guardian, etc., against the Union Trust Company, executor of the last will and testament of G. A. Williams, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order denying motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Morganstern, of San Diego, for appellant. Clifford C. Pease and Luce & Luce, all of San Diego, for respondent.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. The purpose of this action, brought by I. J. Grossman, for whom, as plaintiff, C. E. Butler, his guardian, has been substituted, was to dissolve an alleged partnership, secure an accounting of profits accruing therefrom, and recover damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the acts of G. A. Williams, now deceased, and for whom, as such defendant, the Union Trust Company, as executor of his estate, has been substituted, which prevented plaintiff from carrying out the terms of the partnership agreement. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and, the court denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he prosecutes this appeal from such order.

As found by the court (reference being had to the original parties to the action), plaintiff was a skilled designer and manufacturing furrier, but without means to purchase material or conduct such business. In February, 1913, he and the defendant entered into an agreement whereby the former was to contribute his labor and skill, and defendant should advance the necessary money for the purchase of material and to pay the expenses of conducting the business of manufacturing fur garments in a shop therefor provided by defendant, and advance to plaintiff for his personal expenses the sum of $15 per week; the goods so manufactured to be sold by defendant at his storeroom, where he conducted another line of business. The conduct of the business was to continue until January 1, 1914, at which time the net profits, less such sums as defendant had advanced to plaintiff for personal expenses, were to be equally divided between the parties.

Issue was joined upon the question as to the existence of the alleged partnership, and at the trial the court suggested that such issue be first determined before entering upon an inquiry as to the accounting prayed for. Thereupon evidence was introduced touching the issue, at the close of which the court indicated that the transaction between the parties did not constitute a copartnership. Thereupon defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that the cause of action was based upon the theory that a partnership existed, out of which there arose the responsibility of one party to the other, and since, in the opinion of the court, the facts did not justify such theory, there was nothing on which to base an accounting. This motion was denied, the court holding that, while no partnership was created, facts were established which entitled plaintiff to an accounting upon the theory that the arrangement had between the parties constituted a joint adventure in which the rights of the parties to an accounting were of a similar nature to what they would be were it found that a partnership existed. Continuing the trial, the court found the facts substantially as alleged in the complaint, and further found that they did not constitute an agreement of partnership, but did constitute a joint adventure between plaintiff and defendant; that plaintiff complied with his part of the agreement in devoting all of his time, skill, and labor in fulfillment of the terms thereof, and, save and except as prevented by defendant, fully performed the same, until about September 1, 1913, when, during the nighttime, defendant, without just cause, knowledge, or consent of plaintiff, entered the shop where the business was conducted and removed therefrom all of the goods theretofore purchased by defendant pursuant to the agreement to be used by plaintiff in the manufacture of fur garments, including garments made up by plaintiff, and took the same to his storeroom, thus depriving plaintiff of the opportunity to continue the business, and appropriated to his own use and exclusive control the garments which plaintiff by his labor and skill had manufactured, as well as the raw material in stock.

While there is a sharp conflict in the evidence, and proof of the allegations of the complaint is based largely upon the testimony of plaintiff, who, by reason of his lack of acquaintance with the English language, appears to have been somewhat vague and uncertain in expressing himself, it is nevertheless, when taken in connection with other testimony which tended to corroborate his story, sufficient to justify the findings made by the court.

[1] This being true, we are brought to a consideration of the chief error upon which defendant bases his claim for a reversal namely: That the court erred in its refusal to grant the nonsuit upon indicating that the evidence failed to establish the existence of a copartnership. In our opinion, there is no merit in this contention. In his complaint plaintiff alleged facts which he claimed created a copartnership. These facts were found to be true. But the court also found that they did not constitute a partnership, but a joint adventure. It is sometimes a close question whether a transaction constitutes a partnership or a joint adventure. Jackson v. Hooper, 76 N. J. Eq. 185, 74 Atl. 130, and cases cited. A joint adventure, however, is similar to a partnership, and, being of a similar nature, the right to an accounting of profits in accordance with the agreement therefor and the obligations growing out of such agreement between the parties are governed by the same rules of law. 23 Cyc. 453; Petrie v. Torrent, 88 Mich. 43, 49 N. W. 1076;

Causten v. Barnette, 49 Wash. 659, 96 Pac. 225; Claflin Co. v. Gross, 112 Fed. 386, 50 C. C. A. 300.

[2] Whether the parties were technically partners or not, an accounting was necessary to determine their respective rights. Garr v. Redman, 6 Cal. 574. Clearly plaintiff by reason of contributing his labor and skill in the common venture was, under the agreement, entitled to his share of the net profits of the business the conduct of which, being terminated by defendant, could only be ascertained upon an examination and settlement of the accounts of the business, precisely the same as though a partnership had existed. Since the facts alleged and found entitled the plaintiff to an accounting for the purpose of determining what were the net profits of the venture, the fact that the agreement and transactions had between the parties did not, as found by the court, constitute a copartnership in the strict sense, is wholly immaterial. In no event, even were error conceded, could defendant be prejudiced by reason of the ruling.

[3] As a result of the accounting had and taken, the court also found that defendant was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $543.55 for his share of the net profits of the business during the time it was conducted, and that plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $250 by reason of defendant's breach of the agreement in wrongfully taking possession of and removing from plaintiff's shop the stock of goods and manufactured fur garments on September 1, 1913, thus preventing a continuance of the business to January 1st in accordance with the agreement. These findings are based upon conflicting evidence as to which the determination of the trial court must be deemed conclusive.

The order denying defendant's motion for a new trial is affirmed.

GRAFF v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 7338.)

1. Carriers 🔑348(13) — Passengers — Personal Injury — Misleading Instruction.

In an action for injury when thrown from the front platform of an electric car to the ground, an instruction that where an injured passenger is riding in an unusual position, which increases his danger, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply, and no presumption arises that the resulting injury was due to the carrier's negligence, was misleading, in view of possible proof that the injury arose from the operation of the car.

2. Carriers 🔑316(1) — Personal Injury — Burden of Proof.

Where personal injury to a passenger arises from carrier's operation of car, there is a prima facie case of negligence, and burden is on the carrier to show that the thing done by it causing the injury was not the result of its negligence.

3. Carriers 🔑348(11)—Cause of Injury—Question for Jury.

Whether the injury arose from the manner of operating electric car or from a passenger's carlessness in standing too near the edge of the platform held a question for the jury.

4. Carriers 🔑347(7) — Personal Injury — Contributory Negligence—Question for Jury.

In a passenger's action for personal injury when thrown from the front platform of an electric car while rounding a curve, the question of contributory negligence held for the jury.

5. Carriers 🔑347(7) — Injury to Passenger—Contributory Negligence.

Independently of statute, it is not negligence per se for a passenger to stand on the front platform of a moving electric car.

6. Carriers 🔑348(5) — Personal Injury — Refusal of Instruction.

In an action for personal injury when thrown from the front platform of an electric car while rounding a curve, a requested instruction that if the passenger voluntarily and for his own convenience was riding on the platform, exposed to greater danger than if he had remained in the car, and he could have entered the car a reasonable time before the accident, he assumed responsibility for the increased risks, and, if injured in consequence thereof, could not recover, was properly refused, as it charged the passenger with the assumption of all increased risks, including any misconduct on the part of the motorman in the operation of the car.

7. Carriers 🔑348(5) — Personal Injury — Refusal of Instruction.

In such case a requested instruction that, if plaintiff was thrown from the car by any swaying motion or sudden jerk ordinarily incident to the running of cars, under the circumstances of the case verdict should be for defendant was properly refused, as it made him assume the risk of such jerk, even if it arose from the motorman's reckless operation of the car with knowledge of plaintiff's presence on the platform.

8. Carriers 🔑348(13) — Personal Injury—Instruction — Contributory Negligence.

An instruction that as matter of law, notwithstanding the passenger's place of added peril on the platform, a legal presumption of negligence arose against the carrier from the fact of his injury was erroneous.

9. Courts 🔑90(1) — Former Decisions — Scope — General Approval of Instructions.

The Supreme Court's general approval of the instructions is not a specific approval of an instruction not criticized.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Warren Graff against the United Railroads of San Francisco. Judgment for plaintiff, accepted by plaintiff as reduced, motion for a new trial denied, and from the order and judgment defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wm. M. Abbott and Wm. M. Cannon, both of San Francisco (Kingsly Cannon, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. [1, 2] In the decision of this case in department the judgment was reversed because of the instruction which appears in the latter part of the opinion upon the subject of the presumption arising from an injury to a passenger while on board a railroad car. In commenting upon this instruction the opinion contained the following:

> "The rule of law is that where an injured passenger is riding in an unusual position, which position increases his danger, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply, and no presumption arises that resulting injury was due to the negligence of the carrier."

The rehearing was granted because it was considered that this statement might be misleading. The concluding sentence of the opinion is also misleading. It is obvious that the proof may show that the passenger was riding in an unusual position which increased his danger, and may also show that the injury arose from something done by the carrier in operating the car. In such a case a prima facie case of negligence is made, and the burden rests upon the carrier to show that the thing done by it which caused the injury was not the result of its negligence. The true rule on the subject is stated in the Steele Case, cited in the opinion, and in Wyatt v. Pacific, etc., Co., 156 Cal. 174, 103 Pac. 892.

[3] It is true that this instruction has been approved in a number of cases decided by this court, but it will be found that in each case there was no dispute over the proposition that the injury arose from the manner of operating the car. When that is the case, the instruction, although it does not fully state the doctrine, is correct when applied to such a case, and the court would not reverse the judgment because of the failure to give the modifications which might be necessary if the evidence were of a different character. In the present case there was a dispute over the question whether the injury arose from the manner of operating the car, or from the plaintiff's carelessness in standing too near the side thereof, and the question as to which was the cause of the injury should have been left to the jury instead of being taken from them by the absolute character of the instruction given.

With this explanation of the concluding sentence, and the passage above quoted and the authorities cited in support of it eliminated, we adhere to the opinion rendered in department. It is as follows:

"Plaintiff charged that while a passenger upon an electric car of the defendant and riding on the front platform thereof the motorman propelled the car around a curve at a greatly excessive speed, causing him, the plaintiff, to be thrown violently from the car to the ground, the car passing over both of his legs, necessitating amputation of both. Defendant answered by denial, and affirmatively charged that the injuries sustained by plaintiff were due to his own negligence. The jury rendered a verdict for plaintiff. On defendant's motion for a new trial the court reduced the verdict, and plaintiff accepted the reduction. The motion for a new trial was then denied, and defendant appeals from the judgment and order so doing.

[4] "Defendant's first contention is that plaintiff's own evidence establishes his contributory negligence beyond doubt, and that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury to return its verdict in favor of defendant. Plaintiff, it appears, was familiar with the tracks over which he was traveling and with the curves thereon. He was on the front platform of the car near an open door on the right-hand side of the car which permitted the ingress and egress of passengers. He was in conversation with a friend. He turned his head slightly to speak to this friend, when the car took the curve and hurled him through the open door. He was standing next to another door opening into the body of the car, and so far as he remembered, though his memory was not good, he was not leaning against it nor holding to anything. He was accustomed to ride on electric cars and on the cars of that particular line, and was standing, balancing himself. The evidence was conflicting as to the speed with which the car took the curve. It will be assumed that the jury believed that it was at an undue speed, and that the motorman was guilty of negligence, in view of the fact that to his knowledge passengers were standing on the front platform. Though witnesses for the plaintiff testified that plaintiff was, or apparently was, holding on to the iron gate or a handrail of the car, and that he also was leaning with his back against the door, it is said that by virtue of plaintiff's own testimony this evidence is not sufficient to raise a conflict. We think, however, that it is, and that we are bound to assume that the jury concluded that the plaintiff was doing both of these things, and this is so because it is a part of common experience that a man who has received so tremendous a shock as that which this plaintiff sustained frequently comes through his injuries with no clear memory of the accident itself or the events that occurred immediately antecedent thereto. This truth is one of common knowledge, and is universally recognized in the medical books. Plaintiff's own testimony in this regard is, 'At the present time, since this accident, my memory is pretty bad.'

"It is said that it was plaintiff's duty, even if obliged to stand temporarily on the front platform, to enter the body of the car and thus make his position safe when opportunity presented itself so to do; that such opportunity did present itself, and plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in not making use of the opportunity. Upon the question of the condition of the car, however, the evidence is in dispute; that of the plaintiff going to show that in the body of the car every seat was occupied, that passengers were crowded in the aisle and six or seven more were standing on the platform where he was. Under these circumstances again, the determination of these disputed facts is for the jury.

[5] "Authorities are cited by appellant declaring that the mere presence of a passenger upon an electric car on the platform when there is space for him within the body of the car is conclusive upon the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, and to this effect it is contended are Hodler v. Public Service Ry. Co., 85 N. J. Law, 346, 88 Atl. 1071, and Ward v. International R. Co., 206 N. Y. 83, 99 N. E. 262, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1170, but whatever may be the rule in these jurisdictions, such is not the rule in this state, nor in the majority of states, nor yet do we conceive it to be the rule independently of statute in the state of New York, for it is said in Nolan v. Brooklyn City, etc., Ry., 87 N. Y. 63, 41 Am. Rep. 345: 'The rule is settled that independent of the mandate of the statute * * * it is not, even in the case of steam cars, negligence per se for a passenger to stand on the front platform of a moving car.' Kelly v. Santa Barbara R. R. Co., 171 Cal. 423, 153 Pac. 903, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 798; Pruitt v. Santa Barbara, etc., R. R. Co., 161 Cal. 29, 118 Pac. 223, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 331; Holloway v. Pasadena, etc., Ry. Co., 130 Cal. 177,

"'(1) If the plaintiff voluntarily and for his own convenience was riding on the platform of the car at the time and place in question, and was thus exposed to dangers which he would not have encountered had he entered and remained within the car, and that he could have entered the car a reasonable time before the accident and remained therein until the time of the accident, I instruct you that the plaintiff assumed responsibility for the increased risks, if any, which he thus voluntarily exposed himself to, and if he was injured solely in consequence of such increased risk, I instruct you that he cannot recover, and your verdict must be in favor of the defendant.

"'(2) If you find that the plaintiff was thrown from the car either by any swaying motion or any sudden jerk, and that such motion or jerk is ordinarily incident to the running of cars under the circumstances of this case, you are instructed that your verdict must be in favor of the defendant.'

"It was justified in so doing, for both of these instructions contain a declaration not warranted in law. By the first the jury would have been told that the plaintiff 'assumed responsibility for the increased risks' occasioned by his presence on the platform, and 'if he was injured solely in consequence of such increased risk,' he could not recover. Something of what has heretofore been said points out the error in law here declared. Specifically the vice of the instruction is that it charges the plaintiff with the assumption of all increased risks, whereas, the only increased risks which he assumed were those occasioned by his position and arising from the due operation of the car by the motorman who had knowledge of that position. He did not assume the increased risks of any misconduct upon the part of the motorman in such operation. The specific legal flaw of the second instruction justifying its refusal is that it charges the jury that plaintiff assumed the responsibility of injury from any 'sudden jerk ordinarily incident to the running of cars under the circumstances of this case,' and here again is the implication, if not the statement, that the plaintiff assumed the risk of such a jerk even if it arose from the reckless operation of the car by the motorman who had knowledge of his presence on the platform. Making reference to the discussion of this question in Kelly v. Santa Barbara R. R. Co., 171 Cal. 415, 153 Pac. 903, Ann. Cas. 1917, c. 67, nothing further need here be added.

[8, 9] "Finally, the court instructed the jury in the following language: 'Contributory negligence on the part of a passenger cannot be presumed from the mere fact of injury, but must be proved. On the other hand, the proof of an injury to a passenger on the car of a common carrier casts upon the common carrier the burden of proving that the injury was occasioned by inevitable casualty or some other cause which human care and foresight could not prevent, or by the contributory negligence of the passenger, unless the proof on the part of the passenger tends to show that the injury was occasioned by the contributory negligence of the passenger, or by inevitable casualty, or some other cause, which human care and foresight could not prevent. A consideration of Steele v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 168 Cal. 375, 143 Pac. 718, will establish the inapplicability and the injury of this instruction. * * * Froeming v. Stockton Elec. R. R. Co., 171 Cal. 401, 153 Pac. 712, is relied on by respondent as authority for the giving of this instruction under these circumstances. It is true that this instruction was there given. It is also true that this court declared that the jury was ably and painstakingly instructed, but no objection was made to the giving of this instruction, and under familiar principles the court's general approval of the instructions was not a specific approval of an instruction not criticized. The injury worked by this instruction is most apparent. It directed the jury in its deliberations by telling them that as matter of law, notwithstanding the place of added peril which the plaintiff had voluntarily assumed, a legal presumption of negligence arose against the defendant by virtue of the fact that he sustained injury."

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

1. CARRIERS 🔑314(1) — PERSONAL INJURY—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT.

An amended complaint, alleging that plaintiff was a passenger for hire on defendant's street car; that while it was rounding a curve, at a speed of 20 miles and more per hour, he was thrown from the car, and alleging negligence in respect to excessive speed and failure to provide straps for passengers; and that as the car ran on to the curve it gave a sudden and violent jerk by which he was thrown from the car and injured—stated a cause of action.

2. CARRIERS 🔑320(19)—PERSONAL INJURY—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In such case held, on the evidence, that defendant's negligence was for the jury.

3. CARRIERS 🔑347(7) — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In such case plaintiff's contributory negligence in not guarding himself from being thrown from car held, on the evidence, a question for the jury.

4. DAMAGES 216(8) — PERSONAL INJURY—FUTURE SUFFERING AND LOSS OF EARNING POWER.

In such case an instruction to consider the extent of plaintiff's injury, the pain and suffering he had undergone by reason of the injury resulting from defendant's negligence, and any future pain and suffering traceable to and resulting from the injury and to consider the loss of time and earning power resulting from the injury, and any future loss resulting from the injury, correctly stated the elements of damages and those permissible under Civ. Code, § 3283.

5. TRIAL 🔑260(1) — REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTIONS—GIVEN INSTRUCTIONS.

The refusal of instructions is not error, where the subject-matter was sufficiently covered by the instructions given.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Arnold Gumpel against the San Diego Electric Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Read & Dilworth and Titus & Davin, of San Diego, for appellant. James E. O'Keefe and C. H. Van Winkle, both of San Diego, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial, in an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff through being thrown from a street car of the defendant while it was rounding a curve at the corner of First and Spruce streets in the city of San Diego.

[1] The appellant assails the plaintiff's amended complaint as not stating a cause of action. The plaintiff in his said complaint, after averring that he was a passenger for hire upon the defendant's car, goes on to allege that the said car "proceeded in a northerly direction on its said street car line, and at that certain point on the corner of First and Spruce streets, while said car was rounding said curve, and while the same was traveling at a rate of speed of 20 miles per hour or thereabouts, plaintiff was thrown from said car and injured as hereinafter set forth." The plaintiff then proceeds to allege:

> "That the said defendant company was negligent in the premises, in this: * * * (b) In rounding said curve at an excessive rate of speed, to wit, 20 miles per hour or thereabouts; (c) in its failure to provide straps or other facilities for passengers standing to hold on to. * * * That by reason of the negligence aforesaid plaintiff was thrown from said car, as hereinbefore alleged, and struck the ground with great force, and by reason thereof, and by reason of said negligence, received a severe injury," etc.

At the trial the plaintiff further amended his complaint by alleging that as the car ran onto the curve "it gave a sudden and violent jerk, by reason of which and at which time plaintiff was thrown from said car and injured." We are of the opinion that the complaint as thus amended sufficiently stated a cause of action.

[2] The appellant next contends that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, in that it fails to show that the accident was the result of any negligence on the part of defendant company. The plaintiff himself testified in relation to the accident that he had boarded defendant's car at the corner of B and Third streets at some time after 11 o'clock on the night of his injury. It had been raining. The car was very crowded. Persons were standing on the front and rear platforms and on the steps of the car. He gained standing room on the rear platform, and, as some of the passengers got off, was able to step over to the door of the car, but could not get inside because of its crowded condition. He was standing leaning against the door when the car came down the steep hill above the curve going very fast, about 20 miles an hour. He had a package under his right arm, and was trying to get hold of the piece that runs down from the roof to the floor. The car made a terrible jerk at the curve and threw him off. The plaintiff also testified that he had been accustomed to ride on this car along this portion of its route, and knew that the hill and curve were there. There was other testimony supporting plaintiff, to the effect that the car was going at a more rapid rate of speed than usual as it approached the curve. There was also evidence on the part of the defendant, contradicting that of the plaintiff as to the rate of speed of the car and as to a jerk at the curve, which it is not necessary to recite in detail, for it is evident that there was sufficient evidence presented in support of the plaintiff's case to make it a proper case for the jury, upon the authority of Babcock v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 128 Cal. 173, 60 Pac. 780, and Graff v. United Railroads, 172 Pac. 603.

[3] It is next contended by the appellant that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, in not taking proper precautions to guard himself from the danger of falling or being thrown from the car as it approached a curve, the existence of which he knew, and at a rate of speed of which he was aware. Appellant cites numerous cases from this and other jurisdictions which it claims supports this position. But upon this point also the most recent and approved decisions of this court are to the effect that under like circumstances to those disclosed in the case at bar the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence is one which should properly be submitted to the jury. The most recent utterance of this court upon the subject, citing and sustaining earlier cases, is that of Graff v. United Railroads, supra.

[4] The appellant further urges that the court erred in giving the following instructions:

> "In fixing the compensation you take into account, if you find that he, by reason of the negligence of the defendant, had been injured, then you take into account the extent of his injuries, and whatever pain and suffering, either physical or mental, he has undergone by reason of that injury, resulting from the negligence of the defendant, and what pain and suffering he will yet undergo which can be traced and is the result of that injury.
> "You also take into account his loss of time, that is, his inability to earn money, which has resulted from the injury which he received by the negligence of the defendant, whatever loss of time, loss of ability to earn money, has resulted up to this time, and whatever loss of time or loss of ability to earn money will result in the future, and which can be traced by you to the result of this injury, and due to the negligence of the defendant."

It is the appellant's contention that these instructions violate the rule laid down in the case of Melone v. Sierra Railway Co., 151 Cal. 117, 91 Pac. 522, in that they permit the jury to speculate upon the future pain and suffering of the plaintiff, and also as to his loss of time and ability to earn money, and do not confine these elements of damage to that detriment which would be certain to result from the plaintiff's injury. The difference between the instructions which were the subject of the court's criticism in the Melone Case and those above quoted is clear upon a comparison of the two sets of instructions. In the Melone Case the instructions as to the plaintiff's future injuries were phrased in the subjunctive, and it was in this that their vice consisted; while in the case at bar the court instructed the jury that, in estimating the compensation which the plaintiff could recover as a result of his injuries, it could take into account "what pain and suffering he will yet undergo, which can be traced and is the result of that injury"; and, as to the plaintiff's future loss of time and of ability to earn money, the court confined the jury to that "which can be traced by you to the result of this injury and due to the negligence of the defendant." These are, in effect, instructions to the jury that the plaintiff was to be limited in his right to recovery as to these elements of damage to such damages as it was reasonably certain he would suffer in the future, and they are thus within the rule declared to be the correct rule for the admeasurement of such elements of damage in the Melone Case, and to such as are permissible under section 3283 of the Civil Code.

[5] The appellant finally contends that the court erred in its refusal to give certain instructions requested by the defendant and dealing with particular phases of the evidence in the case. It is not necessary to set forth in detail these instructions nor refer to the argument or authorities cited by the appellant in their support, for the reason that the court, after a careful examination of the whole body of instructions given by the trial court, is of the opinion that they sufficiently cover the points emphasized by the defendant in its suggested instructions, and that, upon the whole, the jury were fully and fairly instructed as to the rules of law by which they were to be governed in arriving at their verdict; and hence that there was no error committed in refusing to give the instructions requested by the defendant.

Judgment and order affirmed.

LEVI v. CHESLEY. (L. A. 4178.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⟹1011(1)—REVIEW — FINDINGS ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

The Supreme Court will not disturb the findings of the trial court when the evidence is in substantial conflict.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Edgar B. Levi, as receiver, against James A. Chesley. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Judgment modified, and trial court directed to modify its finding and judgment in accordance with the views expressed.

Hoff & Chatterson, of San Diego, for appellant. Riley & Heskett, of San Diego, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal by the plaintiff in the action to recover possession of personal property in which judgment went for the defendant, and a motion for a new trial was denied. The facts of the case were these: One Paul E. Lavoice, who was a tenant upon the ranch of the defendant Chesley, purchased from one Adolph Levi 30 cows, giving a mortgage to secure the purchase price of said cows upon them, and also upon some 43 other head of cows upon said ranch, and of which he was as such tenant of Chesley in possession, but which in fact belonged to the defendant. Not long after this transaction the defendant Chesley discovered that his tenant Lavoice was disposing of the cattle upon his ranch, and he accordingly ousted him from it, and obtained his conviction and incarceration in the state prison. Subsequently, upon foreclosure of the mortgage, the plaintiff, Edgar B. Levi, was appointed receiver, and as such commenced this action against the defendant Chesley, for the alleged conversion of 21 of the 30 cows for the purchase price of which the said mortgage was given. The defendant denied having possession of or having converted said cattle, except that he admitted being in possession of one of said cows which he had offered to deliver to the plaintiff prior to the institution of the action and still stood ready to deliver. Upon the trial of the cause the evidence was conflicting as to the identity of the cows, for the conversion of which the plaintiff sought to recover, with the exception of the one cow which the defendant conceded and the court awarded to the plaintiff, and with the exception also of one other cow which the plaintiff, we think, sufficiently showed to have been one of those included in the mortgage.

[1, 2] The only points which the appellant presents upon appeal relate to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court. Under the well-established rule, this court will not disturb the findings of the trial court when the evidence is in substantial conflict. This disposes of every question in the case except as to the right of plaintiff to the possession or value of the one red Durham cow, which, we think, the proofs sufficiently showed plaintiff to be also entitled.

The judgment will therefore be modified so as to award this additional cow to the appellant, or its value, which the trial court determined to be the sum of $100; and, the respondent having in his brief suggested and consented to such modification, the trial court is hereby directed to modify its finding and judgment in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion, each of the parties to this appeal to pay his own costs.

It is so ordered.

RUSHTON v. REEVE et al. (L. A. 4234.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE 🔑162(1)—JUDGMENT—ENFORCEMENT PENDING APPEAL.

Where an appeal is taken from a justice's judgment to the superior court on questions of law alone, and no stay bond is filed, it is competent for the justice, even before disposal of the appeal, to proceed to enforce the judgment by execution.

2. PLEADING 🔑8(3)—CONCLUSION OF LAW—CHARACTER OF APPEAL.

In an action to enjoin defendants from enforcing a justice's judgment against plaintiff, the complaint, alleging that at time of issuance of the execution complained of the judgment of the justice "had been fully vacated, voided, and set aside," plaintiff having taken an appeal from the judgment to the superior court, which, on motion, dismissed the appeal, and ordered all the papers returned to the justice, did not allege, as matter of fact, that the appeal was taken on questions of law and fact, which would have avoided the judgment, the allegation being a mere conclusion.

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE 🔑135(4)—EXECUTION—INJUNCTION.

Where the superior court had jurisdiction of an appeal from a justice's judgment, and had power to dismiss it and make the necessary orders to dispose of it on the ground that it had not been duly perfected, its judgment, dismissing the appeal, is conclusive in an action to enjoin enforcement of the justice's judgment on ground that dismissal was erroneous and execution could not be issued by the justice court.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by Julia E. Rushton against Sidney N. Reeve, Charles R. Thomas, E. R. Parmelee, and George H. Kelch. From judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a preliminary injunction, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Oliver O. Clark and George M. Pierson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. George H. Kelch, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The complaint in this case purports to state a cause of action to enjoin the defendants from enforcing a judgment alleged to have been rendered in July, 1914, for the defendant Kelch against the plaintiff. The court below sustained demurrers to the complaint, and thereupon gave judgment for the defendants. A preliminary injunction had been issued upon the filing of the complaint, and the court, also prior to rendering the judgment, made an order dissolving such preliminary injunction. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from the order denying the preliminary injunction.

It appears that Kelch recovered judgment in the court of Sidney N. Reeve, then a justice of the peace of Los Angeles township, against the plaintiff Julia E. Rushton and others; that Julia E. Rushton took an appeal from said judgment to the superior court of the county; that thereafter the superior court on motion of Kelch, the plaintiff in said judgment, dismissed said appeal, and ordered all the papers to be returned to the justice's court, and thereupon the justice proceeded to issue an execution upon said judgment.

[1, 2] The complaint does not state whether the appeal was taken on questions of law alone or on questions of law and fact. There are decisions of this court to the effect that when an appeal is taken on questions of law and fact, and before its final disposition in the superior court the judgment stands vacated, and that during that period no execution upon such judgment can be allowed. Bullard v. McArdle, 98 Cal. 359, 33 Pac. 193, 35 Am. St. Rep. 176. We have no decisions, however, which purport to declare that where an appeal is taken upon questions of law alone and no stay bond is filed, it is not competent for the court below, even before the disposal of the appeal, to proceed to enforce the judgment by execution, and unquestionably the court has power to do so. If the appellant contends that after the disposal of the appeal on questions of law and fact, and after upon a dismissal thereof in the superior court, the judgment of the justice's court cannot be enforced by execution, and that the same stands vacated, the complaint is fatally defective in not alleging that the appeal in controversy was taken on questions of law and fact. There is an allegation that at the time of the issuance of the execution complained of the judgment of the justice "had been fully vacated, avoided and set aside." The context shows, however, that this is a mere conclusion of law. It cannot be taken as an allegation of fact, or as sufficient to supply the omission to allege that the appeal was taken on questions of law and fact. This omission was sufficient to uphold the order sustaining the demurrer.

[3] With respect to the dissolution of the restraining order the facts stated in the answer are proper for consideration. It is there shown that Kelch, the plaintiff in the justice's court, moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that it had not been perfected by the necessary proceedings on behalf of the said appellant, and that this motion was sustained by the superior court, and that an order was made therein that the said appeal be dismissed, that the clerk of the superior court forthwith transmit the papers in the action to the justice of the peace, and that said justice proceed to enforce the collection thereof. The superior court had jurisdiction of the appeal, and had power to dismiss it and make the necessary orders to dispose of it on the ground that it had not been duly perfected. This judgment is conclusive upon collateral attack, and is sufficient to dispose of the application for the injunction. It justifies the order dissolving the preliminary injunction.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

ACKERMAN v. SCHULTZ et al.

1. Appeal and Error 🔑345(1) — Time for Appeal—Statute.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 939, before its amendment in 1915, providing appeal may be taken from any judgment or order of a superior court within 60 days from entry, where judgment was entered January 27, 1914, appeal therefrom, dated, served, and filed January 20, 1915, was taken too late; pendency of proceedings on motion for new trial not extending the time.

2. Stipulations 🔑18(3)—Preclusion from Raising Question—Stipulation.

In a suit on claim and delivery, defendant, who entered into a written stipulation with the other parties whereby he acknowledged due service upon him of the summons in the cross-complaint, together with a copy, waived the right to demur to the cross-complaint, and agreed that his answer to the amended complaint might be deemed an answer to the cross-complaint, is precluded from raising the question whether a cross-complaint, in an action on claim and delivery, is improper.

3. Replevin 🔑72—Warranty—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In an action on claim and delivery, evidence held to justify a finding that defendant and his cross-defendants, as an inducement to the cross-complainant to purchase the automobile in which defendant falsely claimed an interest, agreed that if cross-complainant would purchase the car they would warrant and defend the title.

4. Fraudulent Conveyances 🔑179(1) — Right to Invoke Statute.

In an action on claim and delivery involving an automobile sold, where a third person, who originally sold the car to plaintiff, was not a party, a defendant, not being one of his creditors, could not invoke Civ. Code, § 3440, as to transfers of personalty presumptively fraudulent, by objecting that plaintiff was not shown to have ever had possession of the car.

5. Replevin 🔑84—Fraud—Award for Repairs.

Where, after transfer of possession, and before discovery of the fraud worked upon him, the buyer of an automobile expended or became indebted in a certain amount for repairs on the car, he was properly awarded judgment for the sum in an action of claim and delivery, wherein he was made defendant and cross-complained against his vendor.

6. Appeal and Error 🔑1151(2) — Support by Pleadings—Modification.

A sum awarded by the judgment on a cross-complaint for a particular item should agree with the allegations and prayer of the cross-complaint, and judgment will be modified to that extent.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Charles M. Ackerman against Cleveland Schultz, W. J. Hittson, and Bert T. Demmitt and others. From a judgment against him on the cross-complaint of defendant Demmitt, and from order denying his motion for new trial, defendant Schultz appeals. Judgment as modified affirmed, and order denying motion for new trial affirmed.

Cleveland Schultz, of Los Angeles, in pro. per. Andrew J. Copp, Jr., Charles Ackerman, Clyde E. Cate, and W. J. Hittson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Cleveland Schultz sought to appeal from a judgment against him on the cross-complaint of Bert T. Demmitt, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Respondent says that the appeal from the judgment was taken too late. Judgment was entered January 27, 1914. Appeal therefrom was dated, served, and filed January 20, 1915. Under section 939, Code of Civil Procedure, before its amendment in 1915, this was too late, as the pendency of the proceedings on motion for new trial did not extend the time for appeal from the judgment. We are therefore limited to a consideration of the appeal from the order denying the motion of appellant for a new trial, and that, too, upon a record which does not contain a copy of the original complaint of Ackerman. The judgment and findings upon the cross-complaint, however, refer to Ackerman's suit as one on claim and delivery, and appellant insists that there may be no cross-complaint in such an action. To support this contention certain authorities from other states are cited which refer to counterclaims and not to cross-complaints. One Californian case is referred to, and in the opinion in that case (Lovensohn v. Ward, 45 Cal. 8) it was merely held that the subject-matter of litigation in replevin being the property mentioned in the complaint, defendant may not in his answer allege that plaintiff has taken from him other property and ask for its return. In this case the cross-complaint dealt with the very property in suit and appellant's conduct in relation to it. This is in accordance with section 442, Code of Civil Procedure.

[2] In any view of the matter appellant is precluded from raising the question, because he entered into a written stipulation with the other parties to the litigation by which he acknowledged due service upon him of the summons in the cross-complaint, together with a copy thereof, waived his right to demur to the cross-complaint, and agreed that his answer to the amended complaint of Ackerman might be deemed an answer to the cross-complaint.

[3] The court found Schultz guilty of fraud. Among the findings is one to the effect that he and his cross-defendants, as an inducement to the cross-complainant to purchase the automobile in which Schultz falsely claimed an interest, covenanted and agreed that if Demmitt would purchase the car, they would warrant and defend the title to said property. This finding is attacked upon the ground that the bill of sale given to respondent Demmitt was signed by Bruce Masse alone. But there was other testimony to the effect that Schultz said he was the owner of the property, and that the automobile was free and clear of all incumbrances. There were also other circumstances in proof tending to support the finding. It was thoroughly justified by the evidence.

Appellant also objects to the finding that joins his name with that of Masse in making "a purported transfer of title" because the bill of sale was not signed by him. However, he did assert title in himself, and the mere fact that record title did not purport to come from him did not relieve him of responsibility for his instrumentality in aiding in the purported transfer of title.

[4] Another finding was to the effect that the representations of appellant to respondent that the automobile was free and clear of all incumbrances were knowingly false, and were made with intent to deceive the respondent. The attack upon this finding is that Ackerman was not shown to have ever had possession of the chattel, and that therefore its purchase by him from one Van Tongel was fraudulent and void under section 3440 of the Civil Code. This contention is without merit. Van Tongel is not a party to this action, and appellant, not being one of his creditors, is not in a position to invoke that statute. Moreover, Ackerman testified that he did take possession of the property on the date of the execution of the bill of sale. This finding is also attacked on the ground that respondent employed an attorney to investigate the records to discover if any liens against the property existed, and that therefore he did not rely on the false representations. The obvious answer to this is that appellant's fraud, as found by the court, was not limited alone to false pretenses as to title.

[5] After transfer of possession and before discovery of the fraud the respondent, as the court found, expended or became indebted for a certain amount for repairs on the motorcar. Judgment for this sum was properly awarded.

[6] In the prayer of the cross-complaint judgment is asked for punitive damages in a named sum and $574.99, together with interest from December 28, 1912. This latter sum is made up of the two amounts, $275 alleged to have been paid cross-defendants for the automobile, and $299.99 expended by way of repairs. In the judgment as given the sum of $303 is awarded as the amount expended for repairs, making, when added to the $275, a total of $578. This should be reduced to agree with the allegations and prayer of the cross-complaint; and it is ordered that the judgment be modified to that extent.

The judgment as modified must be affirmed; and it is so ordered. The order denying appellant's motion for a new trial is affirmed.

LICENSES 🔑7(6)—DISCRIMINATION—LICENSING BUSINESSES.

Provisions of a city ordinance for the licensing of certain businesses, imposing a fee of $60 a year on every person selling or contracting to sell certain articles, but excepting persons having regularly licensed places of business in the city, were void as an attempted protective tariff for the benefit of businesses located in the city.

Original application of George Hart for writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner discharged from custody.

Hutton, Fogel & Coffin, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Charles W. Lyon, City Atty., and Fredericks & Hanna, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. The petitioner operates a mercantile business at an establishment within the city of Santa Monica and sells his commodities in the contiguous city of Venice; sales and deliveries being made by him after the manner which is employed by dealers in articles of the same character, which dealers have their places of business located within the limits of Venice. An ordinance of the last-named city provides for the licensing of certain businesses and contains a section to the following effect:

> "For every person * * * selling or contracting to sell articles" of various kinds, including the commodities dealt in by the petitioner, "to persons not regularly engaged in carrying on such lines of business, whether by sample or otherwise, * * * not otherwise provided for herein, $60.00 per annum; provided that this shall not apply to persons having regularly licensed places of business, in the city of Venice, taking orders for or selling, goods handled by them in their respective business."

The petitioner was arrested and imprisoned for making sales within Venice, without having taken out the license required by the section; it being conceded that his case is "not otherwise provided for" in the ordinance. It appears that persons whose places of business are within the boundaries of Venice, and who conduct establishments similar to that of the petitioner, pay a license fee of only $12 per annum under the ordinance.

The petitioner contends that the ordinance unjustly discriminates against him in that it requires from him a license fee of $60 per year, while it exacts but $12 per year from others similarly situated, except that his place of business is without, while theirs are within, the city of Venice. He points to section 21 of article 1 of the Constitution of California, providing that no "citizen, or class of citizens" shall "be granted privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not be granted to all citizens," and to the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, section 1, to the effect that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Questions similar to the one now propounded to us have been before the courts of this state several times. The respondent claims that the ordinance now in question, so far as the provisions quoted from it are concerned, is constitutional under the decision in Ex parte Haskell, 112 Cal. 412, 44 Pac. 725, 32 L. R. A. 527. The ordinance involved in that case was an ordinance of the city of Chico, and the person imprisoned pursuant to its terms was a traveling salesman for a concern in Oakland. It was insisted that he could be required, constitutionally, to pay a higher license than that exacted from merchants selling from a fixed place of business within the municipality. The Supreme Court upheld this view in the following language:

> "The very power to license for purposes of regulation and revenue involves the right to make distinctions between different trades and between essentially different methods of conducting the same general character of business or trade. And that is all that is done here. While it may be true, as suggested by petitioner, that Haskell is, in a sense, a merchant equally with those having a fixed place of business, it is nevertheless true that the manner in which he conducts and carries on his business is so distinct from that of the merchant of the latter class as to make it essentially a different business."

The petitioner relies upon the Matter of Hines, 33 Cal. App. 45, 164 Pac. 339. In that case one who operated and maintained a laundry wagon was under imprisonment for a failure to take out a license under an ordinance of the city of Venice. He delivered laundry work in Venice from an establishment outside the corporate limits of the city, in the same manner that laundry work was delivered to the people of the city from laundries within its limits. A greater license fee was sought to be required from him for operating and maintaining his wagon than from those conducting laundry businesses within the city, for the conduct of such businesses. In the opinion in the case we said:

> "We are of the opinion that the provisions of the ordinances under which petitioner has been convicted attempt to create and enforce a discrimination not based upon differences in the nature of the business being transacted or differences in the manner of conducting the same business, or any other difference other than the mere fact of difference in destination of the goods collected and delivered by wagons collecting for laundries located outside of the city and the destination of goods collected for delivery to laundries within the city. The license provisions in question are plainly devised as a protective tariff for the benefit of laundries located in the city of Venice, or laundry wagons doing business with laundries located in the city of Venice, and apparently they have no other purpose."

We then declared the assailed provisions of the ordinance to be void. We are convinced that the provisions which are attacked of the ordinance now before us are also "devised as a protective tariff for the benefit" of businesses located in the city of Venice, and that "apparently they have no other purpose." Ordinance provisions having their origin in such a purpose cannot stand. This proceeding is ruled by the Matter of Hines, and not by Ex parte Haskell.

The petitioner is discharged from custody.

SHELL CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

1. Master and Servant 🔑405(1) — Workmen's Compensation Act—Cause of Injury—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In a workmen's compensation case, evidence held to support finding that employé's second injury, while exercising his leg by walking under direction of his surgeon, arose from a condition produced by his first injury, which broke the neck of his femur.

2. Master and Servant 🔑412—Workmen's Compensation Act—Hearsay Evidence.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 77a (St. 1913, p. 313, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1102, § 28), making hearsay evidence admissible in cases of death, where the hearsay testimony relates directly to the injury in question, on petition for writ of review against Industrial Accident Commission to review award for death of an employé, his declarations that his crutch slipped and that he fell, injuring him the second time, which second injury was the direct outcome of the first, and resulted in his death, were admissible.

3. Master and Servant 🔑417(7) — Workmen's Compensation Act — Cause of Death—Sufficiency of Evidence.

On petition for writ of review by an employer against the Industrial Accident Commission to review award for death of an employé evidence held to sustain award on point whether death was caused by operation, made necessary by second injury resulting from first received in employment.

4. Master and Servant 🔑405(1) — Workmen's Compensation Act — Degree of Proof.

The Workmen's Compensation Act does not require demonstration as to the cause of death, but only that degree of proof which produces conviction in an unprejudiced mind.

Proceedings under Workmen's Compensation Act by Catherine Fleming, individually and as guardian ad litem of John Fleming, opposed by the Shell Company of California, employer, and others. There was an award by the Industrial Accident Commission, and the employer petitions for writ of review. Petition dismissed.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Chris. M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission. Henry S. Richmond, of Coalinga, for respondent Fleming.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. Petition for writ of review by the Shell Company of California against the Industrial Accident Commission and Catherine Fleming, individually, and as guardian ad litem of John Fleming. The undisputed facts of this matter are briefly these: On July 8, 1916, the husband of the respondent Catherine Fleming, and father of John Fleming, received an injury while in the employ of the petitioner, the Shell Company of California, by which the neck of his femur was broken. He made a slow recovery, and on January 11, 1917, while exercising his leg by walking in his yard, under the special direction of his surgeon so to do, he slipped and refractured the bone at the same point. The bones never united after this second fracture except by a fibrous connection, and on April 27, 1917, the doctor decided that an open operation was necessary to readjust the bone. This was performed, and while the operation seemed to be a success, it transpired that within a few hours thereafter his stomach filled with gas and became greatly distended, his heart collapsed, and he died. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded a death benefit to the respondents, Catherine Fleming and John Fleming, and the petitioner applies to this court to have this award set aside upon the usual grounds.

The points made against the award are two: The first is that the second accident was independent of the first, and that therefore no award can be made therefor; and the second point is that Mr. Fleming died from causes not in any way connected with the original accident.

[1] We are satisfied that both points must be decided upon the facts, and that the award must be sustained, and we will briefly give our reasons for this conclusion.

The undisputed facts are as above stated; and, it appearing therefrom that Fleming at the time of his second injury was obeying his doctor's instructions to exercise his leg, that he fell and that the fibrous connection which had been established was torn loose at the point of the previous fracture are circumstances which seem to us to be conclusive to the effect that this second injury arose from a condition produced by the first injury.

Petitioner, however, contends that this is not so, and it is therefore proper to state that in addition to the circumstances above specified there was other evidence which must be satisfying to any one that the condition did arise from the condition produced by the original accident. This evidence consists of declarations of the deceased to the effect that his crutch slipped and that he fell. He made other statements of the circumstances connected with the accident, but none which, it seems to us, are inconsistent with this statement, and, even if they may be so considered, this court will not say that the Industrial Accident Commission was not correct in adopting this statement that his crutch slipped, and that he thus fell and refractured his bone.

[2] The petitioner further contends with respect to this testimony that it was hearsay, and therefore not admissible. It insists that the rule in the cases of Englebretson v. Industrial Accident Commission, 170 Cal. 793, 151 Pac. 421, and Employers' Assurance Corporation, 170 Cal. 800, 151 Pac. 423, against the same defendant, still obtains in this state; but since those cases were decided section 77a of the Workmen's Compensation Act has been amended (St. 1915, p. 1102) so as to make hearsay evidence admissible in cases of death, where the hearsay testimony relates directly to the injury in question. Petitioner contends that this statute is not broad enough to cover the present case, in that, as it claims, the evidence as to the manner of occurrence of the second accident does not directly relate to the injury which the statute seeks to compensate. We cannot concede so narrow a construction to the amendment. Its purpose was to permit hearsay evidence to be given in support of a claim in case of death, and as this second injury was the direct outcome of the first, we think the statute broad enough to cover it and to permit hearsay evidence of the manner in which it occurred to be given in this case.

[3, 4] In support of its second point, that death was caused by extraneous circumstances and not by the surgical operation, the petitioner insists that the evidence is so conflicting and inconclusive that it will not sustain the award. The facts as to the manner of Mr. Fleming's death, that is, that he was operated upon by the opening of his hip and the readjustment of its bones, and that some hours later he died from inflation of his stomach caused by an accumulation of gas pressing against the diaphragm and causing the heart to collapse, there seems no reasonable ground to dispute, but the doctors differed somewhat in their opinions as to what caused the accumulation of the gas, and whether Fleming died from the failure of a weak heart, or whether the heart collapsed as a result of the action of the gas. Dr. Gibbon, the medical adviser of the Industrial Accident Commission, gave it as his opinion that the condition stated by the attending physicians reasonably showed that death was due to the operation, and added that this opinion was not based upon possibilities, but upon the probabilities of the case. He believed that the death was caused by the condition produced by the anæsthetic, or operation, or both. He admitted that other causes might operate to cause the accumulation of gas, but, after examining the entire record, including the testimony of the other doctors, and having all the facts available before him, he stated that no other factor was disclosed by the record which might have produced the condition referred to except the anæsthetic and the surgical operation.

It is conceded that other causes may be followed by an accumulation of gas in the stomach, and also that the heart might have collapsed from natural causes, and counsel for petitioner therefore urges that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the finding upon this point. But Dr. Gibbon may be said, in the language of the Supreme Court in Santa v. Industrial Accident Commission, 165 Pac. 689, to have been "giving what on the facts before him and in the light of medical science, appeared to be the most probable explanation of the event." We can therefore see no distinction between that case and this, and, besides, the law does not require demonstration, but only that degree of proof which produces conviction in an unprejudiced mind, and surely no unprejudiced mind, reading the statements of these physicians as to the manner of this man's death, could come to any other reasonable conclusion than that Fleming died as the result of this surgical operation. The commission found in accordance with Dr. Gibbon's opinion on this point, and this finding in the state of the evidence we may not disturb.

For the reasons given, the petition is dismissed.

SAME v. FIRST SAV. BANK et al.

1. BANKS AND BANKING 🔑301(1)—JOINT ACCOUNTS—SURVIVORSHIP.

Where deceased deposited money in savings bank to joint account of himself and another, payable to their survivor, his heirs were not entitled to the moneys as against the survivor, where the intent to provide for her was clearly manifest.

2. BANKS AND BANKING 🔑301(1) — JOINT ACCOUNTS—SURVIVORSHIP.

Where deceased deposited money in savings bank to joint account of himself and another, payable to their survivor, further provision in deposit agreement that "the parties agree to become partners" therein did not affect the right of survivorship, when the contract was construed as a whole.

Appeals from Superior Court, Alameda County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Two actions by James D. Halsted and others against the Central Savings Bank, substituted for the Union Savings Bank, and Anna M. Collins, and against the First Savings Bank and Anna M. Collins. Judgment in each case adverse to plaintiffs, and they appeal. Both judgments affirmed.

O'Neill & O'Neill and Chapman & Trefethen, all of Oakland, for appellants. Harry E. Leach and Abe P. Leach, both of Oakland, for respondents.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. These two cases arose out of the deposit of certain moneys in the defendant banks by James Mandeville Halsted, deceased, in the names of himself and his foster sister and housekeeper, Anna N. Collins.

On the 8th day of March, 1913, the deceased deposited with the Union Savings Bank the sum of $12,915.87, and at the time signed with Mrs. Collins an agreement relating to this deposit which in substance provided that all moneys then on deposit or at any time thereafter to be deposited by either of them to the credit of this account were to be received by the bank on condition that the amounts thereof and all dividends thereon should be paid by the bank to the depositors, or either of them, or to the survivor of them, or to the personal representatives or assigns of such survivor, without reference to the original ownership of the moneys. This deposit was made in the names of James M. Halsted and Mrs. Anna Collins. Halsted at the time of making this deposit was in perfect health. He told Mrs. Collins, as she testified in response to questions by appellants' attorney, that this money was for her; that he wanted her to have it just as soon as anything happened to him; that he gave it to her, and it further appeared that what he meant by "anything happening to him" was his death. Of another witness, Mr. Furniss, he asked whether, in the event of his making a joint account in the bank, there would be any question about Mrs. Collins getting the money if anything should happen to him, and Mr. Furniss replied that there was no question about it. He told the witness De Pue that he had just been down to the bank and turned over or transferred a book carrying a $10,000 deposit to Mrs. Collins, and he added, "Now, if anything happens to me Anna is provided for."

The deceased suffered a paralytic stroke in the month of March, 1911, and died on the 25th day of October, 1914. There seems to have been no change in the account until the day previous to his death, when Mrs. Collins transferred the account to her own name.

The court found that the claim to these funds made by the plaintiffs, as executors of Mr. Halsted's will, was without foundation and invalid; that the estate of the deceased had no interest in the money, and that the same was the sole and separate property of Mrs. Collins, to the possession of which she was entitled. It was conceded at the argument that the only difference between the facts of the case against the Union Savings Bank and the companion case against the First Savings Bank is in the language of the agreement signed at the time the deposit was transferred to the account of Mr. Halsted and Mrs. Collins. In the case of the First Savings Bank this agreement authorized and directed the corporation to open an account in the names of James M. Halsted and Anna Collins, payable to either or the survivor, and by this instrument the two persons named agreed with each other to become and be partners in the ownership of the moneys and of all interest thereon and all other moneys to be deposited to said account; and they agreed with each other that either and each of them and the survivor of them might at any and all times draw and receive from the bank the whole or any part of the money, and empowered each to sign their respective names to any receipt, check, or voucher for the money so drawn.

[1] The deceased was a man of few words apparently, and he said little at the time of making these changes in the deposits of his funds; but, as was said in Booth v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 122 Cal. 19, 54 Pac. 370, there can be no doubt of the intention of Mr. Halsted in this matter, and that intention should be carried out if the law will permit it. We do not deem it necessary to discuss the writings made for the purpose of giving a particular character to these deposits, or the facts of these cases at length. The facts showing an intention on the part of Mr. Halsted to create a trust in favor of Mrs. Collins in these funds are far stronger than were the facts in the case of Booth v. Oakland Bank of Savings, supra; and the findings of the court and the evidence supporting them bring the cases clearly within the ruling in that case, and also within the rule of the following cases: Estate of Harris, 169 Cal. 725, 147 Pac. 967; McCarthy v. Holland, 30 Cal. App. 495, 158 Pac. 1045; McDougald v. Boyd, 172 Cal. 753, 159 Pac. 168; Waters v. Nevis, 31 Cal. App. 511, 160 Pac. 1081; and numerous other cases which have been decided by the Supreme Court and by this court in which similar instruments have been construed.

[2] The expression that "the parties agree to become partners" in the case of the First Savings Bank account, when this agreement is held "by its four corners" and read and construed as a whole, does not change its meaning from that given it by the trial court. The intention is plainly the same as in the case of the Union Savings Bank, and we are not disposed to split hairs over definitions of words, but to hold that the intention so plainly indicated by all the acts and words of Mr. Halsted shall be carried out.

The judgment is affirmed in each of the cases above entitled.

HALSTED et al. v. OAKLAND BANK OF SAVINGS et al.

SAME v. CENTRAL SAV. BANK et al.

Appeals from Superior Court, Alameda County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Actions by James D. Halsted and others against the Oakland Bank of Savings and another, and by James D. Halsted and others against the Central Savings Bank and another. From the judgments rendered, plaintiffs in each case appeal. Judgment in each case affirmed.

O'Neill & O'Neill and Chapman & Trefethen, all of Oakland, for appellants. Harry E. Leach and Abe P. Leach, both of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The facts of these two cases are such as to present the same question that we have this day decided in James D. Halsted et al. v. Central Savings Bank, 172 Pac. 613, numbered in this court No. 2302. In all the cases the plaintiffs, as executors of the last will of James M. Halsted, deceased, are seeking to establish an interest in certain savings bank deposits belonging to the deceased in his lifetime, but in which he had created an interest in favor of Anna N. Collins amounting upon his death to absolute and sole ownership.

Upon the authority of the above-mentioned case of Halsted et al. v. Central Savings Bank, No. 2302, the judgment in each of these cases is affirmed.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA IRON & STEEL CO. v. MAIER. (Civ. 2115.)

PLEADING 🔑380—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In action on a corporation debt against a stockholder, where upon the allegations of the complaint as they stood admitted there was no issue as to the number of shares the corporation had outstanding when the debt was incurred, plaintiff was not entitled to raise such issue by introducing evidence contradicting the allegations of the complaint as to the number of shares.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by the Southern California Iron & Steel Company against Edward R. Maier. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. L. Abrahams, of Los Angeles, for appellant. A. P. Michael Narlian and N. B. Nelson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant appeals from a judgment entered against him in the sum of $171.40 as a stockholder in Maier Pier Company, a corporation, on account of a contract whereby merchandise was sold to that corporation at the agreed price of $857.04.

There is only a typewritten transcript of the record. The quotations from pleadings and from evidence, as printed in the briefs, are less complete than they should have been. But by piecing together a scrap found in one brief with other scraps found here and there in the other briefs, together with positive admissions of fact by counsel, we find enough, although barely enough, material for a decision on the merits. It is a dangerous practice for attorneys in preparing their briefs to neglect the provisions of section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure. We have referred to this matter in many recent decisions.

It was alleged in the complaint "that at the time said debts were contracted, the total number of shares of the capital stock of said corporation, Maier Pier Company, issued, subscribed and outstanding, was 77,941 shares." Without denying this allegation, the defendant denied that at the time mentioned he was a shareholder in the corporation, and alleged that at that time he had no stock therein. Nevertheless the court, in finding No. 6, declared:

> "That at the time said contract was made said defendant Edward R. Maier was the owner of 1 share of stock, and that the total number of shares of stock subscribed for at that time was 5."

If appellant is right in his contention that finding No. 6 is unsupported by any evidence, the judgment must be reversed. Counsel for respondent contend that the pleadings were amended at the trial in such a manner as to eliminate the above-stated allegation as to total number of shares of stock outstanding at the time in question and to substitute an allegation conforming to finding No. 6. It seems to be true, according to a quotation from the transcript as made by them, that the court allowed the parties to amend their pleadings to conform "to the facts and proof in the matter." But the more complete quotation given by counsel for appellant limits the amendment made at the trial to the following:

> "That the plaintiff amends and alleges the contract to have been made on August 14th, and that the answer is amended to show that the defendant alleges that he had no stock on that date."

Counsel for respondent do not suggest that any proof was made on the subject before us, except that they introduced in evidence the articles of incorporation of Maier Pier Company, executed eight days before the making of the corporation's contract with the plaintiff, with the statement made by counsel that, as shown by those articles, 5 shares of the stock of the corporation were subscribed, of which the defendant Maier subscribed for 1 share. They admit, however, that these articles "were not copied into the record by the reporter, but this no doubt was through an oversight on his part." There has been no suggestion of diminution of the record, and it does not appear that respondent made any effort to have the record completed so as to have presented before this court this evidence which is vital to his case. However, we are of the opinion that upon the allegations of the complaint, as they stood admitted by the defendant, there was no issue upon the subject of number of shares of the corporation then outstanding. The plaintiff was not entitled to raise such an issue by introducing evidence, to which defendant duly objected, contradicting the allegations contained in its own complaint.

The judgment is reversed.

Ex parte CORREA. (Cr. 599.)

OBSCENITY 🔑11—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Pen. Code, § 311, providing that every person who willfully and lewdly exposes his person or the private parts thereof in any public place, or in any place where there are present other persons to be offended or annoyed, is guilty of a misdemeanor, a complaint charging that defendant at the time and place named did "willfully and unlawfully expose his person," etc., was insufficient, in that it did not allege that the acts were done "lewdly."

In the matter of the application of Jose Correa for a writ of habeas corpus. Granted, and applicant ordered discharged from custody.

N. D. Meyer, of Santa Ana, for petitioner. L. A. West, Dist. Atty., and Arthur E. Koepsel, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Santa Ana, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Habeas corpus. Jose Correa is in the custody of the sheriff of the county of Orange under a commitment issued out of the justice's court of Anaheim township, Orange county. In that court Correa was convicted of an alleged misdemeanor pursuant to a complaint which charged that the defendant at the time and place named did "willfully and unlawfully expose his person," etc. It is admitted that by the complaint it was attempted to charge the offense described in section 311 of the Penal Code. That section, so far as applicable to this case, is as follows:

> "Every person who willfully and lewdly, either: One. Exposes his person, or the private parts thereof, in any public place, or in any place where there are present other persons to be offended or annoyed thereby; * * * is guilty of a misdemeanor."

It is manifest, upon an inspection of the complaint, that it failed to charge the offense described in the statute. It was not alleged that the acts described were done "lewdly," nor were any words of equivalent meaning used in the complaint. An essential element of the crime being thus omitted, the complaint did not state a public offense.

It is ordered that the prisoner, the said Jose Correa, be discharged from custody.

JOHNSTON v. MURPHY. (Civ. 2324.)

1. Mortgages 🔑40 — What Constitutes — Form.

A letter accompanying a note, which read, "This is to certify that there is due you a sum of $4,000 secured by a lien upon certain land," when not accepted or received or treated by the recipient as a mortgage, and in the absence of showing that it was so intended by the sender, would not be considered a mortgage.

2. Equity 🔑65(2) — Clean-Hands Doctrine.

Where defendant deceived the mortgagee into giving him a deed for the land and then deeded it to his wife, he was in no position to defeat recovery on the note later given, on the ground that an instrument, not on its face a mortgage, was such in fact, and that the suit should have been for foreclosure thereof, especially where the bar of limitations could have been invoked against a later suit on the note, since unconscientious conduct, even without fraud or illegality, precludes resort to equity.

3. Evidence 🔑588—Cross-Examination—Reconciling Conflicting Statements.

Where statements of witness on cross-examination, though apparently contradicting his statements on direct examination, were capable of reconciliation therewith, it was the duty of the court to reconcile them.

4. Appeal and Error 🔑984(5)—Review—Attorney's Fees—Discretion.

In action on note empowering court to fix attorney's fees, the court has a discretion which will not be disturbed, in the absence of abuse as to the amount to be awarded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by James A. Johnston against Herman Murphy. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edward C. Harrison and Maurice E. Harrison, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Daniel O'Connell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. This is an action begun December 31, 1914, on a promissory note given by defendant to plaintiff. The principal defense is that the note was secured by a mortgage, and that the action should have been one of foreclosure.

The note was dated January 23, 1909. The alleged mortgage consists of a letter from the defendant to plaintiff, the body of which reads as follows:

> "I hereby certify that there is due to you the sum of $4,000. Said sum is secured by a lien upon that certain land comprising 937 acres in the rancho Los Positos, being the same land conveyed to me by Louis Aurrecoechea. The indebtedness is a prior claim to any lien I may have."

The letter was not acknowledged nor recorded.

The transactions between the parties of which this letter formed an incident may be stated more at large as follows: The defendant, Murphy, during or perhaps before the year 1902, acting for one Aurrecoechea, borrowed $4,000 from plaintiff, and Aurrecoechea executed a mortgage on a ranch belonging to him to secure payment of the loan. In 1904 Murphy purchased the ranch from Aurrecoechea, and on July 19, 1906, he conveyed it to his wife. This deed was not recorded until June 30, 1908. Some time in the early summer of 1908—so Johnston testified—Murphy induced him to sign what he, Johnston, supposed was a release of a part of the ranch from the lien of the Aurrecoechea mortgage, but what turned out to be a deed of the entire ranch to Murphy. This deed was not recorded until November, 1906. Johnston did not learn until January 23, 1909—the date of the note in suit—of the true character of the paper he had signed in 1906, namely, of the deed to Murphy of the whole ranch, nor that this deed released the ranch from the lien of the mortgage; nor was anything said by Murphy even at that time about the deed to Mrs. Murphy, and it appears from Johnston's evidence that although the letter which defendant now seeks to have construed to be a mortgage is dated November 1, 1906, it was actually received by Johnston through the mail and after the execution of the note in suit. It also appears that Johnston kept this letter but made no reply to it; that is to say, it does not appear that he accepted it or treated it as a mortgage.

[1, 2] Upon the facts, the defendant desires to defeat recovery on this note by claiming that the letter in question is a mortgage, and argues that if it is not as a matter of law such, it should be so construed in equity. We cannot agree with him, for the reason, among others, that it is evident that Johnston did not receive or accept or treat it as a mortgage; nor does it appear upon its face, nor from the surrounding circumstances in evidence, that Murphy ever so intended it. Counsel suggests that it is "an imperfect attempt to create a mortgage" which will be considered a mortgage in equity, but it seems to us, in view of the defendant's conduct throughout these transactions, that he is in no position to invoke the aid of equity to have this paper declared a mortgage, a result which would defeat the collection of the note in this action. And it could not be collected in a new action should the defendant plead the bar of the statute of limitations. It is quite plain from the evidence that the trial court decided that Murphy had deceived Johnston into releasing the Aurrecoechea mortgage in full, and that the latter was not undeceived until after the note sued on here was executed. At that time Murphy's mortgage would have been of no value, for Mrs. Murphy owned the property, and Murphy refused to let her even sign the note. Upon these facts Murphy cannot be permitted to call upon a court of equity and conscience to indirectly relieve him from the payment of a just debt by holding this mere letter to be a mortgage. "It is not alone fraud or illegality which will prevent a suitor from entering a court of equity; any really unconscientious conduct connected with the controversy to which he is a party will repel him from the forum whose very foundation is good conscience." 1 Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. (3d Ed.) § 404.

[3] Defendant claims that the amount of interest included in the judgment is excessive. Without going into the computation here it is sufficient to say that we find no error in the amount allowed by the trial court under this head. The plaintiff testified clearly as to the payments, and they were not disputed. It is claimed, however, that the plaintiff contradicted this testimony on cross-examination; but his testimony on cross-examination was susceptible of reconciliation with that on direct examination, and it was accordingly the duty of the court to reconcile this testimony. This it patently did.

[4] The judgment provides for $700 attorney's fees, which defendant objects is excessive. Under the provisions of the note the duty of fixing a reasonable fee for plaintiff's attorney rested upon the trial court; and its judgment in that matter will not be disturbed unless its discretion has been abused. Berkeley, etc., v. Miller, 23 Cal. App. 315, 137 Pac. 1101. The court's discretion does not seem to have been abused in this case considering the work of counsel evidenced by the record.

Ex parte SCHWITALLA. (Cr. 597.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑238—Preliminary Examination—Probable Cause—Uncorroborated Accomplice Testimony.

The uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice may be sufficient to establish probable cause for the magistrate's action in holding accused to answer for trial, and in committing him.

2. Criminal Law 🔑238—Preliminary Examination —Uncorroborated Accomplice Testimony.

While a defendant cannot be convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, the testimony of an accomplice is sufficient to make it appear that there is a "probability" that defendant has been guilty of the offense charged.

Application by Alexis M. Schwitalla for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petition remanded.

Harry A. Chamberlin, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Thomas Lee Woolwine, Dist. Atty., and Asa Keyes, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Habeas corpus. Petitioner asks to be discharged from the custody of the sheriff of Los Angeles county to which he was heretofore committed by a magistrate. A complaint in sufficient form, charging defendant with the crime of arson, was filed before the magistrate and after examination had, at which testimony was taken, the order holding defendant to answer for trial to the superior court was made and commitment issued.

[1] One contention urged is that the evidence was insufficient to establish probable cause for the holding of the defendant. The principal evidence against the defendant was furnished by an accomplice in the alleged crime. This accomplice very fully narrated the acts which the defendant did and which were participated in by the witness, all of which showed that the fire was the result of a deliberate plan of the defendant. There was the further testimony of a witness who was not an accomplice, wherein it was shown that the defendant, some months prior to the time the building was burned, solicited the co-operation of that witness to the end that the building which was ultimately destroyed should be set fire to. We are not prepared to concede, notwithstanding the holding made by the Supreme Court of Nevada in Ex parte Oxley, 38 Nev. 379, 149 Pac. 992, that the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice may not be sufficient to establish probable cause. We think that it may be sufficient.

[2] While a defendant cannot be convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, the testimony of an accomplice is admissible and is proper to be considered, and we think is sufficient to make it appear that there is a "probability" that a defendant has been guilty of the offense charged against him. Our Supreme Court, in People v. Cokahnour, 120 Cal. 253, 52 Pac. 505, held that the unsworn written confession of a defendant, which constituted the entire evidence submitted to the committing magistrate, was sufficient to justify an order determining that probable cause existed upon which the defendant was held to answer. See, also, Ex parte Heacock, 8 Cal. App. 420, 97 Pac. 77. And we may add that, to our minds, the testimony of the independent witness who gave evidence of the plan of the defendant to burn the building several months prior to the time the fire actually occurred furnished some corroboration, slight though it was, of the testimony of the accomplice.

The writ is discharged, and petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Los Angeles county.

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑131(1) — OWNERSHIP—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In a wife's action against the sheriff for the conversion of personalty taken and sold under writ of execution pursuant to judgment rendered against her husband, the burden to prove her ownership of the property was upon plaintiff wife.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑262(1)—COMMUNITY OR SEPARATE PROPERTY—POSSESSION OF HUSBAND—PRESUMPTION—STATUTE.

Where personalty was in the possession of the husband, and treated by him as though it were community or his own separate property, from the circumstances a disputable presumption follows, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 12, that such was its character.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1064(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTION—"ACQUIRE."

In a wife's action against the sheriff for the conversion of personalty under execution pursuant to judgment against her husband, the wife claiming the property was her separate estate, the instruction that in determining the question as to who was the owner the jury had a right to consider the manner in which the property was acquired and by whom, where it was kept, how it was handled, and by whom controlled, etc., though open to criticism as lying close to the line between law and fact, and being somewhat confusing, was harmless to plaintiff, since the word "acquire" has not only the meaning of to obtain as one's own, but also the meaning of "procure," in which sense the jury may have understood it.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Acquire.]

4. TRIAL 🔑191(4)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTION OF QUESTION IN ISSUE.

Instructions that the use of the property by the husband, and his control of it, or any part of it, did not change its status from the wife's separate property, etc., and that the mere fact that the property was seemingly in the possession and apparent control of the husband did not estop the wife from claiming the stock, or deprive her of her separate property, were objectionable, as assuming the property was the separate estate of the wife, the question in issue.

5. TRIAL 🔑260(6)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—MATTERS COVERED.

Where the court instructed that certain insurance money with which the property was purchased was the wife's separate property, and that, if the money was used by her to buy some or all of the property sued for, such property also became the wife's separate property, she could not ask for more as to such feature of the case, and her proposed instruction that the deposit of the insurance money by her in bank in her own name and the name of her husband was not a gift to him, unless she intended to give, could have been of no greater benefit to her.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Minnie Jolly against Chas. J. McCoy. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John M. Fulweiler, of Auburn, and E. Ray Manwell, of Marysville, for appellant. W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for damages for conversion of certain personal property of the alleged value of $1,871. The defendant is the sheriff of the county, and he justified his taking and sale of the property under a writ of execution issued in pursuance of a judgment rendered in the superior court of said county against A. Jolly, the husband of the plaintiff herein.

The claim of appellant was and is that said property sold under said execution was her separate estate, and therefore not liable for the debts of the husband. Plaintiff, her husband, and their son all testified to facts from which the jury might legally have drawn the inference that her claim was just, and, if the verdict had been in her favor, we should have no hesitation in affirming it as amply supported. But the jury distrusted these witnesses, and it is apparent, also, that the trial judge was not convinced that they were entitled to full credit, as he denied the motion for a new trial. Since we have not had the witnesses before us, we cannot say that such attitude of the court and jury was unwarranted. Indeed, we may add that the printed record of their testimony reveals certain circumstances that tend to justify the suspicion with which their statements were undoubtedly received by the jury. These we need not stop to particularize.

[1, 2] As to the support for the verdict, unless the jury believed the story told by said witnesses, it was their duty to find for the defendant, since the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff. The peculiar province of the jury in such matters is fully considered by this court in Clark v. Tulare Lake Dredging Co., 14 Cal. App. 414, 112 Pac. 564, and in this connection it is sufficient to refer to that decision. Besides, the evidence showed that all of the property was in the possession of said A. Jolly, and treated by him as though it were community or his own separate property. From this circumstance, the presumption—disputable, it is true—would follow that such was its character. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 12.

The observation may not be out of place that fraudulent claims as to the ownership of property under similar conditions are often made, and the court or jury should scrutinize with care an asserted right, which has been quiescent until credit may have been extended on the faith that such right does not exist. No doubt such claims are sometimes genuine, and, where so established, they should be protected; but it is hardly to be expected that they will be regarded without some suspicion. We may add that, as to a portion of the property which plaintiff claims she obtained from her husband, the jury was justified in concluding that there was not an immediate delivery and continuous change of possession within the contemplation of section 3440 of the Civil Code. Upon the whole it cannot be said that the verdict of the jury lacks legal support.

[3] Another question seriously argued arises over the action of the court in reference to the instructions. Most of them are unobjectionable, however, and therein were presented quite fully the legal principles bearing upon the theory of plaintiff as well as of defendant, and the general axioms that should be regarded by the jury in every case. The following, though, is somewhat open to criticism:

> "I instruct you that, in determining the question as to who was the owner of the property claimed by plaintiff herein at the time of the levy of the writ of execution therein by the defendant, you have a right, and it is your duty, to consider the manner in which said property was acquired and by whom, where it was kept, how it was handled, and by whom controlled, whether or not it was mingled with other property admittedly belonging to the husband of plaintiff, whether or not there was anything about the use, possession, or control of said property, or anything at all about the use, possession, or control of said property, or anything at all in connection with the property, to indicate that it belonged to any other person other than the husband of plaintiff, and all the facts and circumstances bearing upon the question, as the same is made to appear to you from the evidence; and if, from the consideration of all thereof, you are not satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence that said property was the separate property of plaintiff at the date of the levy of the writ of execution, your verdict should be in favor of defendant."

The instruction lies close to the line between law and fact. It is not strictly a direction as to the weight of the evidence, but it seems rather objectionable as emphasizing certain features that were developed by the testimony in the case. No doubt, respondent in his argument to the jury, laid particular stress upon the facts suggested in the instruction, and the peculiar phraseology thereof might be seized upon by the jury as an argument in favor of the defendant. In other respects, also, the instruction is somewhat confusing. The jury was directed "to consider the manner in which said property was acquired and by whom." One meaning of the word "acquire" is to "obtain as one's own." An ultimate fact to be determined by the jury was really, "By whom was the property acquired?" The instruction, however, puts this ultimate fact upon the same footing as certain evidentiary matters, and directs the jury to consider this in connection with other facts, to determine who was the owner of the property; whereas it would seem to be true that, if they were satisfied as to who had "acquired" the property, that would be equivalent to a determination as to who was the owner. If the instruction had declared that in the determination of "who had acquired or owned the property the jury should consider the manner in which the property was obtained, where it was kept, how it was used, and whether mingled with other property of the husband," etc., there would be less ground for criticism. But it is fair to say that the word "acquired" has also the meaning of "procured," and it is not unreasonable to hold that the jury so understood it. Indeed, while we think the instruction is somewhat obscure and of doubtful propriety, the common understanding would probably accept it as a direction to consider the manner in which the property was procured and how it was used, with other circumstances disclosed by the evidence, in the determination of the ownership of the property. Besides, the other instructions were so clear and favorable to appellant that we are satisfied she suffered no prejudice in this matter.

[4] Among certain instructions requested by the plaintiff and refused by the court was the following:

> "The use of the property by the husband, and his control of the same, or any part of said personal property of the wife, did not change the status of the property from the plaintiff's separate property, or make it liable to levy and sale to pay the debt of Jolly & Son, or either of them."

This was also refused:

> "The mere fact that the property was seemingly in the possession and apparent control of the husband does not estop the wife from claiming the stock, or in any wise deprive the wife of her separate property therein."

Both instructions were objectionable in assuming that the property was the separate estate of the wife—the very question which the jury was to determine. If appellant had requested the court to instruct the jury that the mere possession, use, and control of the property by the husband was not inconsistent with the ownership of the wife, or was not sufficient to transfer title, it would probably have been given. To say that it "did not change the status of the property from the plaintiff's separate property" was, of course, to assume that it had such status. If the phrase "would not" had been used, the situation might be different.

[5] Another instruction refused was this:

> "The deposit of the insurance money by the plaintiff in the bank in her own name and in the name of the husband was not a gift to him, unless she then intended to give the same absolutely to him; and it is the intent with which that deposit was made in the bank that must appear by a preponderance of the evidence to have been to divest herself of all interest in the money and make it the money of her husband, and so long as she held the bank book, and the control of the money, it could not in law be a gift to her husband."

It appears from the evidence without any question that plaintiff had received something over $2,500 as insurance money and had deposited it as suggested in said proposed instruction. It was the claim of appellant that with this money she purchased the property in controversy here, and, to meet the possible conclusion that the money became community property by reason of the form of the deposit, the instruction was requested. The court, however, virtually instructed the jury that the money was the separate property of the wife, and also:

> "That if this money thus received by plaintiff was by her or under her instructions used to buy some or all of the personal property described in the complaint, then such personal property, thus purchased, became and was her separate property, and was not liable to levy and sale to pay the debts of her husband, A. Jolly & Son, Raphael Jolly, or that of either of them."

As a matter of law, therefore, the court instructed the jury that under the evidence this money was the separate property of the plaintiff. She could not ask for more as to this feature of the case, and the proposed instruction could have been of no greater benefit to her. Indeed, it is quite apparent that, since the court instructed the jury that this insurance money was the separate property of the wife, and, that, if she used it in the purchase of any of the property in controversy, that property was also her separate property and not liable for the debts of her husband, it left only one question for the jury to determine and that is whether she so purchased it. If they believed she did purchase it with said money, under this instruction of the court, they must have found for the plaintiff, notwithstanding any possession, use, or control by the husband. It appears clear, therefore, that no specific instruction as to a change of title by virtue of the use of the property could have been of any avail to appellant, and also that the instruction given on behalf of respondent, to which we have adverted, could only have been considered by the jury in deciding whether any of the property was actually purchased with the insurance money. It is thus to be seen how exceedingly favorable to appellant was the law presented by the court.

The question of the intention of the wife to make a gift to the community or to her husband, and the consideration of the use and control of the property, were entirely eliminated, and the jury were expressly told that, if any of the insurance money was used to purchase any of said property, they must find it to be plaintiff's separate property and not subject to execution. Respondent might have some cause to complain of this instruction, but not so the appellant. While the case is not altogether free from difficulty, we think it cannot be said that the verdict is unjust.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

TURNER v. WATKINS. (Civ. 2114.)

1. PLEADING 🔑122—ANSWER—SUFFICIENCY.

Denial in answer predicated upon a lack of information only, and not upon a lack of information and belief, is insufficient under Code Civ. Proc. § 437, providing that, if defendant has no information or belief upon the subject sufficient to enable him to answer an allegation of the complaint, he may so state in his answer, and place his denial on that ground.

2. TRIAL 🔑25(4)—OPENING AND CLOSING—AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSE — ANSWER — SUFFICIENCY.

In action for commission for furnishing one ready to exchange land, affirmative allegations in answer that the exchange was not "consummated," that defendant was at all times ready to exchange and failure was not his fault, and that the deal fell through because of misrepresentations of the broker, did not amount to a traverse of anything averred in the complaint, and where the denial was insufficient, the court properly required the defendant to go forward at the opening of the trial with his affirmative defenses.

3. BROKERS 🔑51 — EXCHANGE OF LANDS — "CONSUMMATE."

Where broker agrees to "consummate" an exchange of land within 30 days, he has done his part by bringing the parties together so that his principal could have carried through the deal in such time.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Consummate; Consummated Sale.]

4. BROKERS 🔑86(7)—EXCHANGE OF LANDS—COMMISSION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In action by broker for furnishing one ready to exchange lands, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that deal did not fall through by reason of false representations of the broker.

A. T. Roark, of San Diego, for appellant. John F. Greer and W. P. Cary, both of San Diego, for respondent.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. This is an action for the recovery of a broker's commission for an exchange of real property, under a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant's intestate, W. C. Watkins. The plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant appeals.

[1] At the opening of the trial the respondent contended that the denials of appellant's answer were insufficient to present a defense, and asked the court to rule that the appellant should go forward with his proof in support of certain affirmative defenses set up in the answer. The court ruled accordingly, and the ruling is assigned as error. The claim that the denials of the answer were insufficient was based upon the fact that they were preceded by the following statement, ending with a colon:

> "Not having sufficient information on which to base his answer, defendant denies:"

Section 437 of the Code of Civil Procedure contains this language:

> "If the defendant has no information or belief upon the subject sufficient to enable him to answer an allegation of the complaint, he may so state in his answer, and place his denial on that ground."

It will be observed that the denials in the answer in this action were predicated upon a lack of information only, and not upon a lack of information and belief. A denial in that form is insufficient; for section 437 permits a denial only upon the want of both information and belief, and not upon a want of information alone. Humphreys v. McCall, 9 Cal. 59, 62, 70 Am. Dec. 621.

[2] The appellant insists, however, that the affirmative allegations of his answer present a state of facts inconsistent with the allegations of the complaint, and that for that reason the answer amounted to a traverse of the complaint; and he accordingly contends that the respondent should have been compelled to go forward with the introduction of evidence in support of the complaint. The affirmative matter in the answer was to the effect that the exchange for the bringing about of which the respondent claimed a commission "was not consummated within the 30 days set apart for that purpose, nor during any other period of time, nor has said exchange yet been consummated by the parties to said deal," and that the failure to consummate it was not due to any fault of appellant's intestate, but that he was always "ready and anxious" to carry out the arrangement. It is also alleged that the failure to consummate the deal was occasioned by the fact that the respondent made certain misrepresentations to the parties on the other side; the misrepresentations having to do with the matter of the value of and the income derived from his principal's property. The allegation that the exchange was not consummated within 30 days arose from the fact that there was a provision in the commission contract to the effect that it was to be consummated within that time; but that allegation, as well as the allegation that it was never consummated at any time, negatived nothing in the respondent's pleading, for respondent does not contend that the deal ever went through, and it is his theory of the case that he is entitled to a commission because he brought the parties together, the other side, as he alleges, having at all times been ready, able, and willing to make the exchange. The allegation of the answer that the failure to consummate the exchange was not due to any fault of appellant's intestate, and that he was at all times desirous of carrying it out, is a plain allegation of new matter, as there was no averment upon the subject in plaintiff's pleading. The statement of the answer that the deal fell through because of misrepresentations made by the respondent is, of course, not responsive to anything in respondent's pleading. It is plain, then, that the affirmative allegations in the answer did not amount to a traverse of anything averred by respondent in his pleading.

[3] The contract upon which the action was based provides, in part, that appellant's intestate "agrees to pay E. C. Turner a commission * * * on account of above exchange; said exchange to be consummated on or before thirty days from date first above written." As already remarked, the respondent does not contend that the deal ever was completed. He claims that the commission was earned when he presented to his principal the parties on the other side, one Brown and one Anderson, and by his principal having entered into an agreement with them for the exchange, within the 30 days limited in the commission agreement, which the record shows he did. The appellant insists, however, that the deal could have been consummated, in the sense intended by the commission agreement, only by the passing of deeds between the parties, and that therefore no commission was earned. Our courts have long adhered to the rule that a broker who contracts to sell has earned his commission when he has presented to his principal one who is ready, able, and willing to buy (Phelps v. Prusch, 83 Cal. 626, 23 Pac. 1111; Purcell v. Firth [Sup.] 167 Pac. 379); and in the latter case the commission was to have been paid, under the written agreement between the parties, when the sale was "consummated." The only difference, then, between that case and this lies in the fact that in the one the broker was to be paid upon the consummation of a sale, while in the other he was to be paid upon the consummation of an exchange, which, to our minds, is, in legal effect, no difference at all. The exchange was consummated to the extent that such a result could have been brought about by the respondent. The parties principal or both sides had entered into an agreement for the exchange, and over the performance of the terms of that agreement he could exercise no control. All the services he could have performed in the premises were completely rendered, and his commission was earned.

[4] Upon the issue as to whether the failure to complete the deal between the principals was because of misrepresentations made by the respondent to Brown and Anderson, the trial court found with the respondent. The appellant contends that the finding lacks support in the evidence, but the contention is untenable. It is enough to say, without making a more detailed statement of the evidence, that: First, the respondent never had any dealings with Anderson in the matter of the proposed exchange; and, second, if it be conceded for the purpose of the argument that misrepresentation was made by the respondent to Brown, the latter testified that the statements were not ascertained to be incorrect until "after the deal was turned down."

In his opening points and authorities A. T. Roark, the counsel for the appellant, quotes language as coming from a certain reported case, but it is found only in the brief of the party unsuccessful on the appeal which is there decided; he cites two cases to a proposition of law stated within quotation marks, the language not being found in the report of the case first cited, and being stated in a dissenting opinion in the report of the second; he cites four cases to a statement within quotation marks, and the quoted language is found in none of them; he quotes from the opinion in another case, but omits from his quotation an important clause found in the opinion, and without indicating the omission in any way; he quotes certain language as being in the case last mentioned when it is not to be found in the opinion, and he later commits the same offense as to another reported case. Counsel for the respondent calls attention in his points and authorities to all these derelictions, and, in addition, specifies two or three other faults of the same character. We have not examined into these latter charges because of the length of the reports of the cases in which they are involved. In his reply points and authorities Mr. Roark has only this to say upon the subject which now interests us:

> "Respondent, after offering a great variety of criticisms to citations of law quoted by appellant bearing on the point as to what constitutes consummation of a real estate broker's contract, was charitable enough to concede that the laws of the states of Maryland and Georgia dealing with contracts of this character support appellant's contention."

The amazement with which we view the conduct of Mr. Roark in the matter of the erroneous citations and quotations in his points and authorities is heightened by the cavalier manner in which he seeks to dismiss the subject. If in fact these misquotations were no more than the result of gross carelessness, he should have admitted the facts, with an apology and a suggestion of any excuse that he might have for committing such errors. Nothing less was due to the court, which is entitled to rely upon counsel for a true statement of the language contained in quoted decisions. He has left himself in a very poor position to urge the charge made in his reply brief that opposing counsel has pursued a certain course in framing his argument, "for the purpose of confusing this court."

The judgment is affirmed.

UNWIN v. BARSTOW-SAN ANTONIO OIL CO. (Civ. 2121.)

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT 🔑75(1) — WITHDRAWAL OF ATTORNEY—NOTICE OF SUBSTITUTION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 286, requiring that when an attorney withdraws the party for whom he is acting must, before further proceedings are had against him, be required by the adverse party in writing to appoint another attorney or appear in person, does not apply when, at the time of the withdrawal, the client serves notice that he appears in person, since giving notice would then be a futile thing.

2. COSTS 🔑203—TAXATION—KEEPER'S FEES.

Since, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1033, 1035, costs cannot be determined until disposition of pending motion to tax, an order just prior to denial of a motion to tax, fixing keeper's fees in favor of the sheriff, as permitted by Pol. Code, § 4300b, was in time, and such item was properly included in the cost bill.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by B. V. Unwin against the Barstow-San Antonio Oil Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying defendant's motion to tax costs, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Fred A. Wilson, of San Bernardino, for appellant. C. C. Haskell and John A. Hadaller both of San Bernardino, for respondent.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. This cause is before us on two appeals by the defendant; one being from the judgment, and the other from an order denying the defendant's motion to tax the costs in the action.

There is but one point presented on the appeal from the judgment. The first appearance of appellant in the action was by a demurrer to the complaint, filed in its behalf by an attorney at law. In the due course of procedure in the action the demurrer was overruled and time was allowed to answer. On a certain day thereafter the appellant served and filed a notice to the effect that its attorney had withdrawn from the case. The notice was attached to a document signed by the appellant and by its retiring attorney, which stated that it was "stipulated and agreed" between them that the attorney "may, and he does hereby, withdraw from said action as attorney for said defendant therein, and that the said defendant may, and it does hereby, appear in said action in person and without attorney." In addition to its appearance, thus formally entered by the appellant in person, it did, on the same day, serve and file its answer in the action, signed by itself by its resident agent. Thereafter the respondent caused the case to be set down for trial. Upon the date set, the appellant having employed new counsel in the interim, it was objected by him that the court had no jurisdiction to proceed with the trial on the ground that respondent had not complied with the provisions of section 286 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides:

> "When an attorney dies, or is removed or suspended, or ceases to act as such, a party to an action, for whom he was acting as attorney, must, before any further proceedings are had against him be required by the adverse party, by written notice, to appoint another attorney, or to appear in person."

[1] The court overruled the objection, and it is complained that the ruling was erroneous. The contention cannot be sustained. The only object of the notice contemplated by the statute is to require of a party whose attorney has ceased to act that he appoint a new attorney or appear in the action in person. In this case the appellant had voluntarily appeared in person on the same day that respondent had notice that the attorney had ceased to act. It would be useless, in any situation, and speaking generally, to require one to do a thing which he had already done. The statute, in this instance, does not require the commission of such an act of folly.

[2] On the appeal from the order the question which is presented has to do with the taxing, as costs, of an item of keeper's fees under an attachment. Section 4300b of the Political Code provides that there shall be allowed the sheriff, as keeper's fees, "such sum as the court may fix." The respondent served and filed his cost bill, and in it he included a certain sum for keeper's fees. The appellant made its motion to tax the costs specified in the cost bill by striking out the sum charged for keeper's fees on the grounds that the item was not legally chargeable as costs, that it was not necessarily incurred, that it had not been legally fixed as required by law, and that it was prematurely charged and included as costs. On the day that the motion to tax came on for hearing, the court made an order fixing the amount charged in the cost bill for keeper's fees as a proper sum to be charged for the service rendered. The court then made its order denying appellant's motion to tax.

Appellant contends that the item was not properly included in the cost bill for the reason that the order of the court fixing it as a proper charge was not made before the cost bill was filed. No authorities are cited which support this contention, although several decided cases are presented which are to the effect that keeper's fees are not recoverable as costs where there is an entire absence of such an order as was here made on the day the motion to tax was passed on. These cases are in no way helpful in the solution of the question now presented, and we are unable to see why, in such a case, the order need be made earlier than it was made in the present instance. The amount in question had no standing as an item of chargeable costs, even though it appeared in the cost bill, until the order was made disposing of appellant's motion to tax, for the costs in an action are not determined, and the amount of them cannot be inserted in the judgment until disposition is made of any pending motion to tax. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1033, 1035. The order fixing the amount of the keeper's fees was in time.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Where there is ground on which the United States Supreme Court might issue a writ of certiorari to review a state court decision, though there is some doubt, stay of issuance and transmission of remittitur to the trial court pending application for such writ will be granted, where no prejudice will result, and otherwise irreparable injury might be done.

Tehama. The application is made in order that appellant, before execution of the judgment, may have an opportunity to apply to the Supreme Court of the United States for a writ of certiorari; it being contended that said superior court had no jurisdiction of appellant by reason of its residence in another state. The judgment of the lower court was affirmed by this court on December 28, 1917 (170 Pac. 1082), and a petition for a rehearing was denied. On February 25, 1918, the Supreme Court denied a petition to have the cause heard by that court, and the judgment has therefore become final as far as the state courts are concerned.

[1] There is no doubt this court has inherent power to grant the application. The same principle is involved as in the exercise of the power of courts of common law to temporarily stay execution of their judgments, whenever it was necessary to accomplish the ends of justice. Eaton v. Cleveland Ry. Co. (C. C.) 41 Fed. 421. Indeed, it is not disputed by counsel for respondent that the power exists. Attention is called to the fact that the Supreme Court has exercised control over remittiturs even after their issuance to prevent wrong and injustice. Trumpler v. Trumpler, 123 Cal. 248, 55 Pac. 1008.

[2] Respondent, however, contends with much learning and the citation of numerous decisions of the United States Supreme Court that there is no substantial ground for the belief that said court will entertain the writ. It has undoubtedly been decided by that tribunal that where, as herein, an action has been begun in a state court and then transferred to a federal court, and by the latter remanded to the state court, an appeal or writ of error will not lie to the Supreme Court of the United States. However, it is the contention of appellant that the rule has been changed by an amendment passed by Congress September 6, 1916, to the Federal Judicial Code (U. S. Comp. St. 1916, § 1214), and that the remedy of certiorari may be invoked.

We think appellant is in error, but courts do not always agree, and the Supreme Court of the United States might, of course, find merit in appellant's position. At least, there is some room for candid disputation, and, since it does not appear that respondent will suffer any injury by a short delay in the execution of the judgment, whereas appellant might suffer irreparable damage if the judgment should be carried into execution, and thereafter the Supreme Court of the United States should hold that the superior court was entirely without jurisdiction, we think the application should be granted. It must be understood, though, that this court will not voluntarily extend the time allowed unless some extraordinary reason should appear.

The remittitur will be stayed for 30 days.

TOWN OF CALISTOGA v. ADAMS, Town Clerk. (Civ. 1833.)

Municipal Corporations 🔑919—Bonds.

The act relating to the incurring of indebtedness by municipalities (St. 1901, p. 28), requiring municipal bonds to be payable annually in parts not less than one-fortieth part of the whole indebtedness, does not require annual payments to be uniform in amount.

Original application by Town of Calistoga for writ of mandamus against I. C. Adams, as Town Clerk of the Town of Calistoga. Writ granted.

Wallace Rutherford, of Napa, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner prays for the writ of mandate of this court commanding the respondent, as town clerk of the town of Calistoga, to countersign certain bonds issued under the authority of an ordinance passed by the town of Calistoga. The ordinance provided that:

> "Said bonds shall be called 'Waterworks Bonds', shall be forty in number, of the denomination of one thousand dollars each, and shall be numbered consecutively from one to forty, both inclusive, and shall be payable in numerical order consecutively, commencing with number one, in the manner following, that is to say: Bond No. 1 shall be paid on January 1st, 1919, bond No. 2 shall be paid on January 1st, 1920, bond No. 3 shall be paid on January 1st, 1921, bond No. 4 shall be paid on January 1st, 1922, bond No. 5 shall be paid on January 1st, 1923."

Bonds Nos. 6 and 7 were made payable on January 1, 1924, bond No. 8 January 1, 1925, and so on throughout the series, payments being at regular period but in irregular amounts, sometimes one bond maturing and sometimes two, bringing the final payment on January 1, 1939, 21 years after the issuance of the bonds.

Section 5 of the act relating to the incurring of indebtedness by municipal corporations, etc. (Stats. 1901, p. 28) reads, in part, as follows:

> "All municipal bonds issued under the provisions of this act shall be payable substantially in the manner following: A part to be determined by the legislative body of the municipality, which shall be not less than one-fortieth part of the whole amount of such indebtedness, shall be paid each and every year on a day and date, at the city treasury, to be fixed by the legislative branch of the municipality issuing the bonds, together with the interest on all sums unpaid at such date. * * *"

The objection now made to the manner in which the payments are to be made is that they do not conform to the statute, in that the annual installments are not uniform in amount. We see nothing in the act, either expressly or by implication, requiring that the payments shall be made at annual consecutive periods in equal amounts. The only limitation, apparently, is that payments shall not to be less than one-fortieth part of the whole amount of the indebtedness.

At the argument the following cases were cited by petitioner which seem to support its contention: Simonton on Municipal Bonds, § 102; Turpin v. Madison Co., Fiscal Court, 105 Ky. 226, 48 S. W. 1085; Board of Com'rs of Kearney Co. v. Vandriss, 115 Fed. 866, 53 C. C. A. 192; Keith Co. v. Citizens' Svgs. & Loan Ass'n, 116 Fed. 13, 53 C. C. A. 525; City of Venice v. Lawrence, 24 Cal. App. 350, 141 Pac. 406.

In our opinion the provisions of the ordinance are authorized by the statute, and therefore it is ordered that the writ prayed for in the petition be granted.

LANTERMAN v. ANDERSON et al.

1. CERTIORARI ⇨28(1)—SCOPE OF REMEDY—RECORD.

The office of the writ of certiorari is to determine only whether the inferior board or court has acted in excess of jurisdiction, and the investigation of the trial court will go no further than to inspect the record as it appears written and to determine from that whether there has been action unwarranted by the powers given to the board or court whose proceedings are under review.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Certiorari.]

2. CERTIORARI ⇨5(1)—RECORD—REMEDY BY APPEAL.

The writ of certiorari cannot be used to take the place of an appeal or to add to or modify a record with respect to any jurisdictional fact therein determined.

3. CERTIORARI ⇨56(2)—SCOPE OF REVIEW—CONTRADICTION OF RECORD.

In certiorari to review order of board of medical examiners, revoking license of the petitioner to practice medicine, where the record recital was that a quorum of the board was present on the hearing, petitioner could not make a showing that one of the board absented himself for a time from the session.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇨80(2) — DIVISION OF POWERS—JUDICIARY—BOARD.

St. 1915, p. 184, providing for revocation of a physician's license to practice for professional misconduct, is not unconstitutional as conferring upon a board powers belonging strictly to the judicial department.

5. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS ⇨11(3)—REVOCATION OF LICENSE—COMPLAINT TO BOARD—SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint to the board of medical examiners, charging a physician in the language of St. 1915, p. 198, § 12, subd. 1, with attempting a criminal abortion, was sufficient, without stating the acts of the offense, since Pen. Code, § 950, requiring such statement, does not apply to proceedings before the board of examiners.

6. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS ⇨11(3)—REVOCATION OF LICENSE—EVIDENCE—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICES.

Since a proceeding to revoke the license to practice of a physician is not criminal, the rule that a person may not be convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice does not apply in such proceeding.

7. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS ⇨11(3)—REVOCATION OF LICENSE — EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to warrant revocation of physician's license to practice on the ground that he aided in performing a criminal abortion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Proceeding for writ of review by R. S. Lanterman against Harry E. Anderson and others. From a judgment affirming the proceedings and determination of the board of medical examiners revoking petitioner's license to practice medicine, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Dehm, Frank Dominguez, and W. J. Ford, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. John W. Hart, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. This is an appeal from the judgment of the superior court rendered upon hearing of a writ of review and which judgment affirmed the proceedings and determination of the board of medical examiners of the state under and by which the certificate and license authorizing petitioner to practice medicine and surgery was revoked.

In the court below, by his petition, appellant set up a very complete record of the evidence and proceedings had before the respondent board. Respondents, not questioning the correctness of the record as there pleaded, objected to the legal sufficiency of the facts shown. The board further filed in the superior court affidavits to meet one allegation made in the petition of appellant. By that allegation it was asserted by petitioner to be the fact that one of the members of the board absented himself during the hearing, and that therefore no quorum was present at all times while the evidence was being taken. The charge made, and upon which the order revoking the license and certificate of petitioner was based, was that petitioner had been guilty of unprofessional conduct as defined by the state medical act. Stats. 1915, p. 184; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1915, p. 877. In section 12 of that act it is provided that the certificate of a physician may be revoked or suspended. It is first required that there shall be filed with the secretary of the board a sworn complaint, charging the holder of the certificate with "having been guilty of unprofessional conduct." It is then provided that the secretary shall issue a citation, requiring the certificate holder to appear at the next session of the board of medical examiners, which shall occur at least 30 days after the filing of the complaint. It is further provided that after issue has been joined by answer, the board shall proceed to determine the matter, and may hear such "proper" evidence as may be adduced before it. In the same section the things which shall constitute unprofessional conduct authorizing suspension or revocation of the certificate are specifically set forth. Appellant was charged under the first subdivision, which reads as follows:

> "The procuring or aiding or abetting or attempting or agreeing or offering to procure a criminal abortion."

The complaint made, in its charging part, was as follows:

> "That on or about June 19, 1916, the said R. S. Lanterman did, in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, procure, aid, and abet, and attempt, agree, and offer to procure a criminal abortion upon a pregnant woman, to wit, Elizabeth Johnson."

[1, 2] The first point made by appellant is that the trial court erred in refusing to take testimony upon the alleged issue as to whether one member of the board had absented himself during the taking of evidence. As before noted, the record of the proceedings had and testimony taken was made a part of the petition of the petitioner, and as to the correctness of that record or its completeness respondents made no issue. The office of the writ of certiorari is to determine only as to whether the inferior board or court has acted in excess of jurisdiction, and the investigation of the trial court will go no further than to inspect the record as it appears written and to determine from that whether there has been action taken unwarranted by the powers given to the board or court whose proceedings are under review. The writ may not be used to take the place of an appeal or to add to or modify a record with respect to any jurisdictional fact determined therein. In re Grove Street, 61 Cal. 453; De Pedrorena v. Superior Court, 80 Cal. 144, 22 Pac. 71. Petitioner in no case is permitted to contradict the record as to the jurisdictional facts shown thereby.

[3] Examining the petition filed herein, we note at once that the exhibit attached to the petition purports to be an exact record of the proceedings had at the hearing of the charge made against petitioner before the medical board. That record contains this recital:

> "At the hour of 11:00 a. m. of the above day, there being a quorum of the board present, the following proceedings were had."

Nowhere in that record—and the whole thereof is given as from a reporter's transcript—is it shown that any member of the board absented himself during the hearing of the charge. The assertion made by the record is that a quorum of the members was present, and we cannot presume in the face of that recital that any other condition existed throughout the hearing. There was a recital that an adjournment was taken at one point until 4 p. m., and at 4 p. m. continued until 8 p. m. of October 5, 1916, and the opening paragraph of the record made shows that at the convening of the evening session a quorum of the board was again present. The allegation in the petition, charging that a quorum was not present at some time during the hearing, is directly in conflict with the record, and the record must prevail. Therefore, upon the face of appellant's petition, the trial judge was compelled to hold that no issue was tendered as to that matter which required the taking of evidence.

[4] The point is suggested, too, that the act under which petitioner was prosecuted is unconstitutional. The particular ground of this objection is that powers are conferred which belong strictly under the Constitution to the judicial department. Acts of the nature here under consideration have been repeatedly sustained as a proper exercise of the legislative grant. Various boards performing legislative and ministerial functions have the incidental and necessary power, sometimes referred to as quasi judicial, to determine facts and enter their judgment thereon; such as boards of supervisors, boards of equalization, boards of police commissioners, and many other unnecessary to name. Referring specially to medical acts, it is said in Hewitt v. Board of Medical Examiners, 148 Cal. 590, 84 Pac. 39, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315, 7 Ann. Cas. 750:

> "Legislation of the character embraced within the general scope of the act in question, in so far as it provides for the revocation of the certificate of a physician, * * * is sustained upon the ground that the Legislature has authority under its general police power to provide all reasonable regulations that may be necessary affecting the public health, safety, or morals, and with this object in view to provide for the dismissal from the medical profession of all persons whose principles, practices, and character render them unfit to remain in it. As the duty of determining whether such profession or moral unfitness exists must necessarily be vested in somebody other than the Legislature, it is usually committed by appropriate legislation to boards composed of men learned in their profession."

See, also, Ex parte McNulty, 77 Cal. 164, 19 Pac. 237, 11 Am. St. Rep. 257; Ex parte Whitley, 144 Cal. 167, 77 Pac. 879, 1 Ann. Cas. 13; Meffert v. State Bd. of Medical Registration, 66 Kan. 710, 72 Pac. 247, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 811.

[5] The principal contention made, however, is that the complaint filed before the board of medical examiners was insufficient in its statement of facts to sustain the determination based thereon. The charge, as we have already quoted it, was phrased exactly in the language of that portion of the act defining the particular unprofessional conduct of which it was charged petitioner had been guilty. Counsel for appellant argue that because the statute refers to a "criminal abortion," and that because in order to determine what a criminal abortion is one must look to the Penal Code, the charge would be insufficiently laid unless the acts defined in the Penal Code as constituting the crime of abortion are set forth. Appellant was not charged with a crime, nor was he subject, upon the adverse determination made, to any penalty except the revocation of his license to practice medicine and surgery. The contention of counsel would be entitled to more serious consideration were we considering here a criminal offense with its attendant penalties, as the same is understood under any of the penal laws of the state. Where an indictment or information is drawn under the Penal Code, it must, of course, comply with the provisions of section 950 of that Code, in that it must contain "a statement of the acts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language. * * *" No similar provision appears in the medical act. It must be said, we think, that the language of the statute is sufficiently explicit to advise a person charged thereunder of the particular kind of unprofessional conduct which it is proposed to prove against him, and that, we think, is all that need be said upon the question. The case cited by appellant, where the Supreme Court of Oregon held a complaint before the medical board to be insufficient because not alleging sufficient facts (Board of Medical Examiners v. Eisen, 61 Or. 492, 123 Pac. 52), presents a case under a law different from that before us. In the decision it is recited that:

> "Before a license can be revoked by said board for unprofessional or dishonorable conduct under the provisions of this act a complaint of some person under oath must be filed in the office of the secretary of said board, charging the acts of unprofessional or dishonorable conduct and facts complained of against the licentiate accused, in ordinary and concise language."

That provision which finds place in the Oregon law is practically identical with the provision of section 950 of our Penal Code, but, as has been just stated, is entirely absent from our medical act. It has been held that an accusation made under Penal Code, § 772, having as its object the removal of a public officer, is not required to conform to the provisions of section 950 et seq. of the Penal Code. Woods v. Varnum, 85 Cal. 639, 24 Pac. 843.

[6] The last contention which we shall notice is that there was no legal or sufficient evidence authorizing the medical board to make the order complained of. The force of this objection rests chiefly upon the assertion that all the material testimony furnished against the appellant was that given by accomplices. The action not being criminal in its nature, it is again apparent that the statutory mandate that a person may not be convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice has no application here. We feel satisfied that any witness whose testimony as to competent facts was convincing to the board engaged in the hearing of the charge would be legally sufficient. It is said in Tinn v. U. S. District Attorney, 148 Cal. 774, 84 Pac. 152, 113 Am. St. Rep. 354, that certiorari will not review a decision rendered upon "insufficient evidence" or through irregular method of procedure not going to the question of jurisdiction. The statement in the opinion to that effect is no doubt subject to the qualification that an entire want of evidence may present a case showing a lack of power to render a judgment or make a finding. We have expressed the conclusion, however, that the testimony of persons who might be accomplices could be received and might be considered by the board trying the charge.

[7] There was ample testimony coming from the persons concerned in the commission of the act charged to sustain the determination made by the medical board. That the facts here may be made more fully to appear, we will briefly state in an abstract way the substance of the testimony: A young drug clerk had engaged in illicit intercourse with a girl of about 18 years. He testified that when he concluded, by reason of the cessation of the menstrual act, that she had become pregnant, he gave her certain drugs to take, which did not produce the desired effect. He testified that he then took her to petitioner's office, and that a young woman named Smith accompanied them. Miss Smith remained in the anteroom while a conversation was had with petitioner; that he told petitioner that the young woman was in trouble, and wanted to know whether he could get her out of it; that petitioner responded that the young woman would have to be given an anesthetic and be curetted; that she would be in a hospital 24 hours, and the service would cost $55; that no examination was made of the young woman, but that petitioner gave her a card with the address of a Mrs. Purcell upon it, and told the young man to take the young woman out there. The girl testified that she went to the place and presented the card and was admitted; that in the afternoon petitioner arrived and she was taken down and placed upon a table and given an anesthetic and operated upon. The young man in question testified that he carried the girl back to her room from the operating table. The operation was admitted to have been made in the place of Mrs. Purcell, and it was shown that a sister of Mrs. Purcell administered the anesthetic. The appellant and Mrs. Purcell and her sister all testified that no abortion was performed, but that the girl came to the house suffering from an excessive flow, and that Dr. Lanterman operated upon her for that trouble. Another physician testified that he made an examination of the girl some weeks after the operation had been made and found a condition showing that there had been a dilation of the sexual organs. The petitioner further admitted that the girl had appeared at his office, but denied that he had agreed to perform any abortion upon her, stating that he had advised that the pregnancy be allowed to run its full period. In the face of this evidence, it cannot be said that the findings made by the medical board were wholly wanting in proof to sustain them.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

EWING v. RICHVALE LAND CO. et al.

Mortgages ⚷559(3)—Deficiency Judgment—Authority of Clerk.

In an action on notes secured by mortgage, prayer being for foreclosure and deficiency judgment, a distinct adjudication and judgment against defendant in a sum named is equivalent to judgment that defendant is personally liable to plaintiff for amount found to be due, and sufficient to authorize clerk, after commissioner's return showing deficiency, to enter deficiency judgment under Code Civ. Proc. § 726, providing that if it appears from the commissioner's report that the proceeds are insufficient and a balance still remains due, judgment must then be docketed by the clerk in the manner provided "against the defendant or defendants personally liable for the debt."

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Samuel Ewing against the Richvale Land Company and others. From a deficiency judgment entered for plaintiff by the clerk of court, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 167 Pac. 876.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, for appellant. James A. McGregor, of Oronville, and Karl C. Partridge, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an appeal by defendant Richvale Land Company from a deficiency judgment entered by the clerk of the superior court on the coming in of the commissioner's return in an action to foreclose a mortgage executed by appellant to plaintiff.

It is alleged in the complaint in the action that the defendant company executed and delivered to plaintiff two certain promissory notes each for $4,593; that plaintiff is the owner and holder of said promissory notes, neither of which nor any part thereof except certain interest on one of said notes has been paid; that to secure payment of said notes defendant company executed and delivered to plaintiff its mortgage on certain described land, describing it, which was duly acknowledged and recorded; that defendant Jones claims some interest in said land, but that such interest is subordinate to said mortgage; that by the terms of said mortgage a reasonable attorney's fee was allowed for the foreclosure, should foreclosure become necessary. Upon the foregoing averments the prayer of the complaint is that plaintiff have "judgment against defendant (Richvale Land Company) in the sum of," stating the amount of each note together with interest thereon for attorney's fees in the sum of $1,000; that "said mortgage be foreclosed, and that each of said defendants and all persons claiming under them, or either of them, may be foreclosed of all right * * * and that the usual decree may be made * * * for the sale of said mortgaged premises by the sheriff * * * or by a commissioner to be appointed by said court, and that the proceeds of said sale may be applied to the payment of said note, interest, attorney's fee, and costs of suit and sale"; that each of said defendants and all purchasers subsequent to the execution of said mortgage be foreclosed of all, etc., "and that plaintiff may have judgment and execution against the defendant Richvale Land Company, a corporation, for any deficiency which may remain after applying all the proceeds of the sale of said property properly applicable to the satisfaction of the said judgment"; that plaintiff may become the purchaser at such sale. The rights of defendant Jones are not involved, and he does not appeal. The answer of defendant Richvale Land Company admits all the averments of the complaint except as to attorney's fees, and as to that the denial is that $1,000 is a reasonable fee. The cause came on for trial December 21, 1915, and a minute order was made which stated, among other things:

> "Matter submitted to the court, and the court orders that a decree be entered for the plaintiff of foreclosure and counsel fees at $500."

On the 25th day of February, 1916, the court made and entered its decree. It is entitled, "Decree of Foreclosure," recites that the cause came on to be heard December 21, 1915, both oral and documentary evidence was submitted, and "the court now finds the following facts": That defendant Richvale Land Company is a corporation duly organized; that it executed and delivered to plaintiff the promissory notes set out in the complaint, and "that the plaintiff ever since has been and still is the owner and holder of said promissory notes, and that neither the sum mentioned therein, or any part thereof, has ever been paid," nor any interest except as stated; that defendant Richvale Land Company executed the mortgage mentioned in the complaint to secure payment of said notes and described the property mortgaged; that said mortgage provided for the payment of a reasonable attorney's fee, which is found to be $500 (the finding as to defendant Jones is immaterial). The findings of fact here end. It is then stated:

> "It is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that a judgment be entered against the defendant Richvale Land Company in the sum of $4,593, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from the 1st day of March, 1914, and for the sum of $4,593, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 1st day of March, 1913, to the 1st day of March, 1915, and at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from the 1st day of March, 1915. For attorney's fees in the sum of $500 and for all costs of suit and sale."

It is further stated:

> "That said mortgage be foreclosed, and that said defendant Richvale Land Company, a corporation, be foreclosed of all right, claim, or equity of redemption of its interest in said mortgaged premises, or any part thereof, and that John Myers be, and he is hereby, appointed a commissioner to conduct said sale and apply the proceeds thereof to the payment of said notes, interest, attorney's fees, and costs of suit and sale, and that before qualifying as such commissioner, the said John Myers gives a bond in the sum of $100."

The commissioner duly made return of his proceedings, from which it appeared that there was a deficiency of $6,617.30 after disposing of the proceeds of the sale in accordance with the decree. The clerk made the following entry in judgment docket:

> "Judgment for deficiency of $6,617.30 as shown by commissioner's return of sale."

It will appear from the foregoing that the findings of fact are a part of the decree, and that no conclusions of law as such are stated. In the paragraph, immediately following what purport to be findings of fact, is the order and decree. There is no provision in the decree for entering a deficiency judgment.

It is upon this condition of the record that appellant makes the following contentions:

> "(1) Section 726, Code of Civil Procedure, providing for foreclosure of mortgages of realty, does not give the clerk power to docket a deficiency judgment unless a judgment is entered adjudicating the defendant personally liable for the debt. (2) The mere recital, preceding the judgment, or as contained in the judgment and decree of the court, that judgment be entered against defendant Richvale Land Company in the amount of the debt sued for, with interest, costs, and counsel fees, is not the entry of a judgment that defendant Richvale Land Company is personally liable for the debt, or permitting a deficiency judgment to be docketed by the clerk against them."

The provision of section 726 touching the question here is as follows:

> "If it appear from the sheriff's return, or from the commissioner's report, that the proceeds are insufficient, and a balance still remains due, judgment must then be docketed by the clerk in the manner provided in this code for such balance against the defendant or defendants personally liable for the debt, and it becomes a lien on the real estate of such judgment debtor, as in other cases in which execution may be issued."

It is undoubtedly true and the cases all so hold, that the deficiency judgment contemplated by section 726 can only be docketed by the clerk "against the defendant or defendants personally liable for the debt" for such is the express language of the statute. Scamman v. Bonslett, 118 Cal. 93, 50 Pac. 272, 62 Am. St. Rep. 226; Herd v. Tuohy, 133 Cal. 55, 65 Pac. 139; and among the earlier cases may be cited Cormerais v. Genella, 22 Cal. 116; Leviston v. Swan, 33 Cal. 480. In the case last cited the court stated what is still true, for the forty-sixth section of the Practice Act was substantially the same so far as concerned the deficiency judgment, as is section 726 as we now have it. The court speaking of the judgment in a foreclosure case, said:

> "All that it need or should contain is a statement of the amount due the plaintiff a designation of the defendants who are personally liable for the payment of the debt, and a direction that the mortgaged premises, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be sold according to law and the proceeds applied to the payment of the expenses of the sale, the cost of the action, and the debt. Nothing further is required. All else is ministerial, and is expressly regulated by the statute, which is not made clearer or more binding by being copied into the judgment. * * * Under our system, the sheriff is furnished with a certified copy of the judgment. Armed with this process, he proceeds to sell the mortgaged property in the mode and manner, and at the place designated in the Practice Act for the sale of real estate under judicial process, and makes a return of his proceedings as in the case of an execution upon a money judgment. If it appears from his return that the amount due the plaintiff has not been fully paid by the sale, the clerk then dockets the judgment, for the balance due, against those defendants named in the judgment as being personally liable for the payment of the debt, without any order from the court."

Herd v. Tuohy, 133 Cal. 55, 65 Pac. 139, is relied on by appellant. That was a foreclosure case in which the defendant recovered judgment against the plaintiff for the foreclosure of a mortgage. It was stated by the court in its opinion:

> "In the judgment as originally entered, there was no adjudication that the plaintiff was personally liable, or provision for a deficiency judgment against him."

On an ex parte application of defendant's attorneys, the judgment was amended by adding thereto a paragraph, adjudging the plaintiff to be personally liable on the mortgage, and that on the commissioner's return of the sale, deficiency judgment should be docketed against him; and accordingly such a judgment was docketed against him. This action was brought to obtain relief against this judgment as amended and the deficiency judgment entered thereon, and resulted in a judgment for plaintiff, in effect canceling both judgments. The appeal was from this judgment. Among other points, appellant urged:

> "That the complaint does not purport to set forth all of the original decree, and non constat that it was not sufficient to authorize * * * a deficiency judgment."

Said the court:

> "As to the second point, the complaint purports to set out the whole judgment, but in fact, as appears from the findings, does not do so. But the omitted portions contain no provision for a deficiency judgment; nor is there any adjudication that the plaintiff, then defendant, was personally liable, unless, as claimed by the appellant, the following recital may be so construed, viz.: 'That the interest on said note to November 30, 1895, has been paid; that no other * * * part of said note, principal, or interest has been paid, and there is now due and owing to the plaintiff from the defendants John Herd, Jr., and R. Linder on said note the sum of $91,101.85, etc., and that the said defendants John Herd, Jr., and R. Linder are personally liable * * * for said sums so found due from them to plaintiff as aforesaid.' But this is merely the recital of a fact preceding the actual judgment, and cannot be regarded as an adjudication of personal liability; which alone could authorize the clerk to docket a judgment for deficiency"—citing cases.

In that case it will be observed that there was found as fact what amounted to a liability on the part of defendants Herd and Linder, but the finding was not followed by an adjudication of personal liability. In the present case the complaint set out the indebtedness and called for a deficiency judgment. The answer admitted the averments of the complaint. The court in its findings found the amount due on the promissory notes to plaintiff from defendant Richvale Land Company, and that no part thereof had been paid, except certain interest on one of the notes. Upon the findings the court entered judgment against the defendant Richvale Land Company in the sum so found to be due plaintiff. Herein lies the important feature distinguishing it from the case of Herd v. Tuohy relied upon by defendant. In that case the recital was but a finding of fact, and was not followed up, as was done in the present case, by an adjudication and judgment. It was not necessary that the judgment should in express terms state that defendant Richvale Land Company is personally liable for the debt. It is sufficient if from the findings and judgment such fact clearly appears. Judge Sanderson in Leviston v. Swan, supra, pointed out all that the judgment need contain. "All else," he said, "is ministerial, and is expressly regulated by the statute, which is not made clearer * * * by being copied into the judgment." See Hooper v. McDade, 1 Cal. App. 733, 739, 82 Pac. 1116. In MacNeil v. Ward, 2 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 174, the court said:

> "The judgment in this case is not amenable to the criticism of counsel for appellant, that it is erroneous because there is no direction in it that a judgment be docketed for deficiency. In this respect it [the judgment] accords with Leviston v. Swan, 33 Cal. 480, where the question is considered and correctly determined. The only point in which the judgment seems to be defective is in not expressly adjudging that * * * Ward is personally liable to the plaintiff for the money found to be due. This is inferentially done."

The court directed that on the going down of the remittitur, the judgment be amended, "inserting words remedying this defect, and, as thus modified the judgment will stand affirmed." The record of the case does not give the form of the judgment, and it may not have, except as the court said, "inferentially" adjudged that Ward was liable for the debt. Here there is a distinct adjudication and judgment "against the defendant Richvale Land Company in the sum of," etc. It seems to us that this is the equivalent of saying that defendant Richvale Land Company is personally liable to the plaintiff for the money found to be due, and is sufficient. By no possibility could there have been a liability other than by defendant company. The statute does not prescribe the form of the judgment. All that it requires is that it shall appear from the judgment that the defendant is personally liable for the debt, and we think that this may appear without in express terms adjudging the defendant to be personally liable. Language used which unmistakably means this should be held to be, and we think is, sufficient.

The judgment is affirmed.

DODGE v. AVERY. (Civ. 2246.)

Landlord and Tenant ⊂⇒57(2) — Assignment of Rent—Breach of Contract—Sufficiency of Evidence.

Where landlord entered into contract whereby a creditor was to collect the rent from a tenant and apply a certain amount on the indebtedness each month, evidence held insufficient to show that landlord interfered with collection of such rent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by Julia C. J. Dodge against J. F. Avery. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Geo. M. Harker, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Ira L. Brunk and Silas Cobb, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. The defendant and one Ira L. Brunk entered into a written agreement in which it was recited that the former, the party of the first part, was indebted to Brunk, the party of the second part, in the sum of $1,200. The agreement then provided:

> "In order to secure the * * * payment of said sum of money, the first party hereby sells, assigns, and sets over to the second party * * * an interest in and to that * * * lease made and executed * * * by and between the first party * * * and John H. Strickler * * * wherein the said Strickler becomes obligated to pay * * * the sum of $9,000 as rent for a certain property, * * * and the first party herein assigns, sells, and sets over to the second party * * * an interest in and to said rents due and to become due * * * under and by virtue of said indenture of lease to the amount of $1,200, with the understanding that the second party herein shall collect from the lessee * * * the said $9,000 of rent, payable in monthly installments of $150 per month, and shall retain for his own use and benefit the sum of $20 out of each monthly installment of rent, the said $20 to be applied upon the said sum of $1,200 until the whole of said $1,200 is fully paid."

The rights of Brunk under this agreement descended to the plaintiff through a chain of several assignments, all of which were accepted by the defendant, and the present action was commenced to recover for an alleged breach of its terms. Let us say at the outset that, while the agreement and the assignments of it may possibly be construed as vesting in the plaintiff the right to maintain an action against the defendant upon the original obligation of the latter to pay Brunk $1,200, that question does not arise in this action, for the complaint is plainly based upon the agreement as one which lodged in the plaintiff the right to collect the rents and to retain from each monthly collection the sum of $20 until the payment of the full $1,200 was accomplished.

After setting up the agreement and the assignments, the complaint alleges that $180 had been collected on the agreement at the monthly rate of $20 before the assignment to the plaintiff, and that after that assignment she collected $20 monthly for a period of 23 months, up to and including April 1, 1914, or an added sum of $460. Then occur the following allegations, omitting formal verbiage:

> "That thereafter plaintiff continued to try to collect the rent, * * * but was unable to do so, by reason of the fact * * * that the defendant herein began to interfere with the collection of said rents by this plaintiff, by endeavoring to collect the rents himself, and * * * forbidding the tenant in possession * * * to pay to the plaintiff any of the rents, * * * and demanding the payment of said rents to himself. * * * That by reason of said interference, this plaintiff has been unable to collect any rent since the 1st day of April, 1914, although this plaintiff has endeavored to collect said rents and all of them since said 1st day of April, 1914."

It was also alleged that the defendant had collected some or all of the rents since April 1, 1914. The complaint then proceeds:

> "That said defendant has not paid to this plaintiff the $20 per month, according to the terms of said agreement, * * * or any part thereof, although plaintiff has demanded payment of the same from defendant. * * * That there is now due, owing, and unpaid from said defendant to this plaintiff, upon said written agreement hereinbefore set forth, the sum of $560, being the balance of the amount set forth in said agreement, after the payment of the said $180 and the said $460."

These were all the material allegations of the complaint. The answer categorically denied all the allegations we have included within quotation marks, except the allegation as to demand made by plaintiff upon defendant. The allegation, the effect of which we have given, without quoting, that defendant had collected some or all of the rents since April 1, 1914, the defendant answered by admitting that he had collected $750 up to and including December 15, 1914; but he denied that he had made the collections under the agreement between him and Brunk and made certain affirmative allegations as to the terms on which collections had been made.

Judgment went for plaintiff for the full amount prayed for, and the defendant appeals.

The court found that all the allegations of the complaint were true. This finding is assailed as not being supported by the evidence, and the appellant specifies the particular respects in which it is claimed that the finding lacks support. At the outset of the trial the court, evidently overlooking the denials contained in the answer, announced that the burden of proof was upon the defendant and required him to proceed. The only evidence in the case, therefore, was evidence offered by the defendant, and it shows, without dispute, that the respondent, being about to depart from Los Angeles, where all these questions arose, left a Mrs. Anderson to act for her in her absence in the matter of the rents mentioned in the agreement; that before she left she requested the tenant of the property in question to pay only the $20 per month to Mrs. Anderson and to pay the remaining $130 per month to the appellant; that the respondent left Los Angeles in February or March, 1915, and returned in May or June of the same year; that Mrs. Anderson collected $20 per month from the tenant for either one or two months, and that, for the same period, the tenant paid $130 per month direct to the appellant; that from that period forward, for some months, the appellant was paid various amounts by the tenants on account of the rent, but he never again received as much as $130 in any month, or for any month, the payments always being from $40 to $70 short, each month, of either the $130 or the $150, the evidence not showing which. The evidence fails to show that the respondent ever made any change in her direction to the tenant that he pay over to the appellant $130 per month, or that he pay to Mrs. Anderson only $20 per month. The evidence plainly fails to support the allegation of the complaint to the effect that the appellant interfered to prevent the collection of rents by respondent, and it fails to support the allegation that, in effect, the appellant collected any moneys whatever which it was his duty, under the theory advanced by the complaint, to repay to respondent. We need not mention other specific allegations of the complaint, denied by the answer, which are unsupported by the evidence.

Action by R. L. Bliss against the Southern Pacific Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry T. Gage and W. I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Guy E. Maurice, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. This is an action for the recovery of damages alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff through injuries to certain of his cattle while in transit over the railroad of defendant; the point from which and the point to which the shipment was made both being within the state. Judgment was awarded to the plaintiff and the defendant appeals. The appeal is upon the judgment roll, and there is no bill of exceptions.

The findings of fact show that the cattle were shipped under a written agreement between the parties and that it contained the following provision, which we have liberally shortened by ellipsis:

> "Second party * * * agrees that in case any loss or damage shall have been sustained * * * demand or claim for such loss or damage will be made * * * in writing, within 10 days after unloading; * * * and that in event of failure so to do, all claims for loss or damage * * * are hereby expressly waived, released and made void, and it is * * * agreed by second party that the amount to be by him claimed * * * shall be adjusted on basis of value at time and place of shipment, not exceeding the declared value as hereinbefore set forth, * * * and in no event is there to be any recovery * * * for any loss of or damage to said live stock * * * in excess of the declared value hereinbefore set forth."

It is also found that the respondent made no such written claim or demand within the time limited; but it is further found, in effect, that within 48 hours after unloading the cattle the respondent telephoned an agent of the appellant that they were damaged and then made demand to be compensated for the damage, and stated that he intended to slaughter the cattle and that he would, after killing them, send a claim for damage; that the agent said, "All right," stated that he would send one of the appellant's claim inspectors to be present at the time of the slaughtering to ascertain the amount of the respondent's damage; that the inspector did appear for that purpose and then requested the respondent to so handle the cattle that the least loss would result to the respondent; that it was then and there agreed between the inspector and the respondent that, by reason of the damage suffered by them, the cattle were then unfit for slaughter and that if they were slaughtered immediately an increased loss to the respondent would result; that the inspector requested of the respondent that the cattle be allowed to stand in the respondent's stockyard until such times as, in the judgment of the respondent, the least loss to him would be occasioned; that the respondent assented to the request and used just, fair, and reasonable discretion in determining the time the cattle should so stand and did not complete their slaughter until the closing time of the respondent's plant on the afternoon of the tenth day after the unloading of the cattle from the appellant's train; that prior to the making of the agreement under which the damaged cattle were shipped the parties had frequently executed similar agreements, containing the language above quoted from the agreement now in question; that the respondent had suffered damage to cattle shipped under such agreements; that in each and every instance of such loss the appellant required the respondent, when presenting his written claim for damages, to state his actual loss, and to ascertain the amount thereof by deducting from the local market value of the cattle when slaughtered, if they were in an undamaged condition, their local market value as damaged; that respondent did so, and in many instances he was unable to ascertain the difference in market value until after, and did not present his written claim for damage until after, 10 days from the time of unloading; that appellant did, notwithstanding the delay in presenting written claim for damage, make equitable settlements of respondent's claims; that appellant has repeatedly demanded that respondent make all his claims for losses upon the above mentioned basis and has notified respondent that unless all claims are so presented appellant will not pay them; that, in the present case, it was impossible to ascertain the market value of the cattle as damaged until after they were slaughtered; that by reason of the aforesaid facts respondent did not, within 10 days after the cattle were unloaded, ascertain the total amount of his damage; that except for the aforesaid facts he would have presented a written claim within the required 10 days; and that he did present such a written claim 24 days after the last of the cattle were slaughtered.

The respondent takes the position, and the trial court decided, that, under the circumstances disclosed by the findings, he was excused from presenting a written claim for his damage within the 10 days limited by the terms of the agreement. The authorities which the respondent cites in support of his contention may be grouped under two statements of propositions of law.

[1] The first is that, where parties contract for such a written notice of damage as is provided for in the agreement that is now before us, the right to notice is waived and excused by the carrier, if, after receiving less formal notice in a given case, it proceeds to investigate the damage suffered and makes suggestion or gives direction as to the care or disposition of the damaged property. Jones v. Quincy, O. & K. C. R. Co., 117 Mo. App. 523, 94 S. W. 735; Lasky v. Sou. Exp. Co., 92 Miss. 268, 45 South. 869; Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Wright, 78 Kan. 94, 95 Pac. 1132; Clubb v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co., 136 Mo. App. 1, 117 S. W. 110; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Hood, 55 Tex. Civ. App. 636, 120 S. W. 236; Gilliland & Gaffney v. Southern Ry. Co., 85 S. C. 26, 67 S. E. 20, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1106, 137 Am. St. Rep. 861.

[2] The other proposition is that, under such an agreement, the notice need not be given within the time limited in a case in which the extent or character of the damage suffered cannot be ascertained within that time. Burns v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 151 Mo. App. 573, 132 S. W. 1; Pierson v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 61 Wash. 450, 112 Pac. 509. The position of the appellant is that a carrier has no power to waive such a provision in a contract of shipment, and several decisions of the federal courts are cited in support of the view, but all of those cases except one derive their force and effect from the fact that the provisions in question were contained in a statute or in a form of bill of lading prescribed by statute and which is in general use by railroads engaged in interstate commerce, and the damage in each case resulted to property in transit in such commerce. The remaining case is Clegg v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co., 203 Fed. 971, 122 C. C. A. 273. It appears to be somewhat in conflict with the cases we have cited above from the state courts, although it, too, relates to an interstate commerce shipment. However, we are satisfied of the correctness of the rules announced by the state courts to which we have referred.

PEOPLE v. LIMA. (Cr. 720.)

1. SEDUCTION 🔑45—PROMISE OF MARRIAGE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction of seduction under promise of marriage, although there was evidence that defendant threatened to commit suicide and kill prosecutrix.

2. SEDUCTION 🔑45—PREVIOUS CHASTITY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence in seduction case held sufficient to sustain finding that prosecutrix was previously chaste.

3. SEDUCTION 🔑45—UNMARRIED CONDITION OF PROSECUTRIX—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In seduction case, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that prosecutrix was unmarried.

4. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑808½ — REASONABLE DOUBT—INSTRUCTIONS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1826, relating to sufficiency of proof, is applicable to criminal cases, and was properly read to the jury, in connection with instructions on reasonable doubt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Manuel Lima was convicted of seduction under promise of marriage. From the judgment, and an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

L. Gonsalves, of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. It is charged in this case that the defendant, a married man, induced the prosecuting witness to accompany him from her home in Alameda county to San Jose, and there seduced her upon his promise to marry her. He was convicted of seduction under promise of marriage, and from the judgment and order denying a new trial he appeals.

The points relied on for a reversal in this case, stated in the language of the appellant's counsel upon the oral argument, are that the evidence does not show that the promise of marriage was the sole inducement which led to the girl's seduction; second, that it does not show that the prosecutrix was of previously chaste character; and, third, that there is no proof in the record that the prosecuting witness was unmarried at the time of her seduction.

[1] Upon the first point the young woman testified that she went to San Jose for the purpose of marrying the defendant and that this was her reason for going there and permitting herself to be seduced by him. She also testified that he threatened to commit suicide and to kill her. Counsel's contention that by these threats the defendant seduced her is not convincing. It is plain from the entire evidence that the means employed by the defendant to accomplish his purpose with her was his promise to marry her reiterated upon many occasions.

[2] Upon the second point, without going into the details of the unpleasant evidence in this case, it may be said that the prosecuting witness testified that she had never had intercourse with any other man previous to her seduction; and the defendant's counsel contends that this testimony did not exclude the possibility that she may have had intercourse with the defendant himself previous to her seduction. Reading the testimony and the other questions asked her, in connection with the question which brought out the foregoing answer, it may be said that the evidence is entirely sufficient to sustain the finding of the previous chaste character of the prosecuting witness.

[3] Upon the third point, the defendant cites People v. Krusick, 93 Cal. 74, 28 Pac.

794, wherein it is held that many of the facts proven in this case were not sufficient in themselves to establish the fact that the woman in that case was unmarried. However, the evidence in this case disclosed other facts and circumstances, in addition to those appearing in the case of People v. Krusick, supporting the finding of the jury that the young woman was unmarried.

It would be better practice—indeed, it is almost the universal practice—to ask the prosecuting witness in such cases as this categorical questions as to her chastity and her unmarried status; but, although this practice was not followed here, it is impossible to read this record without coming to the conclusion that those facts were sufficiently proven. Indeed, it was admitted at the oral argument that no serious question was made at the trial as to the fact that she was unmarried.

[4] We have examined the instructions complained of by the defendant and given by the trial court, and find that they fairly state the law applicable to the case. Section 1826 of the Code of Civil Procedure is applicable to criminal cases, and it was proper for the court to read it to the jury in connection with the usual instructions upon the subject of reasonable doubt.

The instructions requested by the defendant, and refused, either added nothing to those given by the court, or were of such a nature as to be unnecessary, in view of the care with which the defendant's interests were guarded by the instructions given.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: KERRIGAN, J.; ZOOK, Judge pro tem.

ILARDI v. CENTRAL CALIFORNIA TRACTION CO. et al. (Civ. 1777.)

1. NEGLIGENCE 🔑93(1) — IMPUTED NEGLIGENCE—PASSENGER IN VEHICLE.

A person riding as a passenger or guest in a vehicle driven by another may not be charged with the negligence of such other which has caused injury to him, unless such passenger or guest has the right to exercise control over the driver of the vehicle, or in the eyes of the law may be said to possess such power of control, or unless it is made to appear that the passenger or guest himself actively participated in the negligence of the driver.

2. NEGLIGENCE 🔑68—PASSENGER OR GUEST IN VEHICLE—DUTY.

One riding in a vehicle as passenger or guest of the driver must exercise ordinary care for his own safety.

3. RAILROADS 🔑346(5)—DEATH AT CROSSING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action against a railroad for death at its crossing of one riding as passenger in the vehicle of another, the burden was on defendant railroad to show deceased failed to exercise such care for his own safety as was required of him.

4. RAILROADS 🔑350(21) — DEATH AT CROSSING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where a passenger in a vehicle crossing the railroad track said nothing and did nothing, and looked neither up nor down the track before the horse was started across by the driver, such passenger was not negligent per se, and his acts did not justify the conclusion as matter of law that he failed to use due care.

5. RAILROADS 🔑346(5)—PRESUMPTIONS—ABSENCE OF NEGLIGENCE.

There is a disputable presumption that one killed at a railroad crossing in collision exercised due care for his own safety, having in view the surrounding conditions, with which he was familiar.

6. RAILROADS 🔑350(21)—DEATH AT CROSSING — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action against a railroad for a death in a crossing collision, the question whether decedent, a passenger in the wagon of another, was guilty of negligence directly causing his death, held for the jury under the circumstances in evidence.

7. RAILROADS 🔑350(33)—DEATH AT CROSSING—LAST CLEAR CHANCE —QUESTION FOR JURY.

In such action, evidence held to justify the submission to the jury of the question of last clear chance.

8. RAILROADS 🔑338—DEATH AT CROSSING—LAST CLEAR CHANCE.

If the motorman of an interurban railroad's car saw a wagon on the track at a crossing, and could have stopped without injury to the wagon or its passengers, but neglected to do so, so that a passenger in the wagon was killed, plaintiff, suing for the death, is entitled to verdict under the doctrine of last clear chance.

9. NEGLIGENCE 🔑83—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—LAST CLEAR CHANCE.

Where an injured person claiming under the doctrine of last clear chance himself had an opportunity, of which he had knowledge, to escape from the peril into which he had negligently fallen, and with reasonable diligence could have done so and avoided the accident, but failed, his negligence placing him in the position of danger was a continuing, active, or concurring cause of his injury, and he cannot recover on any theory of last clear chance.

10. RAILROADS 🔑324(1)—INJURIES AT CROSSING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

The mere act of passing over a railroad's public street crossing is not negligence per se, but only when the attempt is made to pass over without using reasonable care in ascertaining whether there is a train approaching or about to approach.

11. RAILROADS 🔑350(33)—DEATH AT CROSSING—APPLICATION OF LAST CLEAR CHANCE —QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action against a railroad for death in a crossing collision, whether decedent and the driver of the wagon in which he was riding as a passenger negligently failed to extricate themselves from their position of peril after having placed themselves in it, so that their original negligence was the cause of the death, and the doctrine of last clear chance had no application, held for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by Mary Ilardi, an infant, by Alexander Fiore, guardian ad litem, against the Central California Traction Company, a corporation, and Rosa Ilardi. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant corporation appeals. Affirmed.

Butler & Swisler, of Sacramento, for appellant. Downey, Pullen & Downey and Ralph Smith, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. The action was brought to recover from the defendant Central California Traction Company damages for its negligence in causing the death of Gandolfo Ilardi, the father of plaintiff, who at the time of the commencement of the action was about 11 years of age. The defendant Rosa Ilardi is the widow of the deceased and the stepmother of plaintiff. She was joined as a defendant for the reason, as stated in the complaint, that she had refused to join as a party plaintiff. She made no appearance in the action and her default was duly entered, but she is not affected by the judgment, which was against the defendant Central California Traction Company for the sum of $3,500. The appeal is by said company from the judgment.

Appellant owns and operates an interurban electric railroad between the cities of Sacramento and Stockton, carrying passengers and freight between said cities and way stations. Running southerly from Sacramento, for a distance of more than half a mile, trains are operated over a single-track road on the east side of, and parallel with, a public highway known as the Upper Stockton road, which road is paved along its center with asphaltum, the paved portion being about 18 feet in width, while on each side of the pavement the road has a dirt surface about 10 feet in width. The railroad track is immediately along the east side of the dirt road east of the pavement. At a point outside the city limits of Sacramento, a street, known as Vina Vista street, crosses said railroad track at a right angle and intersects with, but does not cross, said Upper Stockton road. The view from Vina Vista street for a distance of half a mile north or toward the city of Sacramento was unobstructed.

The evidence discloses that both Sansone and the deceased, who were brothers-in-law, resided on Vina Vista avenue; that the deceased, who at the time of his death was 34 years of age, had been employed in the shops of the Southern Pacific Company, in the city of Sacramento; that some two months previously to the accident whereby he lost his life he had met with an accident at the railroad shops, a piece of steel having been imbedded in his left eye; that for some time before he was killed he made daily trips to an oculist in the city of Sacramento for treatment, leaving his home in the early morning for that purpose and generally returning in the afternoon with Sansone in the latter's wagon, which was what is known as a "contractor's wagon."

The accident in which the deceased lost his life occurred on the 17th day of January, 1914, at about 4:30 o'clock p. m. Sansone had left his home in said wagon, drawn by a single horse, early in the morning and went to Sacramento city. The deceased had also gone to the city for treatment by the oculist. At about 1 o'clock on the afternoon of that day the deceased joined Sansone at Sixth and D streets, in said city, and the two started together in the wagon for their homes on Vina Vista avenue, the wagon being loaded with lumber. Sansone was the owner of the horse and wagon and Ilardi was riding with him merely as his guest, he having no interest in or control of or over the horse and wagon or the business for which Sansone used them. Sansone, who was driving, sat on the right-hand, and the deceased on the left-hand, side of the seat. They were traveling south and on the west side of the Upper Stockton road until reaching a point within a distance of about two city blocks from Vina Vista street, when a horse and wagon driven by one Fletcher, and proceeding from a driveway on the west side of the road or street, caused Sansone to pull over to the dirt road on the east side and some 8 or 10 feet from the appellant's railroad track. After passing said horse and wagon, Sansone, so he testified, turned back to the west side of the road. Upon reaching Vina Vista street, however, Sansone turned to the left and started to cross the railroad track, and at this instant of time an interurban train of two cars, traveling south from Sacramento, struck the wagon, throwing it, the horse, and the occupants of the wagon a considerable distance from the crossing. As a result of the collision, Ilardi was almost instantly killed.

The evidence further shows that the day upon which the accident occurred was cloudy; that it had been raining during most of the day; and that a heavy southeast wind was prevailing at the time of the accident. Sansone testified that when he reached a point about 25 feet from the Vina Vista crossing he stopped the horse and looked to the north and to the south; that he saw or heard no train coming from either direction and then proceeded on toward the crossing; that when at a distance of 5 feet from the crossing he again halted the horse and again looked in both directions to see if there was a train approaching, and also listened for the noise or some signal of one, but that he neither saw nor heard one and so started across the track, with the result as above described.

A number of witnesses testified that the train, just before it struck the wagon, was traveling at from 30 to 40 miles an hour, and certain witnesses testified that they heard no whistle or other signal proceed from the train, while there were others who said that, a few seconds before the collision they heard a loud, long whistle, followed in close succession by two short, shrill whistles. And while some of the witnesses testified that they could see up and down the track at the time of the accident a distance of five or six blocks, Sansone testified that on account of the darkness of the day, due to the cloudy skies and the lateness of the day, he could see no greater distance, either up or down the track, than 250 feet. He further testified that the deceased did not at any time, before they turned and started to cross the track, say anything or look either up or down the track. He was merely "sitting there," said the witness. The testimony further showed that Ilardi, before he received the injury to his eye, had for a long time almost daily gone to his place of employment and returned to his home on Vina Vista street on the cars of the appellant, and was, of course, familiar with the existence of the railroad track at said street.

The motorman testified that the train at the time of the accident was traveling at the rate of from 15 to 18 miles an hour. He further testified that he possibly could have stopped the train within a distance of 150 feet. He admitted that the last crossing signal he sounded before the collision was at a point between Hartley and Vine streets, and just after leaving the former street, which is north of Vine, and that he did not blow the whistle for the Vina Vista street crossing until he saw the horse and wagon in the act of crossing the track at said street. The motorman, according to his testimony, first observed the wagon in which Sansone and the deceased were riding before he reached Vine street. He said that he noticed the vehicle particularly because it was traveling on the wrong side of the road; that he kept his eyes on the wagon, thinking possibly that it might be turned to pass over one of the street crossings; that when he was near Vine street the wagon was very near Vina Vista street. The horse was traveling at a very slow rate of speed—not over 2 or 3 miles an hour according to his best judgment. It should be stated that Vina Vista street is the next street to Vine street, being south of the latter street. C. M. Elliott, a civil engineer, testified that he measured the distance from the center of Vine to the center of Vina Vista street and found it to be 345 feet.

The witness Currier, whose home was on Vine street on the west side of the Upper Stockton road, testifying for the defendant, stated that he was on his way home on foot from Sacramento and about three blocks from Vina Vista street when the collision occurred; that he heard a loud shrill whistle from the street car when it was about 50 feet from Vine street, but whether about 50 feet above or below he said that he was unable to remember; that almost simultaneously with the hearing of the whistle, he looked down the road and saw the horse driven by Sansone in the act of going upon and across the railroad track at Vina Vista street. He said that it was his best judgment that at the time the train blew its whistle the nose of the horse drawing Sansone's wagon was as far as the track.

The foregoing embraces a statement of the facts and the testimony necessary to have in view and to be considered in passing upon the points urged upon this appeal for a reversal. The grounds urged for the reversal of the judgment, generally stating them, are: (1) That the deceased failed to exercise due care to avoid the accident and was guilty of contributory negligence which proximately caused his death; (2) error in giving, modifying, and refusing to give certain instructions.

[1] 1. We may pretermit any expression of opinion upon the question whether the evidence shows that Sansone, owner and, at the time of the accident, driver of the horse and wagon, was guilty of negligence proximately causing the accident and the consequent injury to and death of Ilardi; for, as we understand counsel for the appellant, they do not claim that the negligence of Sansone is imputable to Ilardi. The cases are quite uniform in the enunciation of the rule that a person riding as a passenger or guest in a vehicle driven by another may not be charged with the negligence of the latter which has caused injury to the former, unless the passenger or guest has the right to exercise control over the driver of the vehicle, or "in the eyes of the law may be said to possess such power of control" (Bryant v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 739, 164 Pac. 385), or unless it is made to appear that the passenger or guest himself actively participated in the negligence of the driver. See, in addition to case above cited, the following: Wilson v. Puget Sound Co., 52 Wash. 522, 101 Pac. 50, 132 Am. St. Rep. 1044; Howe v. Minneapolis, etc., Ry. Co., 62 Minn. 71, 64 N. W. 102, 30 L. R. A. 684, 54 Am. St. Rep. 616; Clarke v. Conn. Co., 83 Conn. 219, 76 Atl. 523; United Rys. & Elec. Co., etc., v. Crain et al., 123 Md. 332, 91 Atl. 405; Hermann v. R. I. Co., 36 R. I. 447, 90 Atl. 813; Chadbourne v. Springfield St. Ry. Co., 199 Mass. 574, 85 N. E. 737; Perez v. N. O. City & L. R. Co. et al., 47 La. 1391, 17 South. 869; Lininger v. S. F. Railroad Co., 18 Cal. App. 411, 123 Pac. 235; Bresee v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 149 Cal. 131, 85 Pac. 152, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1059; Fujise v. Pac. Elec. R. Co., 12 Cal. App. 207, 107 Pac. 317; Parmenter v. McDougall, 172 Cal. 306, 156 Pac. 460. But it is argued that, because the deceased, before Sansone started to drive across the track, knowing that trains at frequent intervals during the day passed over the track, failed to look up and down the track to ascertain whether or not a train was approaching, but remained passive or quietly in his seat on the wagon, saying nothing and doing nothing, this court is justified in declaring that, as a matter of law, he did not exercise ordinary care for his own safety, or, in other words, that he was guilty of negligence proximately contributing to his fatal injuries.

[2-6] It is obviously true, as the above-cited cases plainly point out, that, while a guest or a passenger riding in a vehicle with another is not chargeable with the latter's negligence which has directly resulted in injury to the passenger or guest, the law nevertheless casts upon such passenger or guest in such case the duty of exercising ordinary care for his own safety, and the court in this case in clear language so instructed the jury. But unless the evidence shows beyond question that the passenger or guest failed to exercise such care as was necessary for his own safety, then the question whether he was remiss in that respect or was guilty of negligence contributing to his injury is primarily for the jury. The burden was cast upon the defendant to show that the deceased failed to exercise such care for his own safety as was required of him to charge the defendant with legal responsibility for his death. The question here, then, is whether there was any justification for the implied finding of the jury that the deceased was not culpable in that respect. There is no evidence of any overt or affirmative act of negligence on the part of Ilardi or that he participated in the negligence of Sansone, assuming the latter to have been guilty of negligence, by urging him, with knowledge of the near approach of a train, or with knowledge that he (Sansone) had not looked and listened to ascertain whether there was a train near at hand, to proceed on over the crossing. Nor is there any evidence that Sansone was an incompetent or careless driver, or that Ilardi had any reason to suppose that he was not competent to drive the horse properly, or to believe that Sansone was not doing his duty by looking for approaching trains. It is true, if we accept Sansone's testimony as to that matter, that Ilardi said nothing and did nothing and looked neither to the north nor south before the horse was started by Sansone over the crossing; but this did not constitute negligence per se or such acts of omission as to justify the conclusion or declaration, as a matter of law, that he failed to use due care for his own safety, since he was a mere guest of Sansone, riding with the latter by his permission and sufferance, and, having no interest in the plans or purposes for which Sansone was then using the horse and vehicle, and was without any right or power to exercise any control over the latter in the management of the vehicle. Moreover, the deceased knew that Sansone, having been accustomed for some time to driving over the Vina Vista crossing, knew as fully or as well as he did that trains passed frequently over the railroad track every day, and, as there is, as stated, no evidence that Sansone was ordinarily a careless driver or did not know how to manage a vehicle drawn by a horse, the deceased had the right to assume that Sansone would exercise reasonable care and caution in making the crossing.

Furthermore, in considering whether the deceased exercised the care which is required of a person situated as he was, the jury were entitled to and probably did take into account these facts: That the day was more or less darkened by clouds; that the accident occurred at a late hour of a midwinter day; that a strong wind was blowing from the southeast and in the opposite direction from which the train was traveling, the natural effect of which was to drive the noise which usually proceeds from a moving train from the direction and the hearing of himself and Sansone. Besides, the eyesight of the deceased was greatly impaired, and, if the jury believed Sansone when he said that he looked and saw no train approaching (and it cannot be said that they did not), then it is probable that they concluded that if the deceased did look to the north he was no more likely to see the train than was Sansone, and that they had the right to believe, notwithstanding Sansone's apparent statement to the contrary, that the deceased did look to see whether there was a train approaching the crossing over which they were about to pass, there can be no doubt, since it was made to appear that the deceased was perfectly familiar with the conditions existing as to the crossing, having passed over it innumerable times and having almost as frequently ridden on the defendant's cars from that point, and since, furthermore, the presumption is (a disputable presumption, it is true) that the deceased exercised due care for his own safety, having in view the surrounding conditions with which he was familiar. Baltimore & Potomac R. R. Co. v. Landrigan, 191 U. S. 461, 24 Sup. Ct. 137, 48 L. Ed. 362; Drouillard v. S. P. Co., 172 Pac. 405. What more the deceased could have done than what he did do under all the circumstances, it is not easy to suggest. He had no right to interfere with Sansone's management of the horse and vehicle, and, as the cases say, in most instances such interference by the passenger or guest where the vehicle is about to be placed in a position of danger might prove to be gross imprudence and so disconcert the driver as to cause the disastrous result which such interference was designed to avoid. See Howe v. Minneapolis, etc., Ry. Co., 62 Minn. 71, 64 N. W. 102, 30 L. R. A. 684, 54 Am. St. Rep. 616, 620, and the other cases above named. The jury were justified in concluding that all he could do under the circumstances was to remain quiet, as he did, and to rely upon the driver, who had exclusive control and management of the horse and vehicle.

In Hermann v. Rhode Island Co., 36 R. I. 447, 90 Atl. 813, supra, the plaintiff was injured as the result of a collision between the automobile in which she was riding as the guest of the owner and driver of the machine with a railroad train of the defendant. The court in that case said:

> "In accordance with both reason and the weight of authority, any negligence on the part of Berghmann (driver of the auto) which may have contributed to bring about the collision cannot be imputed to either of these plaintiffs (husband and wife having joined in the suit), between whom and Berghmann no relation of master and servant, principal and agent, or participators in a common enterprise, existed in fact, or should be implied in law. It is the duty of such guest or passenger, in circumstances similar to the one under consideration, to use reasonable care for his own safety. Whether he has exercised such a degree of care is primarily a question for the jury. It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that such guest or passenger is guilty of negligence because he has done nothing. In many such cases, the highest degree of caution may consist of inaction. In situations of great and sudden peril meddlesome interference with those having control, either by physical act or by disturbing suggestions and needless warnings, may be exceedingly disastrous in its result. While it is true that it is the duty of such guest or passenger not to submit himself and his safety solely to the prudence of the driver of the vehicle, and that he must himself use reasonable care for his own safety, nevertheless, he should not in any case be held guilty of contributory negligence merely because he has done nothing."

The court then proceeds to state certain conditions the existence of which would justly lead to the conclusion that the guest or passenger had not used the requisite care for his own safety and so not be entitled to recover for his injury. None of the suppositious conditions so suggested, however, was shown to exist in this case. The other cases above cited, notably Wilson v. Puget Sound Elec. Ry. Co., 52 Wash. 522, 101 Pac. 50, 132 Am. St. Rep. 1044, supra, express views similar to those above reproduced herein from the Hermann Case.

Our conclusion is that the question whether the deceased was guilty of negligence which directly caused his death was, under the circumstances of the case as presented, one exclusively for the jury's determination.

[7] 2. The complaint against the court's charge is aimed at those portions thereof whereby the question was submitted to the jury whether the defendant, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, could have prevented the accident, and the failure to do so constituted the proximate cause of the accident and its consequences, notwithstanding that the deceased himself might have been guilty of antecedent negligence contributing to the collision. This proposition involves the doctrine known as the "last clear chance" or opportunity, and there was evidence justifying the court in submitting that question to the jury. In substantiation of this statement, we have only to refer to the conduct of the deceased as above described, to the testimony of Sansone that, although just before starting over the crossing he looked up and down the track, he saw no train coming from either direction, and particularly to the testimony of Elliott, the civil engineer, who measured and gave the distance between Vine and Vina Vista streets, to that of the witness Currier, who testified that almost at the very time he heard the whistle of the car near Vine street he saw Sansone in the act of driving over the crossing at Vina Vista street, the horse's nose then being as far as the track, and to that of the motorman who testified that he could possibly have stopped the train at the rate at which it was then going within a distance of 150 feet, and further testified that he saw Sansone and the deceased for several blocks before they reached Vina Vista street and kept close watch of their movements all the way down.

Elliott, it will be recalled, said that the distance from the center of Vine to the center of Vina Vista street was 345 feet. Currier, although not certain whether when he heard the whistle the train was 50 feet north or 50 feet south of Vine street, was reasonably certain that it was not more than 50 feet from said street on either side. Manifestly, if when the train whistled it was 50 feet north of Vine street, there was then an intervening distance between the train and Vina Vista crossing of over 400 feet. If, however, the train was 50 feet south of Vine when it blew its whistle, there was still approximately 300 feet between the train at that point and the Vina Vista crossing and, according to the motorman himself, he could have stopped the train after Sansone had driven partly on the track so as to have avoided the collision. Thus the question whether the defendant could have prevented the accident by the exercise of a proper degree of care and diligence was introduced into the case, and it was obviously proper for the court to instruct the jury upon that issue.

[8] Typical of the several instructions given by the court and addressed to that question is the following:

> "One having knowledge of the dangerous situation of another and having a clear opportunity, by the exercise of proper care, to avoid injuring another, must do so, notwithstanding that the latter has placed himself in such situation of danger by his own negligence. If, therefore, you should find from the evidence that the motorman of defendant's car which collided with the wagon saw the decedent on the wagon on the track, and could have stopped the train without injury to the same or to its passengers, and by so stopping the train within the shortest time and space possible under the circumstances, could have avoided the collision, and neglected to do so, in consequence of which neglect to stop the train, the decedent was killed, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict."

There can be no doubt that the above instruction involves a correct general statement of the rule.

[9-11] Of course, in a case where the evidence plainly and clearly showed that the injured party himself had an opportunity (of which he then had knowledge) to relieve himself of the perilous position into which he had negligently placed himself, and could have done so by the exercise of reasonable diligence and thus himself have avoided the accident, then such a situation would be presented as is to be found in several of the cases cited by the defendant. In such a case, it would be no less the duty of the party so placing himself in such a position to prevent the accident than it would be for the other party to do so, and if under such circumstances an accident occurred and damage to person or property resulted, the negligence of the party placing himself in the position of danger would be a continuing, active, concurring cause thereof. But no such a case is presented here. While a railroad crossing over a public street is itself a signal of a danger, and those attempting to make the crossing must always exercise due care and caution, still the public obviously have the right to pass over it. The mere act of passing over the crossing is not negligence per se. There is negligence only when the attempt is made to pass over the crossing without first using reasonable care in ascertaining in the proper way whether there is a train on the track approaching the crossing or about to approach it. There is evidence here that Sansone looked both ways before he started over the track and saw no train before and at the time the horse and vehicle were started over the crossing; that the train suddenly and unexpectedly came upon Sansone and the deceased; and that therefore their position unexpectedly became one of peril only when it was too late for them to withdraw therefrom in time to have avoided the accident. Thus it is clear that upon that question the case was one peculiarly for the jury, or, in other words, not a case where, as is true of the cases cited by the defendant, it can be said, as a matter of law, that the negligence of the deceased was a continuing, active, efficient, concurring cause of the accident and its consequences.

We have found no legal reason for disturbing the judgment, and it is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WEBSTER. (Cr. 672.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑829(1) — REQUEST FOR CAUTIONARY INSTRUCTION.

Requested cautionary instruction, in prosecution for rape, was sufficiently covered by charge to consider the matter calmly, dispassionately, and deliberately, as they would any other accusation, to be very careful, and to weigh, analyze, and consider the testimony carefully and guardedly.

2. RAPE 🔑42 — EVIDENCE — CHARACTER OF ACCUSED.

In prosecution for rape, prosecuting attorney's question whether witness knew that accused had been sentenced to the penitentiary for rape was improper and unfair; the judgment referred to having been reversed.

3. RAPE 🔑42 — EVIDENCE — CHARACTER OF ACCUSED.

In prosecution for rape, the assistant district attorney could properly inquire whether witnesses had heard that accused had been previously accused of rape; such accusations, even if untrue, bearing on reputation.

4. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑718, 722½—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL.

There can be no excuse for flagrantly improper conduct of assistant district attorney, in referring to prior conviction for similar offense after the court had stricken out all reference thereto, and in saying what he would do, had prosecutrix in rape case been his daughter.

5. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1171(1) — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR.

But such error was harmless, where the record of defendant's guilt was very clear and convincing.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Warren M. Webster was convicted of an attempt to commit rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. P. Wickes, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ZOOK, Acting Presiding Judge pro tem. In this case, upon an information charging him with rape, the defendant was convicted of an attempt to commit rape. No useful purpose would be subserved by a recital of the facts upon which the defendant was convicted; but the evidence, which showed a prompt complaint by the little girl to her mother, an immediate medical examination, followed by the arrest of the defendant on the day of the offense, a straightforward story told by the prosecuting witness on the stand, and a rambling and incoherent tale on the part of the defendant, was amply sufficient to warrant the conviction.

[1] Only two points are urged for reversal of the judgment; one being the refusal of the court to give a cautionary instruction requested by defendant, and the other being misconduct on the part of the district attorney. While the instruction offered might well have been given, we are satisfied that the trial court fully covered the points involved therein when it instructed the jury to consider the matter "calmly, dispassionately, and deliberately," as they would any other accusation, and that they were "to be very careful in any such case," and should "carefully and guardedly weigh, analyze, and consider the testimony against the defendant."

[2, 3] On cross-examination of one of defendant's character witnesses, the assistant district attorney, Mr. McWood, asked the following question:

"Do you know that on the 28th day of February, 1896, he [the defendant] was sentenced to San Quentin for rape?"

As the trial judge stated at the time, the judgment referred to was reversed by the Supreme Court, and the question, in the form put, was manifestly improper and unfair. However, defendant's counsel did not assign the question as misconduct, but made a request that the jury be instructed to disregard it, which request was promptly granted. In the examination of subsequent character witnesses, the district attorney asked them if they had ever heard that the defendant had been accused of rape before. This was proper, as even untrue accusations have their bearing on a person's reputation.

[4, 5] Upon the argument, Mr. McWood, in flagrant disregard of the fact that the court had stricken out all reference to the previous judgment, deliberately referred thereto again, and also made some highly inflammatory statements as to what he himself would have done, had his own daughter been treated as prosecutrix had been. There is, and can be, no excuse for this conduct on the part of the assistant district attorney, and in a case that was at all close such conduct would compel a reversal; but in this case the record of defendant's guilt is so clear and convincing that we are constrained to hold that the misconduct of the assistant district attorney has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice. It is to be noted that the trial judge endeavored to keep the assistant district attorney within bounds in every way, except by fining him for contempt, a procedure which may commend itself to trial courts in the future under similar circumstances.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. JUDGMENT 🔑250 — RELIEF — SCOPE OF PLEADINGS.

A party is not only entitled to any and all relief which is appropriately within the scope of his pleading, but may be awarded such relief upon any substantial legal or equitable ground coming within the fair and reasonable import of the averments of his pleading.

2. JUDGMENT 🔑250 — RELIEF — SCOPE OF PLEADINGS.

In a suit to annul a contract for the exchange of real estate for certain lands and corporation bonds, where the complaint alleged that defendant had no title to the lands, and that the bonds were worthless, judgment based on failure of consideration could properly have been rendered within the pleadings, if supported by the evidence.

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER 🔑44 — FRAUD AND WANT OF CAPACITY—EVIDENCE.

In suit to set aside an exchange of lands by plaintiff's decedent on the ground of fraudulent representations and weakened mental capacity, evidence held to warrant a finding that plaintiff's decedent was mentally capable of so conducting the transaction as to protect his own interests.

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER 🔑44—EVIDENCE.

In a suit to set aside a contract for the exchange of lands between plaintiff's decedent and defendants on the ground that one of the defendants fraudulently represented his interest in the land, evidence held to warrant finding that such representations were not false.

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER 🔑44—MISREPRESENTATIONS—EVIDENCE.

In a suit to set aside a contract made by plaintiff's decedent for an exchange of lands for corporation bonds on the ground of false representation that the bonds were worth $600 each, evidence held to warrant a finding for defendant that no such representation was made.

6. VENDOR AND PURCHASER 🔑44—MISREPRESENTATIONS—EVIDENCE — "SPECULATIVE OR TRADING VALUE."

In a suit to set aside a contract made by plaintiff's decedent for an exchange of lands for corporation bonds alleged to be worthless, evidence held to warrant a finding that the bonds had a "speculative or trading value," that is, a value following from a possibility or probability dependent on the future management of the corporation, that they would acquire a substantial market value.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by Samuel C. Haight, executor of the estate of George W. Haight, deceased, substituted as plaintiff, and another, against W. H. Stewart and others. From judgment for defendants and denial of a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Leon Martin, of San Francisco, for appellants. Duard F. Geis, of Willow, for respondents.

HART, J. George W. Haight and his wife, Mary Setchel Haight, commenced the action for the purpose of having rescinded a certain contract between the plaintiff, George W. Haight, and the defendant, W. H. Stewart, and to have declared null and void two certain deeds of conveyance. After the trial of the case and before judgment was entered George W. Haight died, and his executor, Samuel C. Haight, was substituted as one of the plaintiffs.

The complaint shows that during the month of November, 1911, George W. Haight and W. H. Stewart were negotiating for an exchange of certain properties. On the 22d of November they entered into a written agreement by which said Haight agreed to convey to Stewart a tract of land situated in Glenn county, consisting of 760 acres, and Stewart agreed to convey to Haight his interest in certain lands in Mendocino county, subject to certain specified incumbrances, and also to deliver to him 27 bonds of the par value of $1,000 each of the Western Consolidated Coal, Gas & Electric Company (hereinafter called "the bonds"). The transaction was consummated on the 27th day of November, 1911, by the delivery to defendant Myrtle J. Stewart, wife of W. H. Stewart, of a deed, executed by George W. Haight and his wife, conveying the Glenn county lands, and by the execution and delivery by said Stewart to George W. Haight of an assignment of all his right, title, and interest in and to the certificate of purchase of the Mendocino county lands, subject to certain incumbrances therein specified, and by the delivery to said Haight of 27 bonds of said corporation. On December 18, 1911, defendants, Myrtle J. Stewart and W. H. Stewart conveyed the Glenn county lands to J. L. Stewart, the father of W. H.

It is charged in the complaint that the above-described transaction was brought about by and through the false statements and representations of W. H. Stewart to Geo. W. Haight; that said Stewart represented to said Haight that he had title to the Mendocino county lands, whereas the title to said lands was never at any time vested in Stewart, but that the same was at the time of the transfer, and still is, in the United States government; that Stewart stated and represented to said Haight that the bonds were of the actual value of $600 each, and that he (said Stewart) had a short time previously to the transaction involved herein sold some of said bonds at that price; that said bonds were then "and now" of no value whatever and are wholly worthless for any purpose. It is alleged that said Haight, believing, accepting, and relying upon the false statements and representations so made to him by Stewart, on the 22d day of November, 1911, entered into and subscribed to the written agreement with said Stewart above mentioned, and, on the 27th day of November, 1911, in pursuance of said agreement, conveyed and transferred his Glenn county lands to said Myrtle J. Stewart. It is alleged that the said Myrtle J. Stewart knew that the statements and representations made by W. H. Stewart to said Haight were false and untrue when they were so made. It is further alleged that the said Haight, at the time of the transaction, was sick, physically and mentally, and that his mental strength had been prior to the time of the said transaction, and was at said time, greatly weakened. The complaint states that the said Haight and his wife, Mary S. Haight, the other plaintiff herein, did not know or have any knowledge that the said statements and representations made by the said W. H. Stewart at the time above mentioned respecting the bonds and the Mendocino county lands were not true until the 14th day of March, 1912, when they learned that said statements and representations were wholly false and untrue, and that the said bonds were absolutely worthless, and that the title to the Mendocino lands was still in the United States government, and not in the said W. H. Stewart. It is alleged that due notice to both W. H. Stewart and Myrtle J. Stewart was thereafter given by said Haight that he rescinded the transfer of the Glenn county lands, and that said Haight offered to restore to the Stewarts everything of value he had received from them under the agreement of November 22, 1911.

A demurrer to the complaint on general and special grounds was overruled, and the defendants thereupon answered, denying specifically the averments of the complaint, and affirmatively stating facts disclosing the nature of the transaction and the circumstances under which it was brought about.

The court, briefly stated, found: (1) That on November 22, 1911, Geo. W. Haight was the owner and in the possession of 760 acres of land in Glenn county, having a market value of $11,400. (2) That on said date W. H. Stewart was in possession of and had an interest in the Mendocino county lands described in the complaint under a certificate of purchase from the state of California numbered 15955, which said interest was of the value of $6,000, and subject to the following incumbrances: A certain mortgage thereon to one V. W. Liston, amounting to $350; a certain trust deed thereon to one H. S. Bridge in the sum of $450; delinquent taxes amounting to $250; the balance of the purchase price due to the state of California on said lands, amounting to the sum of $340; and the sum of $100 due to one H. S. Beadle, constituting a lien upon said premises. (3) That said Stewart, on the 22d day of November, 1911, was the owner and did own 27 bonds of the Western Consolidated Coal, Gas & Electric Company, having a nominal par value of $1,000 each, that said bonds had no cash market value, but that they did have a "speculative or trading value." (4) That George W. Haight and wife conveyed the Glenn lands to Myrtle J. Stewart at the request of W. H. Stewart, and received in exchange therefor the 27 bonds of the Western Consolidated Gas & Electric Company, and a conveyance of all W. H. Stewart's interest in and to the Mendocino lands. (5) That in the negotiations culminating in the agreement of November 22, 1911, W. H. Stewart told George W. Haight that said bonds were of the value of $600 each, and that he (Stewart) believed they were worth $600 each, but that said Stewart did not tell said Haight, as the complaint alleges, that the said bonds were of the reasonable market value of $600 each, and could actually be sold for said sum, and that said Stewart did not tell said Haight, as the complaint charges, that he (Stewart) was well acquainted with the value of the said bonds, and that he had, at a time immediately preceding said 22d day of November, 1911, actually sold said bonds for said sum of $600 each, and that said bonds were then actually being sold and could be sold for said sum. (6) That no fraud was practiced or perpetrated on Haight by Stewart, and that Haight was not induced or influenced to enter into and carry out the agreement of November 22, 1911, through any fraud or misrepresentation on the part of W. H. Stewart. (7) That at the time the above contract was entered into George W. Haight's health and mentality were weakened, but not to such an extent that he did not fully know and understand the details of the transaction referred to herein; that W. H. Stewart was aware of Haight's illness, but did not know that his mentality was impaired in any degree.

The appeal is by the plaintiffs from the judgment and the order denying a motion interposed by them for a new trial.

A reversal is demanded upon the ground that there is no evidence to support these findings: (1) That the said bonds had a speculative or trading value; (2) that W. H. Stewart had an interest in the Mendocino county lands; (3) that W. H. Stewart was not guilty of fraud in the matter of the agreement of November 22, 1911.

The general position of the appellants is that, the said bonds and the said assignment of the interest of W. H. Stewart in the Mendocino lands being the only consideration the plaintiffs received for conveying and transferring the Glenn county lands to Myrtle J. Stewart, if it appears from the evidence that said bonds were wholly valueless, and that W. H. Stewart had no interest in the Mendocino lands, then it must necessarily be held that the Haights conveyed away 760 acres of land, having a value of $11,400, without receiving therefor any consideration whatever; that, in such a situation, a failure of consideration is shown for which there must be a rescission of the transfer of said lands. It is contended that the evidence does show the worthlessness of the bonds, and that W. H. Stewart had no interest in the Mendocino lands, and, furthermore, that George W. Haight was in an enfeebled condition of health when the transfer and the agreement therefor were made, and that he was imposed upon and induced to enter into and consummate the transaction through the fraud of W. H. Stewart.

We may first notice the point made by the respondent that the complaint does not proceed upon the theory that there was a failure of consideration, and that such was not the theory upon which the case was tried in the court below; that the complaint is based solely upon the alleged fraud whereby the transaction was consummated, and that upon that ground alone a rescission was and is demanded; that therefore the position of appellants in this court that there was a failure of consideration is not warranted by their pleading or the essential theory thereof, and that consequently the elaborate argument in their briefs addressed to that proposition is entirely gratuitous and without pertinency or force.

[1] It is, of course, well settled in procedural law that a party is not only entitled to any and all relief which is appropriately within the scope of his pleading, but may be awarded such relief upon any substantial legal or equitable ground coming within the fair and reasonable import of the averments of his pleading. In this case it is plainly manifest that the complaint, assuming its averments to be true, reveals a clear case of failure of consideration.

[2] The statements therein are that the bonds are absolutely valueless for any purpose, and that W. H. Stewart had and has no interest in the Mendocino lands. These constituted the sole consideration for the transfer by Haight to Myrtle J. Stewart of the Glenn lands. If the bonds were worthless, and Stewart had no interest in the Mendocino lands, then surely there was a failure of consideration. The allegations of fraud and of the enfeebled mental condition of Haight were proper for the purpose of showing that thus Haight was imposed upon and induced to transfer his property for nothing or for a purported consideration which it developed was worthless or without any value. The fact is that the failure of consideration is the prominent, and, indeed, the principal factor in the cause of action stated by the complaint.

[3] We are persuaded, however, from an examination of the record, that the challenged findings are sufficiently supported to fortify them against successful attack, and that there was not a failure of consideration. We may with propriety first briefly consider the testimony relative to the mental condition of Haight for some time prior to and at the time of the making of the agreement of November 22, 1911, and the subsequent exchange of the properties above mentioned in pursuance of the provisions of said agreement.

George W. Haight was an attorney at law having offices in the city of Berkeley, and had actively practiced his profession for many years. In late years, prior to his death, in connection with his law practice, he dealt extensively in real estate, buying, selling, and exchanging real properties. While two physicians who had professionally attended him on several occasions and who likewise investigated his condition some time before and at about the time of the transaction concerned herein testified that Haight, at said times, was undergoing a decline in physical and mental strength, that he was suffering from what is known in medical science as bulbar paralysis, and that his tendency was also to a paretic condition, there was also testimony that, save a noticeable impairment of memory, he was capable of transacting business intelligently and with good judgment. His own son, the substituted plaintiff herein, testified that for a considerable period before and down to the time of the execution of the agreement of November, 1911, he was engaged in performing certain duties in his father's office and saw him daily, and that, while he observed that his father's memory was not as good as it had formerly been, he was nevertheless in full possession of his reasoning powers. The defendant W. H. Stewart testified that he had another and different real estate transaction with Haight just prior to the deal with which we are here concerned, and that at that time, as well as in all the negotiations leading to the transfer of the Glenn county lands by Haight to his (Stewart's) wife, he observed nothing either in Haight's actions or his method of transacting business indicating that he was in the slightest degree lacking in judgment or business sagacity.

In addition to the above testimony, it was shown that Haight himself prepared the agreement of November 22, 1911, and the instrument appears to have been drawn as a lawyer of skill would prepare such a document. It is in language which clearly and unambiguously expresses the propositions to which the parties had mutually agreed. There is also medical testimony tending to impeach the medical testimony presented by the plaintiffs upon the question of Haight's mental competency at the time of the making of the said agreement, and also when subsequently he made the transfer of the Glenn lands to Myrtle J. Stewart.

As to the negotiations resulting in the making of the written agreement of November 22, 1911, and the subsequent exchange of properties between George W. Haight and W. H. Stewart, the latter testified:

That he first met George W. Haight in April, 1911, with reference to a deal for some property in Boston, which was consummated in August or September; that upon the closing of that transaction Haight asked him if he had some other things he was willing to trade; that he (Stewart) said that he had an interest in a 20 per cent. certificate of purchase representing some lands in Mendocino county. Haight asked questions about the location of the lands, the climate, etc., and said: "I want to see if it is a good hunting lodge or summer home proposition and at the same time a healthy investment for the future."

The witness proceeded:

"Haight said, 'What else have you got, Stewart?' I told him, 'I have some bonds of the Western Consolidated Coal, Gas & Electric Company,' and he said, 'Why, I think I have got some of that kind, too,' and he jumped up out of his chair and opened his safe and brought out a bunch of bonds, and he said, 'Are they like this?' and I said, 'Yes; they are the same thing; do you know anything about the bonds?' and he said, 'I have looked them up, and they represent leases and fee-simple lands and a contract for between 15,000 and 20,000 acres of land,' and I asked him what he thought of them, and he said: 'You can't cash them at the bank. I have tried to; but the reason is the coal companies are fighting among themselves and quarreling and raising money to transport the coal; they have fine mines, and I found they were good.' I asked him where he got them, and he said: 'From Mr. Runnels in trade for West Berkeley property.' I asked him what he allowed him for them, and he said: 'I allowed him full cash value, because I think they are good bonds, although, of course, you will have to wait. What are you holding these bonds at?' and I said: 'Judge, I don't know. I don't know what they are worth. All I know is what they got me. * * * Some of them cost me 30 cents on the dollar and some 25 cents.' The judge jumped out of his chair and said to me: 'These bonds must be valuable. Anything that has any interest in coal mines on the Pacific Coast can't help but be good things.'"

The witness said that Haight gave him a description of his Glenn county lands and asked him if he had an abstract of title to the Mendocino county lands. Stewart produced a certificate of search and handed it to Mr. Haight, who looked it over and remarked: "This shows the property in the name of Marcus D. Hyde." The witness said: "Yes; Mr. Hyde is holding it for me." Haight said: "I will look it over. I am not satisfied about the bonds, but I will look them up, too." In about a week or ten days Stewart returned to the office of Mr. Haight, who said: "I have found out that the 20 per cent. certificate of purchase is prima facie evidence of title, but, of course, the title is not in you. You have no deed or patent, but you will have title in proper time; you will be patent owner of the land. I found that it is a negotiable title, and that a man can buy or sell or borrow money, and I am satisfied." Stewart asked: "Did you look up the bonds any more?" to which Haight replied: "Yes; I looked the bonds up. * * * I am willing to take a chance and wait for them to quit fighting, and when they settle down and get a railroad in the bonds will go up and if I can get them cheap enough I will take them." There was a discussion of values of the different properties and of the timber and tanbark on the Mendocino county lands, and considerable figuring was done. The witness said he figured that there was timber on the land of the value of $6,000, and from 400 to 600 cords of tanbark worth from $4 to $6 per cord, and that with the $6,000 worth of timber "that would make a total valuation of $8,400. We wrote that down," continued Stewart, and he [Haight] asked: "How do you then figure the bonds?" The witness replied: "Judge, that is a question about the bonds. I don't know what they are worth. I am not positive on them. You know about them better than I do." Haight then said: "I have 720 acres at Willows. If you will give me these 27 bonds and your interest in the timber lands, subject to the incumbrances against them, I will give you that land up at Willows, and you can see what you can do with it." Stewart, continuing, testified: "We figured it right here. Judge Haight and I both figured it, and the timber land figured out $8,400, less about $1,500 in debts against it—old incumbrances against it, and I said, 'Now, these bonds would average me between 25 and 50 cents on the dollar, because some cost me 50 cents and some 25 cents on the dollar;' and he said, 'That is as much as I would allow.'" Stewart then said to Haight that he would think it over and see him later, and Haight said, "All right and I will think it over, too, and I will see if I can find out any more information about the bonds, and maybe I will do better." About one week after said conversation, which was on November 22, 1911, Stewart returned to Haight's office and met the judge, who thereupon asked Stewart what he then thought of the proposed deal. Stewart said, "In view of the fact that I had moved away from where I was, I would be willing to trade on the basis that he [Haight] proposed," and the latter replied, "Well, if you want to make the deal, I will call in the stenographer and dictate a preliminary contract so we can tie each other up." The trading agreement was thereupon dictated to the stenographer by Haight, and, being written up, was signed by Stewart and Haight on November 22, 1911. Stewart again called at Haight's office, and the papers transferring the respective properties were executed and exchanged. Among these instruments was an agreement between Stewart and Marcus D. Hyde in which the latter agreed to quitclaim the Mendocino county lands to Stewart upon the payment of $20, which agreement Stewart assigned to Haight.

A timber cruiser and expert testified that he examined the Mendocino lands, either in January or February of the year 1911, and found thereon about 5,000,000 of feet of red fir timber, about 1,000,000 feet of redwood and about 400 cords of tanbark; that prior to making said investigation he was not acquainted with and had never met W. H. Stewart, having made the examination of the lands at the request of one Borden; that in November, 1911, he had business with Geo. W. Haight in his office, and was in the act of leaving the office when he met W. H. Stewart going into Haight's office; that Stewart requested the witness to return with him to the office of Haight and tell the latter what he knew of the lands; that he did so, drew a diagram of the land, and produced some photographs showing how much timber it contained, and told Haight of the quantity and quality of the timber on the land.

Samuel C. Haight testified that he knew very little of the details of the transactions between his father and W. H. Stewart, and that he had no conversation with his father regarding said transactions, except that his father "spoke of his enthusiastic desire to own a piece of timber land."

There is testimony by one witness that the $1,000 bonds were selling for $5 to $10 each, and by another witness that they were worth from $10 to $25 each in November, 1911.

There is also some testimony tending to show that Judge Haight was very desirous of securing the Mendocino lands because he believed they were suitable for a country home, which he appeared to be anxious to have located in the mountains, where there were opportunities for fishing and hunting.

[4, 5] Thus we have presented herein a statement in substance of the testimony upon which the trial court grounded the findings, and nothing more need be said of it than that it is amply sufficient to support the conclusions evidenced by said findings that George W. Haight, at the time of making the agreement and the transfer in question, while not in his usual good health, was nevertheless mentally capable of intelligently, understandingly, and properly conducting those transactions so as to safeguard his own interests, and that there were no false representations by Stewart as to the nature or extent or value of his interest in the Mendocino lands, nor misrepresentations or subreption upon his part as to the bonds in question or their value. As to the bonds, it is quite clear that the court was warranted in finding that Stewart did not represent to Haight that they were of the value of $600 each. Stewart not only denied making any such representation, but the proposition is unreasonable upon its face. It is hardly conceivable—at least it is not consistent with a reasonable view—that a sane man would have the temerity to represent or pretend that securities which, with a valuable equity in a tract of land, he was willing to exchange for a tract of land of the value of $11,400, were actually worth, at the time of the proposed exchange, the sum of $16,400.

[6] It is vigorously argued, however, that the bonds had no value whatever, and that the court's finding that they had a "speculative or trading value" is wholly meaningless. There is some evidence tending to show that the bonds had some value. Haight certainly believed that they had some value, and, according to the findings, based that belief upon his own personal knowledge of them. In discussing the bonds with Stewart, he, in effect, expressed the opinion, founded upon what he knew of the corporation by which they were issued, that they would develop into valuable securities if the affairs of said corporation were properly managed in the future; that is, to be more specific, he said that they would become valuable if the corporation could secure or "take in" a railroad to be used for its purposes. In brief, the general trend of his talk respecting the bonds was that he had some confidence that they would at some future time acquire substantial value. And it was doubtless upon this testimony and the testimony of other witnesses that in November, 1911, the $1,000 bonds were worth from $5 to $10 each, one witness stated, and from $10 to $25 each, another witness stated, that the court based the finding that at the time of the deal between Stewart and Haight they had a "speculative or trading value," that is to say, as we understand that phrase, that they had a value following from a possibility or probability, dependent upon the future happening of certain contingencies respecting the affairs of the company issuing them, that they would in the future acquire a substantial cash market value.

It is contended, however, that Stewart having no title to the Mendocino lands, the same still being in the United States government, he had no valuable or any interest therein which he could transfer. But, in the first place, it is to be remarked that Stewart testified, and the certificate of search, which, as seen, was examined by Haight, showed, and upon this testimony the court found, that Stewart did not claim nor represent or state to Haight that he was vested with title to the lands, but stated that he had such interest therein only as was embraced within the scope of the certificate of purchase from the state of California. In the second place, it is to be observed that the lands, although the title thereto was still in the federal government, had been duly selected as lieu by the state, was open to sale by the state when Stewart received his certificate of purchase (Pol. Code, § 3513), and that said certificate was subject to sale by the owner or holder thereof by deed or assignment (Pol. Code, §§ 3514 and 3515). Quite clearly the cases cited by the appellants that no title to the public lands of the United States passes to the state or to purchasers from the state until the lands are certified over to the state by the Commissioner of the General Land Office are not in point here, since there is, as seen, no claim that Stewart attempted to convey the title to the Mendocino lands to Haight, nor made any pretense of being able to do so or of doing so when negotiating and consummating the deal between him and Haight.

Thus we find an answer to the contention of the appellants that there was a total failure of consideration for the transfer of the Glenn lands by Haight to Myrtle J. Stewart. There was a consideration, and a valuable one, according to the finding of the trial court. It is true that there is a wide difference between the value of the Glenn lands, as found by the court, and that of Stewart's interest in the Mendocino lands, as likewise found. But it is not necessarily to be held to follow from that fact that there was a failure of consideration or that the consideration moving to the plaintiffs for the transfer of the Glenn lands was so inadequate as to "shock the conscience," and so justify a court of equity in setting aside the transfer as involving an inequitable and unconscionable transaction. The parties to this transaction each had full and an equal opportunity for an independent and thorough investigation of the facts of the proposed transfer, and each exercised and relied upon his own independent judgment in negotiating and consummating the transaction. They sustained no relation of confidence to each other, and dealt with each other at arm's length. It is clear that Judge Haight conducted his end of the transaction with his eyes wide open. He examined the certificate of search of the Mendocino lands which plainly showed the nature of Stewart's interest therein and the incumbrances to which that interest was subject. He owned, and for a long time previously to the transfer had owned and had in his possession, bonds similar to those which he received in the deal from Stewart. He knew as well as did Stewart, if not better than the latter, what those bonds were and what they amounted to. Neither probably considered that they possessed much if any cash value then. As the learned trial judge said in deciding the case:

> Both the "parties probably knew that efforts were being made to place the company on its feet. If these efforts were successful, the bonds would greatly increase in value. They were an inviting investment to one who was willing to take desperate chances of losing a small investment in the hope of repaying a profit of many hundred per cent."

Prof. Pomeroy, in his work on Eq. Juris. (3d Ed.) § 926, says:

> "Where the parties were both in a situation to form an independent judgment concerning the transaction, and acted knowingly and intentionally, mere inadequacy in the price, * * * unaccompanied by other inequitable incidents, is never of itself a sufficient ground for canceling an executed or executory contract."

See, also, the late case of Hallidie v. First Federal Trust Co., etc., 171 Pac. 431.

It is not always readily or easily determinable what is an adequate consideration in a given case for the transfer of property. Many and various elements may be necessary to be considered in determining that question. While, in most instances, the principal criterion is probably the market value of the property or the value for the purposes to which it may the most advantageously be put, yet it is often proper to consider other special motives or purposes, if any there be, of the parties in making and receiving the transfer. Sentimental or peculiar personal reasons, having no reference either to the intrinsic or market value of the property, may be the controlling motive of the sale and purchase. Hence, "as Hobbes says," quoting from Ruling Case Law, vol. 6, § 85:

> "The value of all things contracted for is measured by the appetite of the contractors. Accordingly the courts do not ordinarily go into the question of equality or inequality of considerations, but act upon the presumption that parties capable to contract are capable of regulating the terms of their contracts, granting relief only when the inequality is shown to have arisen from mistake, misrepresentation, or fraud. A different rule would in every case impose upon the court the necessity of inquiring into and of determining the value of the property received by the party giving the promise. Such a course is deemed to be impracticable. In all cases, therefore, where the assumption or undertaking is founded upon the sale or exchange of merchandise or property, or upon other than a money consideration, and the promise has been deliberately made, the law looks no further than to see that the obligation rests upon a consideration; that is, one recognized as legal, and of some value. It is sufficient if it is of only slight value, or such as can be of value to the promisor. Where a party contracts for the performance of an act which will afford him pleasure, gratify his ambition, please his fancy, or express his appreciation of a service another has done him, his estimate of value should be left undisturbed, unless, indeed, there is evidence of fraud. There is, in such a case, absolutely no rule by which the courts can be guided, if once they depart from the value fixed by the promisor. If they attempt to fix some standard, it must necessarily be an arbitrary one, and ascertained only by mere conjecture. If, in the class of cases mentioned, there is any legal consideration for a promise, it must be sufficient for the one made; for, if this is not so, the result is that the court substitutes its final judgment for that of the promisor, and, in doing this, makes a new contract."

In this case as shown, there is evidence that Judge Haight was anxious to secure a country home in the mountains, and that he had an "enthusiastic desire" to own some timber land. His Glenn county lands, as the evidence shows, were what are commonly known as "goose lands," and were so plentifully charged with alkali as to render them unfit for general agricultural purposes. It further appears that he was then and for some time prior had been renting them for $200 per year, a little more than enough to pay the taxes on them. It was probably his desire to get that unproductive and unprofitable tract off his hands and at the same time secure timber land and such a location for a country home as his heart longed for that largely influenced him to make the trade. At any rate, the evidence shows that he received a valuable consideration for his Glenn county lands, and, being perfectly competent to transact business intelligently and understandingly, that he deliberately and intentionally and in reliance upon his own independent judgment entered into and consummated the transaction. He must therefore stand by the bargain of his own making.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

PROPHET v. KATZENBERGER.

1. CONTRACTS 🔑346(8) — SUFFICIENCY OF PERFORMANCE—ISSUES AND PROOF.

In action for damages due to defective drain installed by defendant contractor in building constructed for plaintiff, where defendant admitted that according to plans and specifications he was required to place a galvanized iron drain from the light well as alleged in complaint, and the only difference between such admission and the allegations of complaint was that the complaint stated that according to the specifications the drain should have been of vitrified iron, it was unnecessary for plaintiff to introduce in evidence the specifications as a foundation for proof that work as done did not conform thereto, where no issue was raised as to the substitution of galvanized iron.

2. CONTRACTS 🔑350(1)—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In action for damages resulting from settling of building constructed by defendant for plaintiff, it being alleged that settling was due to too narrow footing for foundation and accumulation of water in basement because of defective drain, evidence held to support findings for plaintiff.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1040(11)—HARMLESS ERROR—OVERRULING DEMURRER.

Assuming that plaintiff's second and third counts were uncertain or unintelligible in some particulars, overruling defendant's demurrer thereto would not constitute any ground for reversal, where by his answer defendant raised all issues necessary for determination of action upon merits.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Action by Charles Prophet against Valentin Katzenberger. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robt. T. Linney and Gordon L. Finley, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Loeb, Walker & Loeb, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. By the findings of the trial court the following facts appear: On September 27, 1912, plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract in writing for the construction by the defendant of a building upon a parcel of land owned by the plaintiff. Defendant was to furnish all necessary materials and labor and to construct and complete the building in a good, skillful, and workmanlike manner, in conformity with the plans and specifications therefor. The building was constructed and paid for within the time prescribed by the contract, but it was not in all respects constructed in accordance with the terms of the contract. By the plans and specifications it was provided that the building should stand upon a concrete foundation placed immediately and continuously under the exterior walls of the building, said concrete foundation or footing to extend below the walls to a prescribed depth and to be of a thickness graduated so that the footing at its base should be of a thickness of 24 inches. Instead thereof the defendant made the foundation or footing in such manner that the thickness at the base thereof was in many places considerably and materially less than 24 inches. The plans provided that the defendant should install an iron drain beginning at the light well of the building, as shown upon the plans, extending from the light well under the cement floor of the north storeroom of the building, passing under the front wall of the building, and extending to the gutter of the street in front of the building. Instead of complying with this term of the agreement, the defendant installed and placed a defective drain, in this: That he installed a drain in which were two holes of the approximate size respectively of 2 and 2½ inches in diameter and occurring at a point in the pipe where the same lay under the cement floor of the north storeroom. The failure and neglect of defendant, as above stated, was unknown to and without the consent of the plaintiff. A little more than one year after the completion of the building, to wit, in February, 1914, there was a heavy fall of rain within the territory in which said building was located, by reason whereof a large quantity of water accumulated in and about the building, and in particular in and about the portions of the footings of the building under the north wall, the northerly portion of the front wall, and the northerly portion of the rear wall thereof, and by reason of said rain a large quantity of water passed into the drain leading from the light well. By reason of the defective character of the drain, the water passing into the drain escaped in large quantities through the abovementioned holes and accumulated and stood in large quantities under the cement floor, by reason whereof the footing under the north wall and under the northerly portion of the front wall and northerly portion of the rear wall of the building gave way and settled, whereby the building was injured to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $927.27. At the time of said injury the north storeroom was rented at the monthly rental of $30; and by reason of the settling of the building the storeroom was vacated and remained vacant for a period of two months, to the special damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $60. At the time when plaintiff paid to the defendant the contract price for the construction of the building, and at all times prior to the time of said rainstorm of February, 1914, the defects of the building were concealed and latent, and were unknown to the plaintiff. In response to an issue raised by affirmative allegations of the answer, the court found that the plaintiff was not at any time during the time of construction of the building superintendent of that work, and did not personally supervise or inspect each or every portion of the work of construction as the same progressed, and did not personally give orders as to the manner of doing said work. The changes made by defendant in the erection, construction, and completion of the building from the plans and specifications were not made by the defendant with any knowledge or consent or at the suggestion of the plaintiff. The defendant's appeal is from the judgment which was rendered against him in the sum of $987.27.

The evidence is sufficient to justify the findings in each and all of the particulars concerning which appellant is now claiming that they were not so justified.

[1] 1. Appellant's first contention, wherein he attacks the sufficiency of the findings, is that the finding that the work was not done in accordance with the plans and specifications is not supported by the evidence, in this, that the specifications were never offered in evidence nor shown to the court nor described by counsel or witnesses. This finding is in accordance with subdivisions (a) and (b) of paragraph IV of the complaint. The answer of the defendant admitted that the plans and specifications contained the terms, conditions, and requirements stated in subdivision (a), and that by the terms of the contract and in accordance with the terms, conditions, and requirements of the plans and specifications the defendant was required to place a galvanized iron drain from the light well as alleged. The only difference between this admission and the allegation of the complaint is that the complaint stated that according to the plans and specifications the drain should have been of vitrified iron. This is not a material issue, since the plaintiff's action is not based upon any defect resulting from the substitution of galvanized iron for vitrified iron. Under this state of the pleadings it was not necessary for the plaintiff to introduce in evidence the specifications as a foundation for proof that the work as done did not conform thereto.

[2] 2. The evidence was sufficient to support the finding that by reason of the heavy fall of rain referred to in the complaint a large quantity of water passed into the drain leading from the light well. There was testimony tending to show that the drainpipe as laid by the defendant was defective by reason of the fact that there were holes in it, as alleged in the complaint, that after the rain the ground in the immediate neighborhood of the opening in the pipe was wetter than at any other part of the premises, and that by reason thereof the quantity of water accumulating under the foundation was increased. The defendant's answer admitted that as a result of said fall of rain a large quantity of water did pass into said galvanized iron drain. The answer further admitted that as a result of said heavy fall of rain and the consequent softening of the ground about and under the said north wall of said building the footing under the north wall and under the northerly portion of the front wall and the northerly portion of the rear wall settled, and the building was thereby damaged. In this connection the defendant's only denial was that the damage to the building was the result of any negligence or failure on the part of the defendant.

3. The evidence was sufficient to justify the finding that by reason of the defective construction of the footing the water which accumulated and stood under the building caused the footing under the walls to give way and settle, whereby the building was greatly injured. In addition to the facts above noted, there is much other evidence tending in the same direction. The witness Norris, who made the repairs after the building had settled, testified to the conditions found by him when he took charge of the repair work after the building had settled. He uncovered the footing under the front wall and measured its width at several places, whereby it appeared that the width thereof was less than 2 feet; in several places it was only 17 inches. He also found on removing the cement floor that the holes in the pipe had been covered with a piece of tin. He testified as a witness who had many years' experience in repairing buildings, and stated that in his opinion the cause of the damage was that the water came up out of the pipe and soaked the ground, and that the footing was not wide enough.

The real gist of the defense was that the plaintiff had known when the work was being done that the foundation or footing was not of the prescribed width and had agreed to that change from the specifications, and that there were in fact no breaks or imperfections in the drain pipe. Upon competent evidence the court found on these issues in favor of the plaintiff. The contention that the findings as to these matters are not sustained by the evidence is without merit.

[3] The case went to trial upon the second and third counts of the complaint and the answers thereto, after an order sustaining the demurrer to the first count. Appellant now contends that the court erred in overruling his demurrer to the second and third counts of the complaint. Each of these counts undoubtedly stated a cause of action. Assuming without deciding that counts 2 and 3 were uncertain or ambiguous or unintelligible in some of the particulars set forth in the demurrer, those errors would not constitute any proper ground for reversal of the judgment. By his answer the defendant was able to and did raise all the necessary issues for the determination of the action upon its merits. In our opinion, it was so determined.

For these reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

ALLEN v. NARVER et al. (L. A. 4246.)

1. Mines and Minerals 🔑78(1)—Oil Leases—Failure to Drill—Remedy of Lessor.

Under a lease for extracting oil on royalty, binding the lessees to commence operations by a certain day, and providing that if they fail to do so they will pay lessor $100 per month during continuance of default, the further provision that failure of the lessees to comply with conditions of the lease or to diligently prosecute the work of drilling and producing oil will render the lease null and void and of no effect, does not render the lease a mere option on the part of the lessees, and reduce the lessor's remedy, for lessees' failure to commence operations, to entering and terminating the lease, but gives him an option to do so, and does not prevent him allowing the lease to continue and recovering on the covenant to pay rental during default.

2. Damages 🔑79(5)—Liquidated Damages or Penalty—Oil Lease.

Provision of an oil lease for extracting oil on royalty that if the lessees fail to commence operations by a certain day they will pay the lessor $100 per month during continuance of the default, is for liquidated damages, and not penalty.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Willis I. Morrison, Judge.

Action by F. H. Allen against D. C. Narver and others. From an adverse judgment and order, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. A. Kidder, Jr., and Schweitzer & Hutton, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Kimball Fletcher, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. The question presented on this appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and an order of court denying defendants' motion for a new trial involves the interpretation of a lease made by plaintiff to defendants of certain lands for use in extracting oil and other mineral substances therefrom, the express consideration therefor being a royalty of one-eighth of the mineral so extracted.

[1] The provision of the lease upon which the action is based is as follows:

> "It is further expressly agreed and understood that in the event that the second parties [defendants] shall fail to commence operations by the 4th day of July, 1911, under the terms of this lease, then and in that event the parties of the second part [defendants] will pay the party of the first part [plaintiff] one hundred ($100) dollars per month for each and every month in which they shall make such default in the commencement of operations hereunder."

The complaint alleged and the court found that defendants and each of them wholly failed and refused to commence operations on or before July 4, 1911, and from thence to March 4, 1913, continuously failed and refused so to commence operations in accordance with their covenant so to do, and likewise refused to pay the $100 per month or any part thereof during said period of default. No attack is made upon this finding; indeed, it is conceded that defendants never at any time complied or attempted to comply with their agreement in this respect. Their contention is that, notwithstanding their express covenant, the lease constitutes merely an option on their part, and that plaintiff's sole remedy for breach of the agreement was to enter upon the property and terminate the lease. It is quite true that by another provision of the lease it was provided that a failure on the part of the lessees to comply with the conditions thereof, or their failure to diligently prosecute the work of drilling and producing oil, would render the lease null and void and of no effect. This provision constitutes an option given to the lessor, which, in lieu of insisting upon the payment of the $100 per month as provided in that portion of the lease hereinbefore quoted, he might or might not exercise at his election. Defendants, having agreed to commence operations before July 4, 1911, could not insist that their failure to perform their covenants should be equivalent to performance. As said by the court in discussing a like contention in Woodland Oil Co. v. Crawford, 55 Ohio St. 161, 44 N. E. 1093, 34 L. R. A. 62, where a great number of cases in support of the proposition are cited:

> "A promise to drill a well cannot be satisfied by a failure to drill such well. The proper construction to be placed upon such an agreement is, that upon failure of the lessee to drill a well, or pay the rental, * * * the lessor may elect to put an end to the lease, * * * or he may elect to have the lease continue in force to the end of the term, and enforce * * * the payment of rentals, as provided in the lease."

So here, under the terms of defendants' express covenant to pay $100 per month for each and every month in which they shall make default in the commencement of operations, the lessor may, instead of exercising the right which he has to terminate the lease, insist upon the payment of the sum stipulated to be paid for failure to comply with the covenant to commence operations and drill one well each year during the term of the lease. In support of their contention appellants have cited a number of cases, chief among which are those of Risch v. Burch, 175 Ind. 621, 95 N. E. 123, and Glasgow v. Chartiers Oil Co., 152 Pa. 48, 25 Atl. 232, an examination of which shows there was a lack of any covenant on the part of the lessees in the leases considered to do the work specified or pay anything as rental or damage for failure to do it. They involve contracts containing provisions to the effect that in the event of failure on the part of the lessees to develop the land or pay rental, the lessor might terminate the lease. There being no covenant on the part of the lessee, this was the lessor's only remedy. In the instant case, however, the lease contains an express covenant on the part of the lessees to the effect that in case they fail to commence operations by July 4, 1911, they will pay the $100 per month for each month during which they shall make default therein.

[2] It is next insisted that the covenant to pay the $100 per month must be regarded as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages, and since there was no evidence introduced showing the amount of damages which plaintiff had sustained, no recovery can be had. This contention is fully answered by the opinion in the case of Escondido Oil & Development Co. v. Glaser, 144 Cal. 494, 77 Pac. 1040, where the court, in discussing a like claim made therein, said:

> "Fixing the amount for damages sustained in contracts for digging oil wells very similar to the one here involved was upheld in Gibson v. Oliver, 158 Pa. St. 277 [27 Atl. 961], and the cases there cited. And it would seem that damages for breaches of contracts touching future interests in oil wells of unknown value are of such remote and speculative character as to bring them peculiarly within the rule that the parties should have the right to fix them by mutual agreement."

From the nature of the case it would be impossible to calculate with any degree of certainty the amount of damage sustained by plaintiff by reason of the breach of the covenant made by defendants. In the case of McComber v. Kellerman, 162 Cal. 749, 124 Pac. 431, the court, considering a like contention, said:

> "It was clearly in the nature of rental for the premises or compensation for the right, and not an attempt to fix a penalty or liquidated damages. But if it were considered as liquidated damages, the complaint and proof are sufficient to support the judgment. The nature of the case and the extreme difficulty of fixing damages arising from the breach of such a contract are fully shown by the lease itself."

There is no merit in the contention that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding as to the assignment made by the original lessor in said lease to the plaintiff bringing this action.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

3. TRIAL ⚷396(4) — EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT FINDINGS.

Although the court found the existence of a state of facts warranting setting aside judgment for fraud, where plaintiff failed to offer any evidence in support of certain material allegations for relief on ground of fraud, decree for plaintiff cannot be sustained.

Morris. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hancock & Lawrence and S. M. Johnstone, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Waldo M. York, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In this action plaintiff sued to set aside a judgment against her in favor of J. E. Morris made on October 5, 1911. The grounds assigned in her complaint for setting aside said judgment were that the same was rendered upon service by publication only and that the order for the publication of summons was procured without filing any affidavit showing that the said Gladys M. Clarkin, defendant in said action, resided out of the state of California, or had departed from the state of California, or could not, after due diligence, be found within the state of California, or that she had concealed herself to avoid the service of summons, and that said Morris, plaintiff in said action, falsely represented to the court that such affidavit had been made and thereby obtained said judgment. The defendant alleged that he had obtained the order for publication by means of an affidavit presented to the court at the time the same was obtained, and that the publication was made in pursuance of the order made upon such affidavit, and he denied that he had fraudulently represented to the court at the time the judgment was given that the order for the publication of summons had been procured otherwise than upon said affidavit. The affidavit itself is referred to and made a part of the answer, and it was also introduced in evidence. The only question presented in the case is the sufficiency of the affidavit to sustain the order for the publication of summons.

[1] The affidavit purported to state a case for the publication of summons on the ground that defendant could not after due diligence be found within the state, as provided in section 412 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The facts relating to this subject as set forth in the affidavit are as follows: That defendant, Gladys M. Clarkin, is a necessary party and cannot be found within the state of California; that she had not filed or recorded any certificate of residence as provided in section 1163 of the Civil Code; that on October 22, 1889, she resided in the city of Los Angeles, state of California; that since the suit was filed, which was four days prior to the making of the affidavit, the affiant had made diligent search and inquiry for said defendant; that the summons had been given to the sheriff with instructions to serve the same on said defendant, and that his return thereon had stated that he could not find the said defendant in the county of Los Angeles; that on October 25, 1889, one Owen E. Clarkin was appointed guardian of said Gladys M. Clarkin, who was then a minor, by the superior court of Los Angeles county; that in that proceeding the guardian had filed a bond with H. H. Yonkin and E. L. McWilliams as sureties, and had caused J. C. Wilmon, William Mead, and A. T. Trimble to be appointed appraisers of said minor's property; that on December 4, 1889, said Wilmon and Trimble returned and filed an inventory and appraisement thereof and that W. A. Ryan was attorney for the said guardian; that affiant had made inquiries of Yonkin, Wilmon, Trimble, and Mead as to the whereabouts of said Gladys M. Clarkin; that W. A. Ryan, the attorney aforesaid, was then deceased, and E. L. McWilliams, the other surety upon the bond, could not be found within the city of Los Angeles; that said persons are persons who would be most likely to know the whereabouts of said Gladys M. Clarkin; that affiant had also made inquiries of many other persons from whom he could expect to obtain information as to the whereabouts of said defendant and had examined the city directories and that from said search and said inquiries and the exercise of said diligence he had been unable to find said defendant in the state of California; and therefore he declared that by the exercise of diligent search the defendant could not be found within the state of California. The court in its findings in the present case states that the affidavit does not disclose what answers were returned to his inquiries by the parties of whom the inquiries were made, nor that any inquiry had been made of Owen E. Clarkin, the former guardian of Gladys M. Clarkin. Its conclusion was that the affidavit did not show sufficient diligence, and thereupon judgment was given in favor of the defendant canceling the previous judgment.

The rule regarding the sufficiency of affidavits for publication when attacked collaterally is clearly set forth in the language of Mr. Justice Harrison in Rue v. Quinn, 137 Cal. 651, 66 Pac. 216, 70 Pac. 732, as follows:

> "If the facts set forth in the affidavit have a legal tendency to show the exercise of diligence on behalf of the plaintiff in seeking to find the defendant within the state, and that after the exercise of such diligence he cannot be found, the decision of the judge that the affidavit shows the same to his satisfaction is to be regarded with the same effect as is his decision upon any other matter of fact submitted to his judicial determination."

We are of the opinion that the affidavit in the case of Morris v. Clarkin under consideration here presented facts which did have a legal tendency to show the exercise of diligence on behalf of the plaintiff in seeking to find the defendant, and also to show that the defendant could not be found after such diligence. In the case of Rue v. Quinn, aforesaid, the affidavit in controversy stated the return of the sheriff similar to that in the present case; that the affiant himself did not know the residence of the defendant; that after the summons was issued he ha made due and diligent search and inquiry for the defendant by inquiring of each of several prominent county officers named, and had also made inquiry of all other persons from whom he could expect to obtain information as to the whereabouts of said defendants. The affidavit in the present case certainly shows as much diligence and as strenuous an attempt to discover the whereabouts of defendant as did that involved in Rue v. Quinn.

[2] The only point stated in that case which is not stated in the present case is that the present affidavit does not declare expressly, as that one did, that the affiant himself did not know the residence of said defendant. This fact, however, is implied by the language of the affidavit in almost every sentence, and it would be a reasonable inference from the statements therein that the affiant himself was ignorant of the whereabouts of Gladys M. Clarkin. It is obvious that the persons of whom the defendant in the present case inquired would be those who would be considered most likely to know the facts sought to be discovered, much more so than those of whom inquiry was made in Rue v. Quinn. Unless we can say that an affidavit is insufficient in every case where it does not expressly state that the affiant himself does not know the whereabouts of defendant, we must consider the present affidavit sufficient. We are not willing to go to that extent in indulging collateral attacks upon judgments regularly rendered in pursuance of law. With respect to the guardian of whom inquiry was not made there is no claim that he was living or could have been found at the time. This being the only question presented, and the one which is decisive of the case, it follows that the court erred in rendering the judgment for the plaintiff.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: SLOSS, J.; RICHARDS, Judge pro tem.

On Hearing in Bank.

PER CURIAM. [3] The respondent urges, in her petition for a hearing in bank, that the department failed to pass upon her contention that the former judgment against her had been obtained by fraud. It is true that the complaint alleged, and the court found, the existence of a state of facts which, under the rule declared in Dunlap v. Steere, 92 Cal. 344, 28 Pac. 563, 16 L. R. A. 361, 27 Am. St. Rep. 143, and similar cases, would have warranted equitable relief against such judgment. But the appellant failed at the trial to offer any evidence in support of certain allegations material to her claim for relief on the ground of fraud. The bill of exceptions embodies proper specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings in this regard, and the appellant made the point in his brief. The judgment in favor of the respondent could not, therefore, have been sustained on any ground.

The petition for hearing in bank is denied.

UNION HOLLYWOOD WATER CO. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (L. A. 4061.)

1. Waters and Water Courses 🔑203(12)—Water Supply—Rates—Valuation.

Where meters installed by water company in new houses and the like which were not revenue producing, and there was nothing to show that they would be in use within the year, they were properly not considered in arriving at valuation for purpose of rate making for the year.

2. Waters and Water Courses 🔑203(12)—Water Supply—Rates—Valuation.

In an action involving reasonableness of water rates, where court gave a greater valuation to meters for which it gave a water company credit than the water company gave for all the meters in its verified statement, or in its evidence, it cannot complain that the court refused to consider some meters contained in such statement.

3. Waters and Water Courses 🔑203(12)—Water Rates—Valuation.

In action involving reasonableness of water rates, held, under the evidence, that there was no abuse of discretion in not considering an unused emergency plant such an essential part of the system as to justify an increased rate.

4. Appeal and Error 🔑1011(1)—Findings of Fact—Conflicting Evidence.

In an action to restrain enforcement of a city ordinance regulating water rates, valuation of property of water company arrived at on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

5. Waters and Water Courses 🔑203(12)—Water Supply—Rates—Valuation.

In ascertaining the value of property of a water company for the purpose of fixing rates, the court could fix the valuation of the water-bearing land from which percolating water was obtained without considering the value of the water separate from the land, by comparing it with similar water-bearing land in the same locality.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Robert M. Clark, Judge.

Action by the Union Hollywood Water Company to restrain the City of Los Angeles and others from enforcing an ordinance regulating water rates. Judgment for defendants. From an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Haas & Dunnigan and Sheldon Borden, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Albert Lee Stephens, Charles S. Burnell, E. R. Young, and Wm. P. Mealey, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from an order denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The action was one brought to obtain an injunction to restrain the defendant city of Los Angeles from enforcing a certain ordinance regulating the water rates to be charged by persons, firms, or corporations supplying or distributing water in or to the city of Los Angeles or the inhabitants thereof or to or for the use of vessels in Los Angeles harbor for the year commencing July 1, 1910, and ending June 30, 1911. Plaintiff was one of the corporations coming within the terms and provisions of the ordinance in question. The issue presented before the trial court was whether the provisions of the ordinance, if enforced, would afford the plaintiff a reasonable return upon its investment in the various kinds of properties owned or used by it on July 1, 1910, and which were essential and necessary in its business of distributing water to the inhabitants of Los Angeles during the year in which said regulative ordinance was in force. It is conceded that upon the hearing of the cause the trial court conducted a minute and exhaustive investigation as to the value of the plaintiff's various properties and as to the extent of their necessary use as parts of its operating and distributing system, and that upon these matters in controversy the testimony was much at variance. The appellant insists, however, that as to certain specified matters the findings of the court have no support in the evidence, and that the ordinance generally is unreasonable and confiscatory, and hence void. The first finding which the appellant thus assails is the finding of the trial court to the effect that only 3,172 of the service connections and meters owned by the plaintiff were used or necessary to be used for the distribution and sale of plaintiff's water within the city of Los Angeles. The evidence in this respect showed that the plaintiff was engaged in the distribution of water not only within a certain area within the city of Los Angeles, but also in and to districts without the limits of said city, and that for the purpose of operating its entire system within and without said city it owned and had in use 4,039 service connections and meters, and that of this number there were actually in use within the city of Los Angeles 3,172 of such service connections and meters. The evidence also showed that in addition to this latter number in actual use within said city the plaintiff owned and held 589 meters which were not in actual use at the time the court's valuations were made. These were called dormant meters, and, according to the testimony of the secretary of the plaintiff, most of these dormant meters had been installed in new properties, such as houses which had been built, but not as yet rented or used. The value of these unused meters, according to the valuation placed by the trial court upon those in use, would have amounted at best to a very small proportion of the total valuation of the plaintiff's other properties, and, even if added to said valuation, could have effected at most a very small increase in plaintiff's water rates.

[1] It is clear, moreover, that the trial court was not wrong in the exclusion of these 589 meters from its calculation in respect to the value of the plaintiff's working properties. These meters and other connections were idle at the time the valuations were made. They had never as yet come into use as a revenue producing part of the plaintiff's water system within said city. They were installed in advance of the actual necessity for their use, and there was no sufficient showing that they would be used during the year for which the rates were fixed, and the other water users and rate payers of the city should not be charged an additional amount, however small, in the way of a water rate in order to yield a return to plaintiff upon a species of property which was not in actual use as a part of its system, and which was yielding no return to plaintiff prior to the passage or taking effect of said ordinance.

[2] In addition to this, our attention is called to the fact that the trial court, in its fixation of a value upon the 3,172 meters and service connections of the plaintiff in actual use at the time of such valuation, placed a value thereon which is much more than double the valuation which the plaintiff itself placed thereon in the verified statement of its properties attached to its complaint; and our attention has not been called to any evidence in the record increasing this latter valuation. If this be so, then it follows that the court has already allowed the plaintiff a valuation upon this item of its properties far greater than it was entitled to have placed upon it for the purpose of the fixation of a water rate, and it cannot therefore be said that the plaintiff was in any wise prejudiced by any error of the court in failing to include the 589 meters in question in arriving at such valuation.

For these reasons we are unable to say that the trial court abused its discretion in the omission of this item from its valuation of the plaintiff's essential properties for the purpose of determining their total value and of regulating its water rates.

[3] The appellant's next contention is that the court erred in its finding that a portion of the plaintiff's properties, known as the Jefferson street plant, including its lots, wells, and water rights in adjacent acres, were unnecessary and not essential to its distributing system within said city. Prior to the organization of the Union Hollywood Water Company, in the year 1906, the Jefferson street pumping plant had been owned and operated by a corporation known as West Los Angeles Water Company, and was being used to supply water to the western portion of that city lying in its vicinity. Upon the organization of the Union Hollywood Water Company, however, it took over the properties of the West Los Angeles Water Company, a part of which was this particular plant, and also took over the properties of another corporation known as West Side Water Company, which was at the time engaged in serving water to another section of the western part of said city. After this consolidation of these two corporations had been effected in the name of and under the ownership of the plaintiff herein the latter developed an additional water supply from certain water-bearing lands at Sherman, which rendered unnecessary the further operation of the Jefferson street pumping plant, and in the beginning of the year 1908 the latter was shut down, and so continued to be up to and after the commencement of this action. It is conceded that this was the condition of things at the time of the trial, but the appellant insists that, notwithstanding this fact, its Jefferson street pumping plant was being maintained by it as an emergency plant to be put into use in the event of any interference with its water service from its other sources of supply. There was evidence, however, tending to show that this plant was not at the time connected with the rest of the plaintiff's water system, and that the installation of some two miles of pipe would be required to make such connection. Taking these facts into consideration, the trial court concluded, and we think properly, that the Jefferson street plant, in its state of nonuse and disconnectedness, was not such an essential part of the plaintiff's distributing system as to justify the imposition of an added water rate upon its customers. With the discretion of the trial court to make this finding from the state of the evidence before it, this court will not interfere upon appeal.

[4] The appellant's next contention, to which considerable space is devoted in its opening brief, is that the trial court did not place an adequate valuation upon certain easements and rights of way over private property which were a part of its system for supplying water to the inhabitants of Los Angeles, and that the court, in reaching a basis for the valuation of this class of property, included as unnecessary and nonessential a considerable part of the plaintiff's acquired easements and rights of way. As to this latter contention we do not think it is sustained by a fair construction of the finding of the trial court, but that, with certain designated exceptions, such as the so-called Soldiers' Home reservoir, the Jefferson street pumping plant and its adjacent water-bearing acres, the Day tract, etc., the trial court was undertaking to place a valuation upon all of the plaintiff's properties in the nature of easements and rights of way over the lands of private parties. Whether or not that valuation was sufficient depends upon the evidence upon that subject, which evidence was detailed, extensive, and conflicting, and, this being so, the finding of the court upon that subject will not be disturbed.

We might go on dealing in detail with the other alleged errors of the trial court in arriving at its conclusions as to the proper amount and value of the plaintiff's various properties for the purpose of arriving at a basis of total valuation upon which to predicate a reasonable water rate to be charged by the plaintiff and collected from its customers for the year covered by the terms of the ordinance in question, but the discussion would be unprofitable, since the conclusion in each of these matters must, in the state of the evidence, have rested in the sound discretion of the trial court.

[5] There is, however, one remaining question which deserves separate consideration. This is the contention of the appellant that the trial court adopted a wrong principle of valuation in its finding relative to the value to be placed upon the water-bearing lands of the appellant. The finding which the plaintiff thus assails reads as follows:

> "That plaintiff was also on said date the owner of water-bearing real estate constituting a part of said plant and system, but said water-bearing real estate was not of the value of $225,000, but was of the value of $92,500. And in making this finding the court does not consider the value of the water in said land separate and apart from said land, but fixed the value of said water-bearing land by comparing its value with similar water-bearing land in the same locality, capable of producing a like amount of water."

In respect to this finding the appellant contends that it was entitled, in excess of the valuation which the trial court placed upon its water-bearing lands as real estate, to have its rights in and to the water collected or contained therein admeasured and ascertained as separate from and in addition to the value of the land as land. The discussion of this phase of the appellant's case has reference particularly to the lands of the plaintiff at Sherman, the waters in which are percolating waters which are collected and extracted from the subsurface of said land by means of powerful pumps, and when so extracted are transferred to plaintiff's reservoirs and mains, and thence conveyed to its customers. There was evidence before the court that there were other lands in the vicinity of the so-called Sherman lands of plaintiff which also contained these or other percolating waters derived from the same higher sources as those supplying plaintiff's said lands. It was these facts in relation to the original state of these waters prior to the plaintiff's extraction of them which controlled the conclusion of the court that they were a part and parcel of the soil itself, having an appraisable valuation as a part of the land through which they percolated. It was these facts also which differentiated the cases cited by appellant from the case at bar; for in each of them the water rights which the courts recognized as having an appraisable value apart from the land were those appertaining to reservoirs or to surface lakes or streams. It is not necessary to consider the question as to whether, in the case at bar, the trial court might have adopted a method of valuation in which the percolating waters in the tract would be considered as appraisable apart from the value of the land as land, for the reason that both methods of valuation were open to its adoption under the authority of Marin Water, etc., Co. v. Railroad Commission, 171 Cal. 706, 715, 154 Pac. 864, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 114.

The trial court adopted and applied the rule approved in this case as the basis for its valuation of the plaintiff's water-bearing lands, and having a separate valuation to the pumping works, which in effect separated the percolating waters from these lands, and we are of the opinion that it was not in error in so doing; nor do we think that it abused its discretion in the value which it affixed upon this portion of the plaintiff's properties, in view of the evidence before it.

The contention of the appellant that the ordinance under review is unreasonable, confiscatory, and hence unconstitutional, depends for its force upon the appellant's foregoing contentions as to the undervaluations of its properties or portions thereof, and, since these have not been sustained, this final contention must of necessity also fall.

No other points appear in the record requiring separate consideration.

The order is affirmed.

1. JURY 🔑10—RIGHT TO TRIAL BY JURY—COMMON LAW.

Constitutional provisions guaranteeing the right to a trial by jury establish the right to a trial as known at common law.

2. JURY 🔑39—QUALIFICATIONS OF JURY—LEGISLATIVE POWER.

The qualifications of the jury is a matter subject to legislative control, and, even though prescribed qualifications may differ from those at common law, the legislation is valid.

3. JURY 🔑39—RIGHT TO TRIAL—QUALIFICATIONS—JURY CONSISTING IN PART OF WOMEN.

Const. U. S. Amend. 14, forbids any state to make or enforce any law abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, and the subsequent California Constitution by article 1, § 7, provides that the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all and remain inviolate, and by article 20, § 18, provides that no person shall on account of sex be disqualified from entering upon or pursuing any lawful business or profession, and amendment of October 10, 1911, article 2, § 1, gave women the right to vote and hold office, and the Legislature provided that a woman might act as a juror. Held, that the legislation pointed merely to the matter of sex as a qualification, and that the Legislature was justified in dealing with the matter as such, so that it was no ground for a release from custody that one was convicted of felony by a jury consisting in part of women.

In Bank. Application for writ of habeas corpus by Eban Mana. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Feliz & White, of Salinas, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, of San Francisco, for respondent. Gail Laughlin, of San Francisco, for various organizations of women.

WILBUR, J. Petitioner, convicted of a felony by a jury consisting in part of women, seeks release from custody on the ground that the act of the Legislature authorizing women to sit as jurors is unconstitutional. The right to a trial by a jury is provided for in article 1, § 7, of the Constitution, adopted by the people of the state of California in May, 1879, as follows:

> "Section 7. The right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate; but in civil actions three-fourths of the jury may render a verdict. A trial by jury may be waived in all criminal cases not amounting to felony, by the consent of both parties in open court, and in civil actions by the consent of the parties, signified in such manner as may be prescribed by law. In civil actions and cases of misdemeanor, the jury may consist of twelve, or of any number less than twelve upon which the parties may agree in open court."

[1, 2] The petitioner claims that the word "men" should be inserted by proper construction in the Constitution, so that the Constitution would in effect read: "The right of trial by a jury of twelve men shall be secured to all," etc. This contention is based upon the proposition that when the Constitution provides for a trial by a jury it, by necessary inference, provides for the jury as known at the common law (People v. Powell, 87 Cal. 348, 25 Pac. 481, 11 L. R. A. 75), and that, as juries of men were provided for by the common law, the Constitution must be thus construed. Two questions seem to be thoroughly settled by the unbroken line of decisions in all the states: First, that constitutional provisions guaranteeing the right to a trial by jury established the right to a trial by a jury as known at common law; second, that the qualifications of the jury is a matter subject to legislative control, and that, even though such qualifications may differ from those at common law, such legislation is nevertheless a valid exercise of legislative power. 24 Cyc. 187; People v. Powell, supra; People v. Chin Mook, 51 Cal. 597.

[3] At the time of the adoption of our Constitution (1879) the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States provided that:

> "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; * * *

nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

By this amendment state laws and state Constitutions were modified or abridged so far as necessary to conform to the rights and privileges thus created. In interpreting the right to a trial by jury as guaranteed by our Constitution, we must therefore look, not alone to the common law, but also to this amendment so far as it affects the right to a trial by jury. The Supreme Court of the United States, in construing the effect of this constitutional amendment upon the right of a colored man to a trial by jury in West Virginia (100 U. S. 303, 308, 25 L. Ed. 664), said:

> "The very idea of a jury is a body of men composed of the peers or equals of the person whose rights it is selected or summoned to determine; that is, of his neighbors, fellows, associates, persons having the same legal status in society as that which he holds." (Italics ours.)

It was therefore held that to try a negro before a jury from which his race was excluded by law was a denial of his right to a trial by jury as guaranteed by the Constitution of West Virginia, for the reason that it deprived him of a trial by a jury composed of his "neighbors, fellows, associates, persons having the same legal status in society as that which he holds." In deciding that question the court added:

> "We do not say that, within the limits within which it is not excluded by the amendment a state may not prescribe the qualifications of its jurors (italics ours) and in so doing make discriminations. It may confine the selection to males, to freeholders, to citizens, to persons within certain ages, or to persons having educational qualifications. We do not believe the Fourteenth Amendment was ever intended to prohibit this."

It will be observed, then, that the Supreme Court of the United States, in determining the rights of citizens of the United States to a jury trial under the Fourteenth Amendment, bases its conclusion as to the right of a state to discriminate against female citizens of the United States upon the ground of the disqualification of females as jurors.

Our Constitution also expressly provides (article 20, § 18):

> "No person shall, on account of sex, be disqualified from entering upon or pursuing any lawful business, vocation or profession."

And while jury service is neither a "business, vocation or profession," the Constitution recognizes the capacity of women to enter upon any "lawful business, vocation or profession." By an amendment to our Constitution, October 10, 1911 (art. 2, § 1), women were given the right to vote and hold office. If the contention of the petitioner is well grounded, we would then have a situation where a woman on trial for a crime might be brought to trial before a woman judge, prosecuted by a woman district attorney, defended by a woman lawyer, brought in court by a woman bailiff, and yet forced to a trial before a jury of men, because men only were considered as eligible for jury duty at common law. It would seem that the inferences to be derived from so radical an amendment of the Constitution are quite as strong as those to be derived from the use of the term "trial by jury."

The Legislature of the state in providing that a woman might act as a juror evidently believed that there was no longer any necessity of discriminating against her as a citizen of the United States because she was disqualified. The Constitution having recognized her as in all respects the equal of man, the Legislature was justified in doing away with the discrimination which had theretofore existed against her in the matter of jury service. We do not hold that the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution, or the Woman Suffrage Amendment to the Constitution of this state, were of themselves sufficient to entitle women to act as jurors, although this question has been seriously raised and discussed, but not decided, by the Supreme Court of Wyoming in McKinney v. State, 3 Wyo. 719, 30 Pac. 293, 16 L. R. A. 710. We do hold, however, that this amendment points so clearly to the matter of sex as a question of qualification that the Legislature was amply justified in dealing with the matter as such.

Writ discharged. Petitioner remanded.

KINSEY v. PACIFIC MUT. LIFE INS. CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (L. A. 4155.)

1. INSURANCE 🔑466 — ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

If an accident was the proximate cause of drowning of insured, the nature of accident was immaterial on the question of liability on an accident policy.

2. INSURANCE 🔑645(3) — BREACH OF WARRANTIES—PLEADING.

Where insurer alleges a certain specific breach of warranty, in that insured in accident policy falsely stated he did not have heart trouble, it cannot introduce evidence of breach of warranty as to apoplexy or other warranties, which may have caused death.

3. EVIDENCE 🔑546—EXPERT TESTIMONY—COMPETENCY.

It was within the discretion of the trial court to refuse to allow life guards to give their opinion whether an insured found in the water died from drowning, where it did not appear that their knowledge made them competent as a matter of law, and where medical experts differed on the question.

4. INSURANCE 🔑665(5)—ACCIDENT INSURANCE—CAUSE OF DEATH—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that insured in accident policy was drowned, and did not die from heart trouble.

5. NEW TRIAL 🔑103—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—MATERIALITY.

In action on accident policy for accidental drowning, where the only breach of warranty alleged in the answer was that deceased had heart trouble, an affidavit of a physician that in his opinion the physical condition of deceased prior to the time of securing the policy, as shown by the deposition of one named, indicated that he had suffered from an apoplectic stroke did not support a motion for new trial on ground of discovered evidence.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Meyers, Judge.

Action by Esther A. Kinsey against the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Williams, Goudge & Chandler, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Edwin A. Meserve and Shirley E. Meserve, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. On May 12, 1911, defendant issued to Edward W. Kinsey, who was the husband of plaintiff, a policy of insurance by which defendant agreed to and did insure said Kinsey against "bodily injury sustained during the term of the policy through accidental means (excluding suicide, sane or insane, or any attempt thereat, sane or insane) and resulting directly, independently, and exclusively of all other causes in * * * death." Plaintiff, as beneficiary named in said policy, alleging the insured, while bathing in the surf was accidentally drowned, on September 18, 1913, brought this action to recover the amount of the indemnity specified in the policy. A trial was had before a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the sum prayed for in the complaint. Judgment followed, from which, and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals.

In its answer defendant denied that the death of deceased was the result of accidental drowning, denied that any sum was due plaintiff under the terms of the policy, and affirmatively alleged that deceased in procuring the policy made certain warranties, among which was that he was in sound physical condition, whereas at the time of making such warranty he was afflicted with heart disease, which fact was at the time of the issuance of said policy unknown to defendant, who at all times believed and relied upon the representations so made by the insured, and that subsequent to the death of the insured, upon learning of the falsity thereof, tendered the plaintiff the premiums theretofore received by it from deceased, which, being refused, were deposited in court.

Upon the issues joined, the questions involved were: First, did the death of the insured result from accidental drowning? second, did deceased, as alleged, misrepresent his physical condition? and, third, assuming these facts to be determined in favor of plaintiff, what amount is she entitled to recover under the terms of the policy?

[1] In its brief appellant assigns as error the giving of certain instructions to the jury. Upon the hearing it was conceded by counsel for appellant that its contention as to instruction No. 12 was without merit; and an examination of other instructions complained of, when taken in connection with and as a part of the entire charge given to the jury, shows that they are likewise without merit. By instruction No. 23 the court told the jury that, if they found that Edward W. Kinsey was drowned as the result of an accident, it was immaterial for the purpose of the case how he came to drown, provided it found that such drowning was the proximate result of accident. The ultimate fact was that he was drowned as the result of accident. The nature of the accident which caused him to drown was immaterial, provided it constituted the proximate cause of the drowning.

[2] By instruction No. 22 the jury was instructed that defendant by its answer had limited its defense based upon alleged breach of plaintiff's warranty that he was in sound physical condition to the claim that he was afflicted with heart trouble, and told the jury that evidence of any breach other than that so alleged was not evidence for its consideration in determining the question as to breach of warranty made. The giving of this instruction finds full support in the case of Taylor v. Modern Woodmen of America, 42 Wash. 304, 84 Pac. 867, 7 Ann. Cas. 607, and a number of authorities there cited, and is likewise approved in Weber v. Ancient Order of Pyramids, 104 Mo. App. 729, 78 S. W. 650, in both of which it is, in effect, held that where a certain specific breach of warranty is alleged, the defendant should be restricted to the specific charge of fault or wrong contained in the pleading. Otherwise, as stated in Taylor v. Modern Woodmen of America, supra, "no matter how many conditions precedent the contract contained, the plaintiff would be obliged to go to the expense of preparing to prove performance or waiver of every one of them." The only breach of warranty alleged in the answer was that plaintiff at the time of procuring the policy was afflicted with heart trouble; and under the pleading the court correctly instructed the jury that, in considering the question as to whether or not there was a breach of warranty, they should consider only evidence touching the allegation that deceased was afflicted with heart disease.

[3] Defendant called as witnesses the life guards who assisted in rescuing the body of deceased from the surf, and who aided in efforts to resuscitate him. They were asked questions, the purpose of which was to elicit their opinion based upon their observation of deceased as to whether the death of deceased was due to drowning. Objection was sustained to these questions and the ruling is assigned as error. The contention of appellant is that these life guards were, by reason of their calling and experience which they were shown to possess in rescuing and treating persons apparently drowned, qualified like a physician or surgeon to express their opinion as to whether the appearance of deceased was indicative of death by drowning. As to whether or not they were thus qualified was a question for the determination of the trial judge, and in the absence of an abuse of discretion disclosed by the record, his ruling should not be disturbed. The evidence, while perhaps showing that these witnesses were skilled in the methods of rescuing drowning persons from the water, fails to show that they had any knowledge, gained by experience or otherwise, upon which, from their observation of the appearance of the body of deceased, they were as a matter of law entitled to testify to their opinions as to the cause of the death of deceased. Indeed, as shown by this record, the question was one upon which men of long professional standing and experience differed.

[4] It is next claimed that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict. There is no merit whatsoever in this contention. While there was expert testimony to the effect that the appearance of the body of deceased was consistent with the fact that his death might have been due to other causes such as apoplexy or heart failure, it also clearly tended to establish facts which indicated that his death was due to drowning, and the jury, whose province it was to determine the question upon such conflict of evidence, so found.

[5] It is likewise claimed that a new trial should have been granted on the ground of newly discovered evidence. This is based upon an affidavit made by a physician to the effect that in his opinion the physical condition of deceased prior to the time of securing the policy, as shown by the deposition of Emma Belle Badger, indicated that he had suffered from an apoplectic stroke. A mere statement of the fact upon which the contention is based shows that there was no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in refusing a new trial upon such ground. Moreover, the only breach of warranty alleged in the answer was that deceased had heart trouble.

The policy of insurance provided that, if the premiums thereon were "payable quarter-annually or semiannually in advance, then each year's premium paid after payment of the first year's premium, will increase said benefits 5 per cent. until such increase is 50 per cent." It appears that the insured paid the second year's premium semiannually in advance, by reason of which fact the benefit was increased 5 per cent. during the second year. The amount specified in the policy was $5,000, which, increased by $250, made the sum which plaintiff was entitled to recover under the terms of the policy, $5,250. By reason of an erroneous instruction, however, the jury fixed the amount due upon the policy at $6,500. At the hearing of the case it was conceded by counsel for respondent that the judgment, based upon said verdict, was $1,250 in excess of the amount to which plaintiff was justly entitled.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment be and the same is modified, by deducting therefrom, as of the date rendered, the sum of $1,250, and, as thus modified, the judgment is affirmed.

Modification of Judgment.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. The judgment heretofore given by this court is amended to read as follows, viz.:

"The judgment appealed from is modified by deducting therefrom $1.250 and interest thereof from November 1. 1913, to date of judgment, amounting to $63.75, making a total of $1,313.75, and, as thus modified, said judgment is affirmed. The order denying a new trial is affirmed. Appellant shall recover its cost on the appeal to the extent only of $50 for and on account of the printed transcript used in presenting the record, and $20 only for and on account of cost of printing briefs, making a total of $70, and $10 for filing transcript. Respondent shall recover as costs of printing briefs the sum of $50, and no other costs on these appeals."

RAMISH v. MARSH. (L. A. 4239.)

ARBITRATION AND AWARD 🔑68—IRREGULARITIES—WAIVER.

Where arbitration for adjustment of partnership accounts was for the benefit of both parties, their acceptance of the award and a part payment thereunder to one of them constituted waiver of any irregularities in the award.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by Adolph Ramish against Martin C. Marsh. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hannon & Rickard and J. Vincent Hannon, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Olin Wellborn, Jr., and Alfred H. McAdoo, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, based in part upon a common-law award of three arbitrators, selected to adjust the partnership accounts of plaintiff and defendant, in accordance with a written agreement of arbitration. Defendant resists said award on the ground of many alleged informalities in the proceedings of said arbitrators. The findings are in favor of said award. It is also found that after the award, the defendant "told plaintiff to draw money from the Metropolitan Contracting Company (a corporation owned by plaintiff and defendant) and to credit the amount so drawn as payments upon the sum due from defendant to plaintiff under and by virtue of the award of said arbitrators," and this was done, and as a conclusion of law holds that the defendant had waived any irregularities in the arbitration. As the arbitration was for the benefit of both parties, their acceptance of the award, and the payment thereunder by defendant to plaintiff would constitute a waiver of any irregularities in the award. See, on this point, Matter of Silliman, 159 Cal. 155, 113 Pac. 135; Dore v. So. Pac. Co., 163 Cal. 182, 124 Pac. 817; 5 Corpus Juris, 170, sec. 426.

EDMONDS v. WILCOX. (L. A. 4210.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑928(3)—PRESUMPTIONS.

In the absence of record showing to the contrary, it is presumed that the court's statement in instruction that certain facts were conceded was true.

2. PLEADING 🔑8(15)—CONCLUSIONS—FRAUDULENT STATEMENTS.

In action on notes given in renewal of corporation stock subscription notes, allegation in the answer that at time of renewal of the notes the holders thereof "ratified and confirmed the statements and representations" made to induce the execution of the original notes, which were set out, was not the allegation of a conclusion, but an allegation that the holders repeated the false statements of the agent who sold the stock.

3. FRAUD 🔑11(2) — STATEMENT OF FACT — OPINION.

Where banks, holding stock subscription notes, to induce renewal thereof, confirmed statement of original seller thereof that "they wouldn't take $5 a share for their shares if they couldn't get more," and that the bank regarded the stock as ample security for a loan of its face value, this was not a mere expression of opinion, but a statement of value, which, considered with the fact the stock was actually worthless, and in connection with other assertions of the banks, justified a finding of fraud.

4. FRAUD 🔑58(1)—PROOF REQUIRED.

Notwithstanding judicial expressions concerning the necessity of clear and satisfactory proof of fraud, the rule of Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 5, that a preponderance of the evidence controls in a civil case applies in a civil case where fraud is claimed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by B. J. Edmonds against H. W. Wilcox. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sam Ferry Smith and Ward, Ward & Ward, all of San Diego, for appellant. Shreve, Reed, Sample & Shreve and Theodore Stensland, all of San Diego, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff to recover judgment upon two promissory notes assigned to him for collection. These notes were given in renewal of notes given in payment of a subscription for stock in the Western Underwriting & Mortgage Company, one to each of two banks. Subsequently, on April 4th, 1913, the defendant executed renewal notes. It is claimed by defendant that the original notes were procured by fraudulent representations. But the appellant claims that at the time of the giving of the renewal notes, April 4, 1913, plaintiff had become aware of the fraud, and that therefore he waived the fraud by giving the renewal notes.

[1] After the opening statement by defendant, which was construed by the plaintiff as an admission of knowledge and therefore a waiver by defendant of the original fraud at the time of the giving of the renewal notes, the court on motion of the plaintiff made on that ground excluded evidence of the original fraud, and by ruling on the evidence and by instruction to the jury confined the defendant to evidence of fraud at the time of said renewal. The court, in instructing the jury as to the measure of damages, stated that it was assumed by the parties on the trial that the stock was of the value of $2 per share, the amount paid therefor, if the original representations were true, and that for that reason no proof had been given as to the value thereof in that event, and that the jury should so assume. While this was no doubt an instruction on the facts, it is stated to be on conceded facts, and we cannot say from the record printed in the briefs and before us that this was not correct, as it is presumed to be.

[2, 3] The only fraud alleged in the answer to have occurred at the time of the renewal of the notes is that the agents of the banks holding the notes "then and there ratified and confirmed the statements and representations so made by said agents, A. O. Garrett, and L. U. McKee, and the said L. A. Blocman as aforesaid." It is claimed that this is but an allegation of a conclusion, but it is an allegation that the agent of the bank in effect repeated the previous false statements of the agents who sold the stock, which were set out in great detail in the answer, containing 42 pages. The jury found on the issue thus presented in favor of the defendant. One of these representations that was thus confirmed by the agent of the banks was that "they wouldn't take $5 a share for their shares if they couldn't get more," and that the bank regarded the stock as ample security for a loan of its face value. As the stock was actually worthless and so found to be by the jury, this could hardly be classed as a mere expression of opinion. It was a statement of value which, taken alone, might be so regarded, but reinforced by the assertion that the banks regarded the stock as ample security for a loan of the face value thereof, without regard to the financial standing of the purchaser; that the Western Underwriting & Mortgage Company was "one of the solid financial institutions of the coast"; that the dividends arising from the company were so large that they would pay off the notes; that the banks preferred that form of security (the stock) to any other, and would gladly renew the notes; coupled with the actual loan by the banks of the face value of the stock, and the immediate renewal thereof, amply justified the jury in its finding of fraud. See Barron Est. Co. v. Woodruff Co., 163 Cal. 561, 126 Pac. 351, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 125.

[4] The court instructed the jury that the case must be decided according to the preponderance of the evidence. This is correct. De Kahn v. Chase, 170 Pac. 608. This is the statutory rule in civil cases, and all judicial expressions concerning the necessity of clear and satisfactory proof of fraud must be construed in the light of the fundamental rule that a preponderance of the evidence controls in a civil case. Section 2061, subd. 5, Code Civ. Proc.

FRENCH v. FARMER et al. (L. A. 4224.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY 🔑66(1)—LIABILITY TO THIRD PERSONS—BONDS—CONSTRUCTION.

Surety bond of contractor, conditioned that he should "pay all laborers, mechanics and materialmen and persons who shall supply him with provisions or goods, all just debts due to such person or to any others to whom any part of the work is given incurred in carrying on such work," did not entitle one who leased mules to the contractor to recover on the bond.

2. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY 🔑66(1)—LIABILITY TO THIRD PERSONS—BONDS—CONSTRUCTION.

Such bond did not warrant recovery by the lessor of the mules for services and expenses of a corral man, whom he furnished, and who was to be paid by the contractor, the right of action, if any, being in favor of the employé and not the lessor.

3. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY 🔑136—LIABILITY TO THIRD PERSONS—BONDS—CONSTRUCTION.

Recovery for provisions furnished railroad contractor could be had on the contractor's bond to the railroad, conditioned to pay for provisions used, by a third person furnishing the provisions, in whose favor the bond did not nominally run, on the theory that the bond was one made for his benefit.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by M. H. French against O. O. Farmer and the National Surety Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Surety Company appeals. Affirmed.

Carroll Allen, Bertin A. Weyl, and Allen & Weyl, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Robt. T. Linney, Gordon L. Finley, and Ralph W. Schoonover, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. The defendant National Surety Company appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiff upon a common-law bond executed by the defendant to the Grand Canyon Railway Company, conditioned upon the faithful performance of "all the stipulations and agreements contained in" a contract entered into between defendant Farmer and said railway company, on the part of said Farmer to be performed and observed, and further conditioned that said Farmer "shall well and faithfully pay all laborers, mechanics and materialmen, and persons who shall supply such contractor with provisions or goods of any kind, all just debts due to such persons, or to any others to whom any part of such work is given, incurred in carrying on such work." The contract between Farmer and the railway company was for the construction of a wagon road in the Grand Canyon, Ariz., upon the property of the United States government. This contract provided, among other things, that:

> "The contractor shall promptly pay all subcontractors, materialmen, laborers and other employés as often as payments are made to him by the company, and shall deliver said work free from any claim or lien on account of such labor and materials and subcontractors. * * *"

The form of the bond was identical with that set out in the opinion in the case of the National Bank of Cleburne v. Railway Co. et al., 95 Tex. 176, 66 S. W. 203.

[1] The plaintiff, French, by contract in writing, leased to the defendant Farmer the contractor, to be used in the performance of the latter's contract with the railway company, 32 head of mules, 1 saddle horse and 16 sets of harness. He also agreed to furnish a "corral boss," to be paid by Farmer. Farmer having failed to pay therefor, this action was brought by French against Farmer and the surety company to recover $4,200 rental for the use of the teams and saddle horse, $10 for services of corral man, and $5 for expenses of corral man, and $75 for hay and barley sold. Judgment was rendered against defendant Farmer and the defendant surety company. The appeal is by the surety company only. It is claimed that there is not sufficient privity between the defendant surety company, as obligee of the bond, and the plaintiff to authorize suit by him upon the bond. That point, however, has been determined adversely to appellant's contention by this court in Union Sheet Metal Works v. Dodge, 129 Cal. 390, 62 Pac. 41, and later by the court in bank in People's Lumber Co. v. Gillard, 136 Cal. 55, 68 Pac. 576. The question then is, Does the contract or bond, or both, contain a sufficient promise to pay the obligation of the plaintiff to authorize him to sue to enforce this as a promise made for his benefit? With reference to the item of rental for the mules, a similar question was involved in Wood, Curtis & Co. v. El Dorado, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 231, 94 Pac. 877, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 585, 126 Am. St. Rep. 80, 15 Ann. Cas. 382, wherein the following question was answered in the negative by this court:

> "Did plaintiff by this letting of his horses at a stipulated price per month 'bestow labor' upon the work so as to entitle it to a lien under section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure?"

Upon the same reasoning, which need not be here repeated, it must be held that plaintiff was not a person "to whom any part of such work is given," and that therefore the contract and bond make no express provision for the payment to the plaintiff of that indebtedness here sued upon. This view is strengthened by the fact that both the contract and bond make it the duty of the contractor to furnish teams, without fixing any obligation to pay therefor.

[2] As to the items of $10, services of corral man, and $5, traveling expenses of corral man, under the contract between French and Farmer the corral man was to have been paid by Farmer. Even if we assume that the corral man was a laborer upon the work within the meaning ot the contract and bond, it does not follow that the plaintiff, upon paying such laborer, was entitled to sue therefor upon the bond. The right of action, if any, was in the corral man and not in his employer, who was not a subcontractor.

[3] As to the judgment for $75 for hay and barley sold, there was no express agreement contained in the contract for the payment for either "provisions or goods," although the bond is expressly conditioned upon the payment of all just debts incurred therefor in carrying on such work. The question is, then, squarely presented whether or not there can be a recovery upon the bond based upon the condition thereof by a third person not a party thereto, where the bond does not by its terms expressly inure to the benefit of such third person and the right to sue thereon is based entirely upon the theory that the third person is entitled to sue upon a promise made for his benefit. The Supreme Court of Texas, upon a bond identical in form, held that the surety could not be sued thereon by a third party. National Bank, etc., v. Railway Co., supra. This was upon the theory that the bond was one of indemnity to the railway company, containing no express agreement to pay such third person, and therefore he could not sue thereon. If we adopt this view we violate the fundamental principle that every part of a contract should be given some effect, for the railway company could not, in any event, be liable for "goods" and "provisions" furnished the contractor in carrying out its contract, nor in this case could there be any lien therefor, as the property upon which the work was done was government property. If, under the circumstances, any effect whatever is to be given to this clause in the condition of the bond, it must be held that it was the intention of the parties to benefit such third persons rather than the railway company, to whom the bond ran. The case of Parker v. Jeffery, 26 Or. 186, 37 Pac. 712, is in harmony with the Supreme Court of Texas. The courts of Nebraska, Missouri, Iowa, Indiana, and Michigan, however, seem to hold to the view that if it can be fairly said from either the contract or the bond, which are to be construed together, that the parties intended to and did agree to pay such third person, a suit could be brought on such bond by such third person to recover upon the promise so made for his benefit. Lyman v. City of Lincoln, 38 Neb. 794, 57 N. W. 531; Kaufmann v. Cooper, 46 Neb. 644, 65 N. W. 796; School District v. Livers, 147 Mo. 580, 49 S. W. 507; Jordan v. Kavanaugh, 63 Iowa, 152, 18 N. W. 851; National Surety Co. v. Foster Lumber Co., 42 Ind. App. 671, 85 N. E. 489. While the question has not been directly decided by this court, the cases of Union Sheet Metal Works v. Dodge, supra, and People's Lumber Co. v. Gillard, supra, were based in part upon the authority of the Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, and Nebraska cases, as was also the case of W. P. Fuller & Co. v. Alturas School District, 28 Cal. App. 609, 153 Pac. 743. We therefore hold that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the item for goods and provisions.

The lower court is directed to modify the judgment by striking out all items therefrom save and except the item of $75 for goods and provisions, and, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⟹422—NOTICE OF APPEAL—MISNOMER OF PARTIES.
That a notice of appeal by three defendants misnamed one of them does not necessitate the dismissal of the appeal as to the others.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⟹422—NOTICE OF APPEAL—MISNOMER OF PARTIES.
Where notice of appeal by three defendants misnamed one of them by substituting a name of a person not a party to the record, such notice was nevertheless sufficient as to the defendant omitted, where it was obvious from the remainder of the record that the omission was a clerical mistake.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⟹373(1)—UNDERTAKING—NECESSITY.
Where an appeal is taken under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 941a to 941c, no undertaking is essential, and the amendments of the Codes in 1915 made no change in the law in that respect.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by Chung Sing against the Southern Pacific Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. On motion to dismiss appeal. Denied.

Henry T. Gage and W. I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, for appellants. Waldo M. York and Harry M. Irwin, both of Los Angeles, and William D. O'Hara, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal from a judgment entered February 16, 1917, as well as from certain orders. The principal grounds of the motion to dismiss the appeal are, first, that no notice of appeal was filed on behalf of defendant Blackburn within the time allowed by law, and, second, that the notice of appeal filed is insufficient as to any of the defendants, in that it does not sufficiently identify the judgment appealed from. Both of these alleged grounds are based on the fact that in the notice of appeal signed by the attorneys of all the defendants and filed within due time, April 10, 1917, it is stated that "the defendants Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, C. A. Burton, and H. W. Crumrine, hereby appeal" from "* * * that certain judgment, in favor of the plaintiff and against said defendants and each of them, entered on or about the 16th day of February, A. D. 1917, in book 407, page 4, of Judgments," etc., and from an order entered March 30, 1917, reducing said judgment to $13,000. The name of the defendant Geo. W. Blackburn did not appear therein; the name "C. A. Burton" appearing in lieu thereof owing to mistake and inadvertence. The superior court, after the time for appeal elapsed, made an order allowing the notice to be amended in this respect, upon a showing to its satisfaction of the mistake. It is claimed that the superior court had no power to allow such an amendment after the time for appeal had expired.

[2] As to defendant Blackburn a different question is presented, owing to the fact that in attempting to specifically name the defendants in the notice of appeal another name was substituted for his, with the result that his name did not appear at all. Was there any notice of appeal filed on his behalf within the time allowed by law? We are of the opinion that this question should be answered in the affirmative. The verdict and judgment in the cause were against the Southern Pacific Company, Geo. W. Blackburn, and H. W. Crumrine only, all of whom were represented in the action by the same attorneys. There was no verdict or judgment against any one named Burton. The notice of appeal also refers to an order of the superior court made and entered September 12, 1916, granting in part and denying in part "said defendants' motion for new trial." The record shows that said motion was made by the Southern Pacific Company, H. W. Crumrine, and Geo. W. Blackburn only, and that no one named Burton was involved therein. It also refers to the order of March 30, 1917, reducing the judgment from $18,000 to $13,000, which the record shows was an order making such reduction in favor of the company, Blackburn, and Crumrine only, and declaring that the judgment should be for $13,000 and costs as against each of them. No one named Burton was involved therein. An undertaking on appeal filed on the day the notice of appeal was served states that the appeal is by defendants Southern Pacific Company, Geo. W. Blackburn, and H. W. Crumrine. It seems perfectly apparent from the notice, when read in connection with the record, that such notice was filed on behalf of the three defendants against whom the judgment runs, and that the use of the name "C. A. Burton" instead of "George W. Blackburn" to designate one of the appellants was solely due to inadvertence—a mere clerical misprision. One of the three defendants against whom the judgment runs and on whose behalf it was desired to appeal was designated as "C. A. Burton" instead of "George W. Blackburn." The record demonstrates this, and the adverse party could not have been misled thereby. Under these circumstances we are satisfied it should not be held that no notice of appeal was filed by Blackburn. We say this entirely regardless of the order of the superior court allowing the notice of appeal to be amended in this regard.

[3] It is urged that the undertaking on appeal is fatally defective. We are not, on this motion, concerned with any question as to the validity of this bond as a stay bond. It is therefore unnecessary to determine whether the objection to the bond is well based. The appeal may be regarded as taken under sections 941a, 941b, and 941c, of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, this being so, any defect in the undertaking must be disregarded for the reason that under those sections no undertaking is essential to the taking or maintenance of the appeal. Theisen v. Matthai, 165 Cal. 252, 131 Pac. 747. See, also, Estate of Stough, 173 Cal. 640, 161 Pac. 1. The amendments to our Codes in 1915 made no change in our law in this respect.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑907(1)—PRESUMPTIONS—EVIDENCE.

Testimony that at one place in a track locomotives wobbled about, the witness indicating the motion, cannot be disregarded, but the court on appeal must assume that it indicates undue movement resulting from a bad condition of the track, because all reasonable deductions from the evidence must be indulged in favor of the judgment.

In action for death of engineer when locomotive was derailed, the roadmaster should have been allowed to say whether it was the usual custom to burn ties when unfit for service, after he had testified that the ties at the point where the locomotive was derailed were burned.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1058(2)—HARMLESS ERROR.

Error in excluding testimony is not prejudicial, where the witness afterwards gives the excluded testimony in substance.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑265(6)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DERAILMENT OF LOCOMOTIVE—RES IPSA LOQUITUR DOCTRINE.

While the mere happening of derailment of engine is not proof of negligence of the railroad, it is competent to be considered thereon.

7. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑101, 102(9)—INJURY TO SERVANT—CARE REQUIRED.

It is the duty of a railroad company to exercise reasonable care to keep its tracks and locomotives in a reasonably safe condition for its employés.

8. TRIAL 🔑296(3)—INSTRUCTIONS—CURE OF ERROR.

Error in instructing that a master must furnish track and locomotives in reasonably safe condition was not harmful, where further instructions properly held the master to exercise ordinary care to furnish reasonably safe track and locomotives.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Jessie H. Neale, as administratrix of the estate of James B. Neale, deceased, against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company and another. From the judgment and order denying new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. W. Camp, U. T. Clotfelter, and M. W. Reed, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying the motion for a new trial. The action was one to recover damages for the death of James B. Neale, respondent's intestate, an engineer in the service of the defendant corporation. The accident which caused the death of Mr. Neale was the derailment of an engine of which he had charge. Mr. Bean and Mr. Purdy, respectively mechanical superintendent and roadmaster of the railroad company, were joined as defendants, and a verdict was rendered against them as well as the corporation. On motion for a new trial the verdict against Bean was set aside. The other two defendants are appealing.

The theory of plaintiff, as set forth in her pleading, was that the railroad company and defendant Bean negligently furnished James B. Neale a defective engine, and that the corporation and defendant Purdy negligently permitted the track, at the place where the accident occurred, to become unsound and defective. The latter ground seems to be the one on which respondent relies for affirmance of the judgment. Several attacks are made by appellants on the findings which, it is contended, are not, in many of their parts, supported by the evidence. The testimony tends to show that the train was moving at the rate of 20 to 25 miles an hour. The engine left the rails near the point of a switch. Appellants insist that the record furnishes no evidence that the track was unsound, or that they were charged with notice of its condition, if it was defective.

[1] Upon the subject of the defective condition of the track one witness, Corwin, testified that he had noticed engines as they approached the place where the derailment afterwards occurred. He said: "I have noticed them in passing, the engine would be wobbling like this" (indicating). It is argued that such testimony is of no value because any engine going at the rate of 20 or 25 miles an hour will show some movement from side to side, such as the witness characterized as "wobbling." Of course, we cannot have reproduced for us the pantomime accompanying the testimony. Therefore we must assume that it indicated an undue movement evidencing a bad condition of the track, because all reasonable deductions from the evidence must be indulged in favor of the judgment.

[2] Another witness, Smith, stated that

where engine and track are in good condition, the engine will not be derailed from a speed of from 20 to 25 miles an hour. Other witnesses testified that some of the ties over which the wheels of the engine passed after leaving the rails were badly splintered and some were "broken in two." Counsel for appellants insist that this evidence is of no value to plaintiff's case, and lends no support to the theory that the track was in bad condition, because a heavy engine running over redwood ties would naturally splinter them. "In fact," they say, "it is only sound wood that splinters; rotten wood crumbles." But the testimony tends to show that, while some of the ties were splintered and some broken completely, many were merely marked by the wheels. The evidence also showed that some of the ties, on removal, proved to be partly rotten, and that they were so soft that the rails and tie plates cut down from half to three-fourths of an inch into the wood. We think that this and other evidence produced at the trial sufficiently supports the judgment. The testimony tends to show, for example, that of 52 ties examined in detail by the witnesses, 6 or 8 were broken through, others torn all to pieces and splintered, while many were only marked by the wheels, and that the engine ran for 250 feet along a switch over ties smaller than those over which it had passed on the main track and only marked the smaller timbers.

[3] Defendants introduced the testimony of two of the employés of the railroad to the effect that the track at the place where the accident occurred had been duly and properly inspected shortly before the accident. This testimony did tend to show that a general inspection of the track had been made, and that the switch point near the place of subsequent derailment of the engine had been very carefully examined, but it was for the jury to determine from all of the facts and circumstances, including the interests of the witnesses themselves as employés of the railroad company, whether their inspections had been properly made.

[4, 5] Mr. Purdy, one of the witnesses for the defendants, testified that certain ties broken in two by the derailment were taken away from the track and burned "because they were unfit for further service." He was asked if that was "the usual custom with ties rendered useless in that way." Objection to the question was sustained and the ruling is specified as error. The question should have been permitted, but appellants were not injured because later the witness said, speaking of the section foreman who had burned the ties:

> "I have no authority to tell him to burn up ties inspected by other people. But that is the general custom. I suppose in this case he took it upon himself to burn them; he knowing that that has been the custom and practice."

[6] The court instructed the jury that the mere happening of the derailment or the death of James B. Neale raised no presumption of negligence of the defendants; that the burden was upon plaintiff to show by a preponderance of evidence that the accident was proximately caused by some one or more of the specific acts of negligence charged in the complaint; and that "the mere facts that the engine was derailed and said Neale was killed, taken alone, are not to be considered by you as proof of any negligence on the part of either or any of the defendants." Appellants complain of the use of the word "proof" instead of "evidence" in the latter part of the instruction. As originally proposed the latter word was used. There is no force in this contention. It is true, as appellants indicate, that this court in Brymer v. Southern Pacific Co., 90 Cal. 496, 27 Pac. 371, has said that the mere fact of the occurrence of an accident does not fix the liability, or even raise a presumption that the employer was at fault. But the evidence regarding such an accident is clearly admissible, so that the fact of the happening thereof, if established, may be considered in connection with other facts which might tend to make up a complete showing of negligence. This court has never said that evidence of the failure of machinery to do its allotted work may not be introduced, but the rule is that proof of the occurrence of the accident by reason of such failure, standing alone, is not proof of negligence.

[7] The jury was instructed that it was the railroad company's duty to furnish its engineer a reasonably sound and safe engine upon which to perform his duties and a reasonably safe track, failing in which judgment should go for plaintiff. The counsel for appellants say that the obligation of the corporation was not to furnish a reasonably safe track, but to exercise reasonable care to furnish a reasonably safe track. In this behalf the case of Duffy v. Hobbs, Wall & Co., 166 Cal. 210, 135 Pac. 1093, L. R. A. 1916F, 806, is cited. The opinion in that case declares that under a well-settled rule an employer is bound to use ordinary care to see that his employés have a safe place in which to labor, and that the tools and appliances with which they are to work are in good condition and reasonably safe for the purposes intended. It is there declared that:

> "This rule, however, does not apply between the master and the servant who is employed to perform for the master this duty to the other servants, where the injury happens because of the failure of such servant to do that part of his duty."

It will be seen at once that the qualification of the general rule does not apply to this case. In Thompson v. California Cons. Co., 148 Cal. 35, 82 Pac. 367, also cited by appellants, the court was considering a situation in which a workman was employed in a quarry in which blasting was done and the conditions were constantly changing. It was held that where the servant is under the same obligation as the master to look for dangers in the place of employment, and has equal facilities for ascertaining them, and under such conditions continues to work, the master is not liable for any injuries caused by the dangers then existing unless, after knowing or being presumed to know the dangers himself, the master urges or coerces the servant to continue the work. In Eastern Transportation Co. v. Johnson, 117 Va. 306, 84 S. E. 649, and Southern Ry. v. Childrey, 113 Va. 376, 74 S. E. 221, the court said in effect that it is the duty of the master to exercise ordinary care to provide, not safe and suitable appliances and instrumentalities, but reasonably safe and suitable appliances and instrumentalities for the use of his servant. But a railroad track is not a tool given to a servant and one which he is required to observe and to know when it becomes unsuitable and unsafe. The dangers arising from the rotting of ties are not obvious to the engineer who passes over the road at a high speed. Such dangers may only be learned by inspection, and it is the duty of the railroad company to inspect its tracks and to exercise reasonable care to keep them in a reasonably safe condition for the purposes for which they are used. The true rule has been stated many times. It will suffice to quote the language of Mr. Justice Kerrigan in Matchette v. California Fruit Canners' Association, 33 Cal. App. 156–159, 164 Pac. 423, 424:

> "The duty of an employer to furnish an employé with a reasonably safe place to work is fulfilled when he exercises ordinary care for that purpose. * * * It was the defendant's duty to use reasonable care in providing a reasonably safe place for decedent to work."

[8] While the instruction criticised, if taken alone, might possibly cause jurors to place a heavier burden upon the employer than the law permits, we are of the opinion that, when taken in connection with the rest of the charge (as the jury were instructed that it must be), this instruction could not have been misleading. The court carefully defined ordinary care and negligence, and the jury was told that plaintiff was bound to prove negligence in order to recover; that it was the duty of the corporation and defendant Purdy "to have used ordinary care in furnishing a safe track, trackage, and ties over which the engine" was being operated; and that a failure so to do would be negligence, "and if such negligence, if any, contributed to the happening of the accident as a proximate cause thereof, you will find against both of said defendants, or either of them, if shown by the evidence to have been negligent in that behalf." Taken together the instructions properly declared the law.

Nor do we think the jury could have been misled by the instructions, taken as a whole into a belief that the railroad company owed to its engineer the same duty that the law imposed upon it with reference to a passenger. The jurors were carefully instructed upon the rule respecting the burden of proof, and that "the mere facts that the engine was derailed and said Neale was killed" were not, when taken alone, to be considered as proof of any negligence on the part of defendants or any one of them.

In re JEPSON'S ESTATE. (L. A. 5574.)

1. WILLS 🔑302(2)—PROOF OF SIGNATURE.
   Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding of the court that an alleged will was in the handwriting of and signed by the deceased.
2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑995, 1011(1) — QUESTIONS OF FACT—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.
   Where the evidence is conflicting, the findings of fact of a trial court or jury is conclusive on appeal, the weight of the evidence being for the jury or court, unless obviously false or inherently improbable.
3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1010(1)—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF FACT.
   An appellate court will not assume the rôle of a handwriting expert, for the purpose of setting aside a finding of fact by the trial court, based not only on its own inspection of a writing, but also upon the opinions of witnesses peculiarly qualified.
4. WILLS 🔑303(4)—OLOGRAPHIC WILLS—PROOF.
   Code Civ. Proc. § 1315, does not require that both witnesses to an olographic will be produced.
5. NEW TRIAL 🔑102(1)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—DILIGENCE.
   To be entitled to a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, it must be shown that the evidence could not, with reasonable diligence, have been produced at the trial.

   New trial will not be granted for newly discovered evidence which is merely cumulative.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Frederick Emil Jepson, also known as Fred Jepson, deceased. From an order admitting will to probate, and appointing Elise Jepson executrix, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, contestants of the admission of the will to probate appeal. Affirmed.

Fred N. Arnoldy, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Frank Stewart, J. W. Howell, and Stewart & Stewart, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Frederick Emil Jepson died in Los Angeles county on November 5, 1915, survived by his wife, Elise Jepson, and several nephews and nieces, the children of a deceased brother and sister of Jepson. No will appearing, the widow applied for letters of administration, which were granted to her. Upon her petition for the setting apart of a homestead, the nephews and nieces appeared in opposition. The superior court ruled that they were not entitled to oppose the widow's petition, for the reason, as she claimed, that the entire estate passed to her under the law of succession. The nephews and nieces appealed, and this court, on a motion to dismiss, and later, in passing on the merits of the appeals, decided that the appellants were entitled to share in the estate of the supposed intestate. Estate of Jepson, 174 Cal. 684, 164 Pac. 1; Estate of Jepson, 170 Pac. 1182. About a year and a half after Jepson's death, and shortly after our decision on the motion to dismiss, the widow filed a paper as the last will of the decedent, together with a petition for its admission to probate. The nephews and nieces filed a contest, putting in issue the genuineness of the alleged will. Upon the trial the court found that the paper was duly executed by the testator in the presence of two subscribing witnesses. It further found that the will was written "entirely in the handwriting of said testator, by his own hand, and was dated and subscribed by him." Orders were made admitting the will to probate, and appointing the widow, Elise Jepson, executrix. The contestants appeal from these orders. By their appeal they seek to review, also, an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The controversy turns, principally, on the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings just mentioned. Frederick Jepson was a native of Germany. For some years prior to 1903 he lived in Yonkers, in the state of New York. In that year he moved to California, and continued to reside in this state until his death. He was married to the respondent in 1882. The disputed paper, which was in the German language, purported to have been executed at Yonkers on the 27th day of February, 1903, a date shortly before the departure of Jepson for California. According to the testimony introduced by the respondent, it was entirely written, dated, and signed by Jepson, but it bore, after the signature of the alleged testator, an attestation clause to which the names of John Behrens and Rudolph Hettler were affixed as attesting witnesses. Hettler appeared at the trial, and testified directly and specifically to Jepson's compliance with all of the formalities required for the execution of an attested will. He also testified that the entire document, with the exception of the signatures of himself and Behrens, was in the handwriting of the decedent. His wife, who is a sister of the respondent, gave corroborating testimony concerning the execution of the paper, and also declared her opinion that the handwriting was that of the decedent. Additional opinion evidence that the paper was in the handwriting of Jepson was given by the respondent, by another witness familiar with the decedent's handwriting, and by an expert on handwriting. On the other hand, the appellants testified that, in their opinion the signature was not genuine, and their testimony was supported by that of two other witnesses, one an expert.

[1-3] This mere statement should suffice to show that the case presents a question, simply, of a conflict of evidence, upon which the trial court's determination of the issue of fact must be deemed conclusive here. The appellants argue with great earnestness and apparent conviction that the evidence offered by the respondent is unworthy of belief, and should have been rejected. No rule of appellate practice is more firmly settled than that the weight of evidence is for the jury or the court passing on the facts. It is true, of course, that testimony may be so obviously false or so inherently improbable as to require its rejection. But no such situation is presented here. Viewing, for the moment, the opinion evidence alone, we could not say that the court below should have rejected the testimony of the witnesses who declared that, in their view, the signature was that of the decedent. Photographic copies of the will and of exemplars of Jepson's admitted handwriting are contained in the transcript, and differences between the subscription of the alleged will and signatures appearing on other writings of Jepson are pointed out. But these differences do not appear to us to be any greater or more significant than the variations between different handwritings of conceded authenticity. Even if they were more marked than they are, we should still be in no position to pass upon the genuineness of the handwriting with that degree of certainty which would be required to overthrow a finding of the trial court. A court of appellate jurisdiction cannot be expected to assume the rôle of a handwriting expert, for the purpose of setting aside a finding made by the trial court, and based, not only upon its own inspection and comparison of the original writings, but upon the opinions of witnesses peculiarly qualified, either by special study of the subject or by familiarity with the handwriting of the decedent. But beyond all this, we have the direct testimony of Hettler, which, as above stated, is corroborated in some degree, that he saw Jepson sign the paper. There was nothing on the face of the evidence for respondent to compel its rejection by the trial court. The appellants make much of the fact that the will was not produced until long after the decedent's death, and then only when this court had held against the widow's claim that she was entitled to take the entire estate in the absence of a testamentary disposition. But this, like other matters to which appellants point, is merely a circumstance, to which the trial judge was to give, as he doubtless did, such weight as he thought it deserved. There is no occasion to recite the several particulars brought forward by the appellants to justify their belief that the signature to the disputed paper was a forgery. These may, singly or collectively, have justified a suspicion that the alleged will was not genuine, but no greater force can be attributed to them on this appeal. On the other hand, we might, if it were necessary, call attention to various presumptions and inferences which may fairly be regarded as fortifying the conclusion reached on the trial. A careful reading of the whole record satisfied us that the attack upon the court's finding is entirely without merit.

[4] The appellants make the further point that under the provisions of section 1315 of the Code of Civil Procedure the will should not have been admitted to probate without the production of Behrens, one of the subscribing witnesses. Regardless of any other consideration, the finding that the paper was duly executed as an olographic will furnishes a sufficient answer to this point.

[5, 6] The motion for new trial was based, in part, upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. Affidavits of witnesses resident in Yonkers to the effect that the disputed signature was spurious were offered. The court was warranted in disregarding these affidavits upon the grounds: First, that there was no sufficient showing that the evidence could not, with reasonable diligence, have been produced at the trial; and, second, that it was merely cumulative.

No other points are made.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; WILBUR, J.; MELVIN, J.; RICHARDS, Judge pro tem.; VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem.

BENOIST v. BENOIST. (L. A. 4247.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑103(2)—ACTION AGAINST TRUSTEE—REPUDIATION.

The rule that the statute does not run in favor of a trustee against his beneficiary till the trust is repudiated, and adverse claim of trustee is clearly and unequivocally made known, applies to express trusts only, and not to an involuntary trust raised by operation of law.

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑102(6)—RECOVERY OF CHATTELS—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

Where pictures were given to defendant's father, under agreement that on his death they should go to his son, if he left any, otherwise to plaintiff, and they were then given to defendant by her father, and she took possession of them, plaintiff's cause of action accrued, and Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 3, giving three years for action for chattels detained, began to run at least on the death of the father leaving no son.

3. NEW TRIAL 🔑79—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—IMMATERIAL FINDINGS.

New trial will not be granted for want of evidence to sustain immaterial findings.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Conde L. Benoist against Eugenie Benoist. From an order denying new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fairbanks & MacFarland, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Chas. L. Benoist, of Los Angels, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. In this action, which was brought to recover the possession of seven family portraits, judgment went in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The trial court made findings as follows: Mrs. Eliza B. Pallen was a sister of the plaintiff, Conde L. Benoist, and of S. H. Benoist, the father of the defendant. In 1877, Mrs. Pallen, who was then the owner of the portraits in question, made a written agreement with her said brothers, which provided, in effect, that she gave the portraits to S. H. Benoist, with the understanding that they should, at his death, "go to his oldest son, if he should have any," but, in the event of his dying without male issue, the portraits should go to Conde L. Benoist, or his oldest son. In the year 1899, S. H. Benoist made a gift of the portraits to his daughter, the defendant, who took them "with knowledge of the agreement, and denying its validity, and claimed to be the owner of the portraits." The plaintiff knew of defendant's possession and claim of ownership. The defendant has had possession of the portraits since the year 1899, and has had them in her possession in the county of Los Angeles for eleven years or more, which fact was known to the plaintiff. S. H. Benoist died without male issue on November 10, 1910.

As conclusions of law the court found that the agreement between Mrs. Pallen and her brothers was valid and binding; that S. H. Benoist violated this agreement when he made a gift of the portraits to the defendant; that a trust devolved upon the defendant when she came into possession; that the statute of limitations then began to run; that the action is governed by section 338, subdivision 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that it is barred by the statute of limitations.

The motion for new trial was based upon the grounds of newly discovered evidence, and insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision. The showing made did not require the granting of the motion on the first ground, and the appellant makes no complaint on this score. On the other ground, the attack is directed against the findings that the plaintiff knew of defendant's possession and claim of ownership. The record is, in truth, devoid of any evidence tending to show that the plaintiff had such knowledge, and if these findings were necessary to the support of the judgment, the order appealed from could not be upheld. But, in view of the other facts found, it becomes entirely immaterial whether the plaintiff did or did not have knowledge of defendant's possession and claim, and the findings questioned have no real bearing on the ultimate issue raised by the plea of the statute of limitations.

[1] The appellant takes his stand upon the rule that the statute of limitations does not begin to run in favor of a trustee as against his beneficiary until there has been a repudiation of the trust, and the adverse claim of the trustee has been "clearly and unequivocally made known to the cestui que trust." Luco v. De Toro, 91 Cal. 405, 416, 27 Pac. 1085. This rule applies, however, to express trusts only. Where an involuntary trust is raised by operation of law, no repudiation of the trust is required to set the statute in operation. The period of limitation begins with the commission of the wrongful act. Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 363, 366, 14 Pac. 88; Broder v. Conklin, 121 Cal. 282, 288, 53 Pac. 699; Barker v. Hurley, 132 Cal. 21, 26, 63 Pac. 1071, 64 Pac. 480; Earhart v. Churchill Co., 169 Cal. 728, 731, 147 Pac. 942.

[2] Here, as appears from findings which are not assailed, the defendant was not a party to the agreement upon which the plaintiff bases his claim, and she took the portraits as her own in antagonism to that claim, and denying its validity. It is not necessary to consider whether the court was correct in its conclusion of law that the statute began to run in 1899, when the defendant came into possession of the portraits. In any event, the plaintiff's right of action accrued when S. H. Benoist died without male issue, whereupon, under the agreement, the portraits were to go to the plaintiff. This event took place in November, 1910, which was more than three years before the commencement of the action. In any aspect, therefore, the action was barred by the provisions of the Code section to which the court refers in its findings.

[3] A new trial will not be granted for want of evidence to sustain immaterial findings. Haese v. Heitzeg, 159 Cal. 569, 573, 114 Pac. 816.

The order is affirmed.

ROCKRIDGE PLACE CO. v. CITY COUNCIL OF CITY OF OAKLAND et al. (S. F. 8301.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 1, 1918. On Petition for Rehearing, May 1, 1918.)

1. Courts 🔑485—Transfer of Causes—Assessments for Street Improvements.

The Supreme Court may transfer to itself and exercise jurisdiction to vacate the decision of the District Court of Appeal annulling, on certiorari, resolution for a reassessment of lands for street improvements.

2. Courts 🔑487(2)—Transfer of Causes—Assessments for Street Improvements.

The Supreme Court may exercise jurisdiction to vacate a decision of the District Court of Appeal as to assessment for public improvements, and transfer such cause to itself on the petition of one not a party to the proceeding, or upon its own motion.

3. Courts 🔑488(1)—Transfer of Causes—Effect.

An order by the Supreme Court granting a hearing, in such court, of certiorari proceeding pending in the District Court of Appeal as to an assessment of lands for public improvements, vacates the decision of the District Court and transfers the case to the Supreme Court as though originally instituted therein.

4. Courts 🔑486 — Transfer of Causes — Grounds.

The action of the District Court of Appeal in regard to an assessment of land for street improvements may be vacated, and cause transferred to the Supreme Court, notwithstanding no error appears on the face of the opinion when considered without regard to the record, since such action is an original proceeding.

5. Municipal Corporations 🔑514(11) — Public Improvements—Mode of Reassessments.

Reassessment of a city council for a street improvement will not be set aside as not being proportionate to benefits for the mere reason that deductions and additions were made to the original assessment at a certain sum per front foot.

6. Municipal Corporations 🔑407(1) — Public Improvements—Assessment—Constitutionality of Statute.

Improvement Act (St. 1911, p. 730), providing in section 4 that the city council may make the expense of a public improvement chargeable upon a district to be benefited, and by section 20 that it shall assess the cost of the work upon the several lots in the assessment district benefited thereby upon each respectively, in proportion "to the estimated benefits to be received by each of said several lots," is not unconstitutional as failing to provide for an assessment in accordance with the benefits to be actually received.

In Bank. Certiorari by the Rockridge Place Company to review a reassessment of lands for street improvement by the City Council of the City of Oakland and others. Proceeding dismissed.

C. Irving Wright and F. E. Boland, both of San Francisco, for plaintiff. Wm. H. O'Brien, of Oakland, for defendants. Johnson & Shaw, of Oakland (R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner Marsh Bros. & Gardenier, Inc.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a proceeding in certiorari to review a resolution of the city council of the city of Oakland, adopted December 28, 1915, directing a reassessment of the lands liable for a certain street improvement, and prescribing the amount of assessment as to each parcel of land within the assessment district. The proceeding was instituted November 10, 1916, in the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District. Judgment was given by that court annulling the resolution. Within 60 days thereafter this court vacated said decision and judgment and granted a hearing herein. The only petition filed herein asking for such action was one filed by Marsh Bros. & Gardenier, Inc., a corporation, which was not technically a party to the certiorari proceeding, but which was a party in interest, being the street contractor in whose favor the assessment was made.

[1-4] The claim that this court was without power to vacate the decision of the District Court of Appeal in this matter, and to transfer the same to this court for determination, is sufficiently answered by what is said in the Matter of Wells, 174 Cal. 467, 163 Pac. 657. As to proceedings in mandamus, prohibition, and certiorari originally instituted in a District Court of Appeal, this court has many times made such orders, and the uniform practice in that regard is fully sustained by the opinion in the case cited. It is immaterial that the only petition for such action by this court was by one not made a party to the proceeding. This court has the power to make such an order on its own motion. When such an order is made within the time prescribed in the Constitution, the decision of the District Court of Appeal is vacated and the matter is transferred to this court for a determination of all the material questions involved therein, to the same extent as if originally instituted in this court. It is also immaterial that the opinion of the District Court of Appeal may not show any error upon its face, when considered without regard to the record. The practice established by our decisions (People v. Davis, 147 Cal. 346, 81 Pac. 718; Burke v. Maze, 10 Cal. App. 206, 215, 101 Pac. 438, 440; Rauers, etc., v. Berthiaume, 21 Cal. App. 675, 132 Pac. 596, 833), to the effect that in considering petitions for a hearing, in this court, of appeals required by our Constitution to be taken to a District Court of Appeal, we will consider only the opinion of that court and will not look into the record, is confined to appeals, and has never been extended to original proceedings instituted in such courts. There are material differences between the two classes of matters, which, to our minds, preclude any such extension of the practice, or at least, render it inadvisable to declare any such rule as to original proceedings instituted in a District Court of Appeal. There is no question of power involved in this regard. The power exists as to all matters, and has been exercised in this particular matter, with the result that the proceeding is now here for determination on its merits.

We will concede, for the purposes of the decision, that this proceeding should not be dismissed for laches, or because of the claim that petitioner, before instituting the same, in common with others, resorted to an action in equity to enjoin proceedings under the assessment and prosecuted the same to judgment, with the result that judgment was given against it and its coplaintiffs on the merits. We will concede, purely for the purposes of the decision, that certiorari will lie to review an assessment levied on property for street improvements, and come at once to a discussion of the claim of petitioner that the assessment ordered herein is on its face in excess of the jurisdiction of the city council and void.

[5] The street improvement work here involved was work on portions of two intersecting streets, and was done under the provisions of the so-called Street Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730). The work and improvement being in the opinion of the council of more than local or ordinary public benefit, the district benefited was described, and it was ordered that the cost and expense be chargeable against and assessed upon said district. Under the law it was required that the assessment on the several pieces and parcels of land within the district be in proportion to the estimated benefits to each lot. The work was done by the contractor and accepted by the superintendent of streets, who made his assessment for the cost of the work with incidental expenses, $27,978.68, upon the various lots of land in the district, 447 in number. An appeal was made by certain property owners to the council to review the assessment. The appeal was heard and the council gave its decision by the resolution here assailed, wherein the amount to be assessed against each lot in the district was specified. The sole point made against the resolution and the assessment thereby ordered is that the council did not take into consideration the proportion of benefits to be derived by each of the several lots and make the assessment accordingly, but, by said resolution, arbitrarily apportioned a portion of the cost without regard to benefits. The particular charge in this behalf is that council deducted from the assessment theretofore made by the superintendent of streets on the several lots fronting on Chabot road the sum of 50 cents per running foot, amounting (according to petitioner's brief) to $4,462.03, and added this to the assessment against all of the lots in the district in proportion to the area of each of said lots; the charge by reason thereof being (according to petitioner's brief) $0.0006 per square foot, and increasing petitioner's assessment from $652.50 to $663.27.

It may be admitted that an analysis of the assessment made by the street superintendent and that ordered by the council on appeal shows that the effect of the action of the council was that as to each lot fronting on Chabot road the street superintendent's assessment was reduced by an amount equal to fifty cents per running foot, less approximately $0.0006 per square foot of area, and that the assessment on each of the other lots in the district was increased approximately $0.0006 per square foot of area. Also that the deduction of 50 cents per running foot on Chabot road aggregates $4,462.03, and that $0.0006 per square foot aggregates in the whole district approximately the same amount. But it does not follow that alleged "mathematical demonstration," as it is called by learned counsel, of the method adopted by the council in apportioning the assessment, that the assessment was not made by the council solely with reference to the benefit to each lot, and does not represent the best judgment of that body as to the amount that should be charged against each lot under that method of apportionment. Certainly there is in this proceeding no showing to the contrary, and the situation portrayed by the record is not such that we can say that there was even any error of judgment in the apportionment. The return to the writ shows that the council gave much time to the hearing of the appeal, the same being considered at several sessions, at which the parties interested were given the opportunity to be heard and were in fact heard. The minutes disclose that the sworn testimony of witnesses was received, and the resolution here assailed so states in terms. The nature of this testimony does not appear, as no record was kept thereof; the law not requiring any such record. Certainly it will not be presumed that this testimony was not sufficient to support the conclusion of the council. The resolution in terms requires the superintendent of streets to assess the sum of $27,978.68 upon the several lots, "upon each respectively in proportion to the estimated benefits to be received by each of said several lots," and states that "this council hereby finds and decides and determines that said several lots * * * are benefited by said work and improvement in the proportions and in the amounts set forth in the table of assessments hereinafter set forth." In the face of this finding, unassailed as it is by anything in the record, it cannot be said here that the assessment was not made in accord with the rule of apportionment prescribed by the statute. The "mathematical demonstration" of learned counsel is simply a demonstration of the facts we have already admitted. Those facts are entirely consistent with a conclusion that it was correctly decided by the council that, in order to make the assessment one according to the benefit to the several lots, it was necessary to charge against each lot the exact amount specified in the resolution. That the amounts so charged are, in so far as the $4,462.03 is concerned, the same as would have been obtained by the method which counsel contends was in fact adopted, but as to the adoption of which there is no showing in the record other than that they are the same, is entirely beside the question. It certainly cannot be held upon the record before us that under no conceivable conditions could the several lots be benefited in the proportion stated by the assessment, or that the assessment is void on its face.

[6] A question is raised as to the constitutionality of the Improvement Act of 1911, the claim being that it does not provide for an assessment of the lands in the district in accordance with the benefits to be actually received by such lands from the work, but only provides for an assessment in proportion to the estimated benefits. The act provides (section 4) that the city council may make the expense of the work chargeable upon a district, which, in its resolution of intention, it shall declare "to be the district benefited by said work and improvement," etc., and (section 20) that it shall assess the cost of the work upon the several lots in the assessment district benefited thereby, "upon each respectively, in proportion to the estimated benefits to be received by each of said several lots," etc. Full opportunity is required to be given to the property owners to be heard with respect to the proposed work and the extent of the district, prior to any order for the doing of the work, and after the assessment is made they have the opportunity to be heard as to the amounts charged against their respective lots. It is apparent, of course, that if the district created by the city council comprises all the land to be actually benefited by the proposed work, which is the manifest design of the act, and if this "benefit" to the land embraced in the district exceeds the cost of the work, an assessment of the cost upon the several lots in the district "upon each respectively in proportion to the estimated benefits," etc., is an assessment upon each lot in accordance with the benefits received by it from the work. The point appears to be that the cost of the work which is to be assessed against the lands of the district may exceed the benefit, with the result that the assessment on those lands while in proportion to the benefits may not be in accord with the benefits accruing to each lot from the work. We do not think the act, fairly read, so contemplates or provides. When it provides for the establishment of "the district benefited by said work," it contemplates a district that will in fact be benefited by the completion of the proposed improvement under the terms of the act, including the imposition of the cost thereof upon the lands of the district. If this be the proper construction of the act in this regard, as we think it is, the objection made is without force. That the exact cost of the proposed work is not known until after the establishment of the district, is unimportant. It can be approximately determined with sufficient certainty to avoid the possible condition suggested by counsel. There is no suggestion that any such condition exists in the case at bar.

The proceeding is dismissed.

UNION MACH. CO. v. CHICAGO BONDING & SURETY CO. (Civ. 2222.)

1. BAILMENT 🔑18(3)—LIEN FOR REPAIRS—POSSESSION—STATUTES.
Under Civ. Code, §§ 3049, 3051, providing for liens on personal property, where machine company repairs a dredger, and constructs new parts therefor, its lien for repair charges and price of new parts is dependent upon company retaining possession of the dredger.

2. GUARANTY 🔑16(1)—CONSIDERATION—RELINQUISHMENT OF LIEN.
Where a machine company does repair work on, and furnishes new parts for, a dredger, and without receiving payment therefor gives up possession of dredger upon guaranty of payment by a bonding company, the relinquishment of the lien is sufficient consideration for the guaranty.

3. GUARANTY 🔑16(4)—CONSIDERATION—EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PAYMENT.
Extension of time of payment was a sufficient consideration for the guaranty.

4. COSTS 🔑260(1)—DAMAGES FOR FRIVOLOUS APPEAL.
Where an appeal is taken obviously for purpose of delay, the court may assess damages for the prosecution of a frivolous appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by the Union Machine Company, a corporation, against the Chicago Bonding & Surety Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Watt, Miller, Thornton & Watt, of San Francisco, for appellant. Cushing & Cushing and Wm. S. McKnight, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff upon a guaranty executed by the defendant.

The appeal is without merit. The facts are briefly these: Plaintiff entered into a contract with the Western Reclamation Company to make certain repairs to and to construct new parts for a dredger. Part of the work under the contract had been performed, and plaintiff was entitled to the contract price therefor. When the balance of the work was ready for delivery the plaintiff refused to install the same until it should be paid in full for all the work. The Western Reclamation Company was unable to make payment at the time, and prevailed upon the plaintiff to perform the balance of the work upon the execution by the defendant of a written instrument by the terms of which the latter guaranteed the payment of all bills against the Western Reclamation Company for the work done on the dredger under the contract, the same to be paid at stated periods.

[1-3] We do not doubt that the plaintiff had a perfect right to retain possession of the undelivered part of the work until the purchase price of all the work was paid. Civ. Code, §§ 3049, 3051. It follows that by the delivery of the articles in question without receiving payment, in reliance upon the security of the guaranty, plaintiff suffered a detriment which was a good consideration for the guaranty. Moreover, at the time and as a part of the transaction just noted plaintiff agreed to extend the time of payment for the articles mentioned in the contract, which we think furnished an additional and distinct consideration for the guaranty sufficient of itself to support the same.

[4] We cannot escape the conviction that the present appeal was not taken in good faith, but for the purposes of delay, and that the court should exercise its power of imposing a penalty upon the appellant for what it deems an abuse of the right of appeal. The judgment is affirmed, and it is ordered that the appellant pay to the respondent the sum of $50 as damages for the taking and prosecuting of a frivolous appeal.

BORBA et al. v. DE MELLO. (Civ. 2341.)

APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑760(1)—BRIEFS—SUFFICIENCY.
One presenting his appeal by the alternative method must print in his brief such portion of the record as he desires reviewed, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, and references to the transcript are insufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by Constantino V. Borba and others against Jose De Mello. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Bradley & Bradley, of Visalia, for appellant. G. W. Zartman, of Tulare, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Defendant in this case appeals from an adverse judgment, and presents his appeal by the alternative method. In the briefs filed by counsel no attempt is made to comply with the provisions of section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, which require that the parties in presenting an appeal by the method mentioned shall print in their brief such portions of the record as they desire to call to the court's attention. Numerous references are made to the pages of the transcript filed, but it has been repeatedly held that the appellate courts will not examine the transcript documents in order to determine whether there is merit in the contentions made by the appellant. Many opinions of this court and the Supreme Court reiterate the rule. A collection of the cases so holding will be found grouped in the case of Barker Bros. v. Joos et al., 171 Pac. 1085. Not having properly before us sufficient of the record to illustrate the various contentions made on behalf of the appellant, we are compelled to hold that no error is shown as against the judgment.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Master and Servant ⟹375(2) — "Arising in Course of Employment."

Where one employed as a bolter-up within the hull of a ship in course of construction left his employment to go to lunch, but instead of going the usual safe way chose another dangerous way, whereby he was killed, he was not in the course of his employment within the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Proceedings by Minerva Higgins against the Moore & Scott Iron Works and others for compensation for the death of Michael Higgins, deceased. There was an award by the Industrial Accident Commission, and defendants petition for a writ of review. Award annulled.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court; Angellotti, C. J., and Lorigan, J., dissenting.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The award of the Industrial Accident Commission in this case must be annulled upon the following considerations: Michael Higgins, employed as a bolter-up within the hull of a ship in the course of construction at the Moore & Scott Iron Works, left his employment for the purpose of going to his lunch; he went by an unusual route, and undertook to go down a scaffolding and ladder on the outside of the ship—a means not intended for his use in leaving the ship at any time—another and perfectly safe method of exit having been provided by his employers. In doing so he lost his hold and fell, and was killed. Upon these facts it must be held that the death of Higgins did not take place in the course of his employment; nor was he at the time of the accident performing any service growing out of or incidental to his employment, nor acting within the course thereof. Fitzgerald v. Clarke & Son, 1 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 197.

The findings of the commission to the effect that he might have been leaving his work for the purpose of getting more bolts for use therein, or for the purpose of getting fresh air, seem to us to rest upon nothing but conjecture. There is no evidence in the record to sustain them. The fresh air, if he needed it, could have been obtained in a perfectly safe place upon the deck of the vessel, and nearer to the point of his immediate employment than the scaffolding from which he fell, and there seem to have been no bolts or other material necessary to his work to be obtained at the place toward which he was going. It is certain from this record, it seems to us, that he was, as has been said, simply abandoning his work before the hour when he was permitted to leave it.

The award is annulled.

PEOPLE v. HILL. (Cr. 707.)

1. Perjury ⟹25(6)— Sufficiency of Indictment.

Allegations that at a certain time in the superior court of the county of F. there was on trial a certain action in which the people were plaintiff and B. was defendant, and that it was then material to know where B. was on a certain date, and whether he was with the defendant at a certain place, was a sufficient presentation of the matter in which it was charged defendant committed perjury.

2. Perjury ⟹33(1)—Sufficiency of Evidence.

Evidence held sufficient to support a conviction of perjury.

3. Criminal Law ⟹553 — Findings of Fact.

The jury in a criminal case has the right to entirely discredit the testimony of defendant and another, and to base its verdict on other evidence which it considers more trustworthy.

4. Criminal Law ⟹730(1)—Misconduct of Counsel—Admonishing the Jury.

Where, in perjury case, prosecuting attorney improperly referred in argument to matters in the case where the offense was alleged to have been committed, on defendant's motion to admonish the jury, a statement of the court, "I think I will take the view of the defendant, and instruct the jury to disregard that part of it," was a sufficient admonition, especially where the matter referred to was known to the jury.

5. Criminal Law ⟹1207 — Indeterminate Sentences.

Where an offense was committed before the indeterminate sentence law took effect, an indeterminate sentence cannot be given.

6. CRIMINAL LAW ⚷1188 — HARMLESS ERROR—SENTENCE.

A conviction will not be reversed for error in giving an indeterminate sentence for an offense committed before the indeterminate sentence law went into effect, but the case will be remanded, with instructions to give a proper sentence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

A. J. Hill was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Remanded, with directions to give proper sentence.

Burns & Watkins and E. A. Williams, all of Fresno, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted in the superior court of Fresno county of perjury, and an indeterminate sentence of imprisonment in a state penitentiary was imposed upon him. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying him a new trial.

The points insisted upon for a reversal of the judgment and order are that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the information; insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict; misconduct of the district attorney by which the defendant was prevented from having a fair and impartial trial; and that the court erred in not determining the period of the defendant's confinement.

[1] Considering the first point raised, it appears that the information sets forth, among other things, that at a certain time in the superior court of the county of Fresno there was on trial a certain action in which the people of the state of California were plaintiff and Clarence C. Boling was defendant, and that it was then and there material to know in said action where the defendant Boling was on the night of December 6, 1915, and whether or not said Boling at said time time stayed all night with Hill, the defendant in this case, at a place known as Hub. It is claimed that this is not a sufficient setting forth of the controversy or matter in respect to which the offense was committed to comply with the provisions of section 966 of the Penal Code.

We think this statement of the indictment was a sufficient presentation of the matter in which it is charged that Hill committed the perjury complained of. The purpose of the requirement of setting forth the substance of the controversy or matter in which the perjury is alleged to have taken place is to inform the defendant of the offense with which he is charged, and this is as effectually done by the statement above given as if the whole proceedings of the trial had been incorporated in the information. The demurrer to the information on this ground was properly overruled.

[2, 3] The next, and main point urged by appellant for a reversal is the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. The verdict of the jury is that Hill, in testifying in the case of People v. Boling that Boling stayed with him in his camp at Hub on the night of December 6, 1915, testified falsely. In reaching this conclusion the jury had before them evidence of the following facts among others: One Boling was informed against and tried in the superior court of Fresno county for the larceny of certain mules. Upon that trial, in attempting to establish an alibi, he produced Hill, the present defendant, as a witness in his behalf, who testified that Boling passed the night of December 6, 1915, with him in his tent at a little station called Hub, where he testified he was camping at the time. It appears that Hub is a very small community containing but a few inhabitants. At the trial of the present case the prosecution called as witnesses a number of the residents of Hub, who testified to Hill's presence there at the end of December and the beginning of January, and that they had not seen him there prior to that time. The owner of the pasture in which Hill camped during his stay at Hub testified that the only time he saw Hill there was after December 27th. To the same effect is the testimony of Joe Fernandez, near whose house the defendant was camped, and who witnessed the arrival of Hill at Hub. Another witness testified to a horse trade with Hill at Hub on January 8th, and that Hill stayed at Hub but a few days, and in any event not more than ten days. This testimony is sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that Hill himself was not at Hub on December 6th, and that consequently Boling did not camp there with him on that night, even though there was contradictory evidence given by Boling and the defendant. The fact that the claim of defendant and Boling that the latter was at Hub on the night of December 6th was made at Boling's trial in an endeavor to relieve him of the charge of grand larceny was before the jury. It was also before them that Boling gave testimony contradictory of his claim that he visited Hub in December, and that he also stated a few days after December 6, 1915, that he passed that night in a barn. The jury had the right—which it evidently exercised—to entirely discredit the testimony of Boling and the defendant, and to base its verdict on other evidence which it considered more trustworthy.

[4] The next contention of the appellant is that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct during the trial by which the defendant was prevented from being fairly and impartially tried. Regarding this matter the record shows that the prosecuting officer, during his argument to the jury, referred to some evidence contained in a transcript of the trial of People v. Boling concerning the finding of certain stolen mules in Boling's pasture. This transcript had been offered in evidence in the present case for the purpose of showing the materiality of Hill's testimony given in that trial, and had been so offered in the absence of the jury. It is the appellant's contention that this evidence was addressed solely to the judge of the trial court, and that the district attorney should not have referred to it in his argument to the jury. Appellant's counsel objected to the prosecuting officer's reference to this testimony, and requested that the jury be instructed to disregard it. It is apparent from the colloquy between the court and counsel at the time that the court was rather inclined to the view that the reference was proper, but the court closed the incident by saying, "I think I will take the view of the defendant, and instruct the jury to disregard that part of it." The district attorney acquiesced in this by saying, "Very well, I don't oppose the order of the court." It is urged that this was not an instruction or admonition to the jury. There can be no doubt that it was intended to be such, and the district attorney at least so understood it, as is clear from his remark; and while it might with advantage have been given much more emphatically, we cannot hold in the present case that the defendant was prejudiced by this manner of closing the incident, especially in view of the fact that it was well known to the jury that Boling was charged with the theft of the mules. Indeed, this point seems to be somewhat inconsistent with the point urged in support of the demurrer, that the indictment or information did not sufficiently set forth the substance of the controversy—a point based upon the omission to state in that pleading that Boling was charged with having stolen the very mules referred to in the district attorney's argument.

[5, 6] Finally it is claimed by the appellant that the court erred in pronouncing upon him an indeterminate sentence. The offense was committed before the indeterminate sentence law at present in force took effect, and this case stands upon the same footing in that respect as Ex parte Lee, a case recently decided by the Supreme Court on habeas corpus, and reported in 171 Pac. 958, in which it is held that the indeterminate sentence law is ex post facto as to crimes committed before it took effect. The case at bar comes within the authority of that case, and is one wherein the court should have pronounced judgment in conformity to the state of the law as it existed at the time of the commission of the offense. The indeterminate sentence is the only error we find in the record. We will not reverse the case therefor, but will remand it to the superior court, with instructions that such steps be taken as may be necessary to bring the defendant before it, and in accordance with the procedure adopted in Ex parte Lee, supra, pronounce judgment upon the defendant under the law as it stood at the time his crime was committed.

It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. WILSON. (Cr. 560.)

(District Court of Appeal. Second District, California. March 26, 1918. Rehearing Denied April 25, 1918.)

1. HOMICIDE 🔑105 — JUSTIFICATION — ARREST.

An officer is not justified in shooting a man in order to compel submission to arrest for a misdemeanor.

2. HOMICIDE 🔑111 — SELF-DEFENSE — ARREST.

An officer, properly engaged in attempting to make an arrest on a misdemeanor charge, has the right to resist attack made upon him, and, being rightfully there and not legally considered the aggressor, may in his own defense take life.

3. HOMICIDE 🔑276 — JUSTIFICATION — EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for manslaughter against deputy constable who shot deceased while attempting to arrest him for disturbing the peace, evidence held not as a matter of law to make the act justifiable.

4. HOMICIDE 🔑332(3) — REVIEW — QUESTIONS OF FACT.

In a prosecution for manslaughter by a deputy constable in an attempt to make an arrest for disturbing the peace, the question on conflicting evidence as to whether the shooting was a crime for which conviction should be had is for the jury, and its finding is conclusive.

5. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1174(2)—CONDUCT OF JUROR—EVIDENCE—MISCONDUCT.

In a prosecution for manslaughter, evidence of improper conduct of a juror in giving a witness a ride in his automobile and discussing a map of the scene of the crime, in violation of the instructions, held not to require reversal.

6. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑823(5)—INSTRUCTIONS—INTENT.

In a prosecution against a deputy constable for killing a man he was attempting to arrest on a misdemeanor charge, an instruction that a person must be presumed to intend that which he attempts to or which he voluntarily does in fact do, and must also be presumed to intend all the natural, probable, and usual consequences of his own voluntary act, and the willful use of a deadly weapon without excuse or provocation generally indicates a felonious intent, correctly stated the law, when taken in connection with other parts of the charge, advising the jury that it must find beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed the acts charged.

7. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑761(11) — INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTION OF FACTS.

In a prosecution against a deputy constable for killing a person he was attempting to arrest on a misdemeanor charge, an instruction, advising that when a homicide is proved the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation or justification devolves upon defendant, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime amounts only to manslaughter, or that defendant is justifiable or excusable, was not erroneous, as assuming that the commission of the homicide by defendant had been proved.

8. Criminal Law 🔑1137(3)—Review—Instructions.

An instruction in a criminal case, given at defendant's request, cannot be questioned by defendant on appeal.

9. Homicide 🔑325 — Review — Reservation of Objections.

In a prosecution against a deputy constable for killing a person he was attempting to arrest on a misdemeanor charge, admission of evidence as to malice would not be considered, in the absence of an objection at the time offered.

10. Criminal Law 🔑419, 420(11) — Evidence—Hearsay.

In a prosecution against a deputy constable for killing a person whom he was attempting to arrest on a misdemeanor charge, a statement by a witness of the answer to a question that he had asked a third person as to whether he knew who owned the gun that had been found at the scene of the crime was inadmissible as hearsay.

11. Homicide 🔑268 — Manslaughter — Questions of Fact.

In a prosecution against a deputy constable for killing a person whom he was attempting to arrest on a misdemeanor charge, evidence as to whether the bullet that killed deceased came from defendant's gun or from that of another held to make a question for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

G. A. Wilson was convicted of manslaughter, and from the judgment and a denial of new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Helms, of Los Angeles, and J. F. Frick, of Lompoc, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was charged, by an information of the district attorney of the county of Santa Barbara, with having on the 29th day of April, 1917, murdered Pedro Lopez. The jury by its verdict found him guilty of the crime of manslaughter, and the trial judge sentenced him to serve a term of ten years in the penitentiary. Motion for a new trial was made and denied, and an appeal was then taken both from the judgment and from the order denying that motion.

The killing occurred while appellant, who was at the time a deputy constable, was assisting one Knight, the constable under whom appellant was deputized, in an attempt to arrest Lopez and a man named Flores. On the day in question Lopez, in company with Flores, one Pena, and one Cordero, was in a building which was located on the main street of the little town of Santa Ynez in the county of Santa Barbara. Lopez at least had been drinking, and by all of the testimony was shown to have been considerably intoxicated. The men emerged from the building onto a vacant lot adjoining thereto. They were quarreling and fighting among themselves, one knocking the other down repeatedly. A fifth man named Espinosa made another of the party who participated in the fight on the lot. As to how the encounter started and as to who the chief aggressor was, is, to our minds, immaterial to a consideration of the case. While the men were engaged in the mêlée, Wilson, who conducted a garage in the neighborhood, was notified of the disturbance by an employé of his, this employé being related to one of the participants in the disturbance. The announcement of this employé to Wilson at the time was for Wilson to "come; they are killing my cousin." Wilson had just previous to that time suffered an injury to one of his legs below the knee, and the injured part was incased in a cast, making it necessary for him to use crutches or a crutch. Responding to the call made, Wilson got into an automobile and rode to the scene of the disturbance. There were a number of bystanders there at the time engaged in watching the fight, and, as we may remark, seeming to enjoy the performance, as none of them offered to interfere to quell the disturbance. Wilson, upon his arrival at the scene, left his machine, called upon two bystanders to assist him, and attempted to arrest the men who were fighting. There was testimony of the prosecution introduced showing that he called upon the disturbers to cease their fighting, and notified them that they were under arrest. That these men knew Wilson well, and knew him to be an officer authorized to make arrests, the evidence admits of no doubt at all. Instead of submitting to arrest, the men turned upon Wilson; some one of them knocked his crutch or crutches away and knocked his gun from his hand. The testimony was undisputed as showing that Wilson made no attempt to use his revolver in any way other than in the attempt to intimidate the men and compel them to submit to arrest. The disturbers, however, appeared not to fear the gun, and continued their aggressive acts against Wilson, who, recovering his gun from the ground, made his way back to the automobile and went after Knight, the constable. It is worth while here to note that had Wilson the inclination or the desire to have shot any of the men during this first encounter, he had ample opportunity to do so, for he was armed with a large caliber revolver which was fully loaded. As soon as Wilson left the scene to get the assistance of Knight, two of the participants in the row made their escape or went away, and there remained Lopez, Flores, and Espinosa. It is not clear that Espinosa participated actively in interfering with Wilson's first attempt to arrest the disturbers of the peace. Flores and Lopez, as the evidence indicates, appreciated the fact that when Wilson obtained assistance their arrest might be effected. As Wilson returned with Knight, the three men last mentioned had started across the field. Knight called upon them to stop. The testimony of Flores and Espinosa was generally to the effect that they obeyed the command, while Knight and Wilson agree that the men did not. Whether they came to a stop or not upon the call by Knight, it is clear beyond doubt from the whole record that Flores and Lopez declined to submit themselves to arrest. Knight stated that he fired several shots into the ground in order to intimidate the men, and there is no dispute about the fact that he did fire into the ground. The testimony shows that Knight used his gun only in the attempt to intimidate the men and compel them to submit to arrest and as a club to beat off their attack upon him. It was shown clearly that both Flores and Lopez declined to acknowledge the right of Knight to arrest them, and that they proceeded with physical force to drive Knight away, as they had previously done to Wilson. Knight grappled with the men, and the two appear to have gotten the better of him. Meanwhile Wilson stood by, several feet away, taking no active part in the tussle.

Up to this point we have recited the facts which appear to be without material dispute as the record shows them. From this point the testimony in its narrative of the occurrence which culminated in the shooting of Lopez is divergent. The testimony of several witnesses introduced on behalf of the prosecution, some of which is that given by bystanders, some by Flores and Espinosa, was to the effect that in the midst of the struggle between Knight and Flores and Lopez, Wilson approached Lopez, and, standing a distance of from six to eight feet away from him, deliberately discharged his revolver in Lopez's direction, whereupon Lopez sank to the ground, shot through the head. Lopez was in fact shot through the head, and died almost immediately. On the other hand, the testimony first of Knight was that when the two men whom he was attempting to arrest began to get the better of him, he called out that, unless some one came to his assistance, he would have to shoot one of the men; that Wilson immediately came to his assistance, a shot was fired, and Lopez sank to the ground, and that he (Knight) was then able to place handcuffs upon Flores. At about the same time, Knight testified, he (Knight) fired another shot from his revolver, aiming the shot downward between the legs of one of the men with whom he was struggling. Wilson testified that he did not intentionally fire any shot; that when he saw the men getting the better of Knight and Knight called for help, he approached and struck Flores, who appeared to be the more obstreperous of the two, over the head with his revolver, and that his revolver was discharged accidentally. As to where the shot went he testified that he did not know.

We have here given a brief synopsis of the testimony covering the case as it was presented to the jury. There was some testimony in the record offered for the purpose of showing malice on the part of Wilson. This testimony consisted of statements of some of the witnesses that they had heard that Wilson had said at a prior time that there were some men whom he intended to "get," mentioning the name of Lopez as being one of them. There was testimony by another witness that after the shooting of Lopez, Wilson had stated that he had shot Lopez and made some further remark that he did not think any more of doing that than of hunting "rabbits." This testimony we must conclude was given no weight by the jury, for the verdict of manslaughter eliminated any finding of malice. No doubt that the jury considered, when it was made clear to them that Wilson upon the first encounter had every opportunity under provoking circumstances to use his weapon against Lopez, that there was small showing of any particular malice held in the mind of Wilson against any of the men concerned. From the undisputed evidence it appears very clear that Wilson as an officer was fully authorized to arrest Lopez and Flores and the other men engaged in the fight, when he first appeared upon the scene where the disturbance was in progress. These men were then engaged in a public disturbance of the peace. They added to their offense that of resisting an officer in the discharge of a public duty. Not only was Wilson authorized to arrest them, but if he had declined to interfere he would have left himself open to a charge of dereliction. The right to arrest the men did not cease when Wilson went away to get the assistance of Knight, any more than had the men fled, remained out of sight for a time, and then been overtaken by Wilson and whomsoever he might have secured to assist him in making the arrest. Knight's act in attempting to make the arrest was accompanied by all of the right which Wilson himself had.

[1-4] By reason of the particular verdict returned, we then view the case as being one which submitted to the jury the questions: (1) Whether under the circumstances of the case, the arrest being for a misdemeanor, there was no such exercise of force on behalf of the persons whose arrest was being attempted as to authorize the use of a deadly weapon to the extent of killing; (2) whether, conceding no intent to discharge the weapon and no necessity to so discharge it, the officer made use of it in such a careless and negligent manner as to make him responsible where a death resulted from his act. The first proposition, of course, involves the matter of self-defense. The law is well understood to be that an officer is not justified in shooting a man in order to compel submission to an arrest on a misdemeanor charge. While this is so, an officer properly engaged in attempting to make an arrest in such a case has the right to resist attack made upon him, and, being rightfully there and not legally considered the aggressor, may in his own defense take life. Under the testimony heard by the jury in the case, it does not appear as a matter of law that the act was justifiable. The facts under the conflicting testimony were for the jury to resolve. It was for the jury to say, judging from all the circumstances, as to whether the shooting of Lopez amounted to a crime for which a conviction of Wilson should be had. Upon those questions of fact, and where the verdict is against the defendant, an appellate tribunal has no right to say that the determination of the jury should have been otherwise. Our examination can only extend to a consideration of the alleged errors which it is claimed were committed in the course of the trial by which defendant was prevented from having a full and fair hearing as guaranteed by the law.

[5] Appellant contends, first, that he is entitled to a new trial because the jury received evidence out of court and the members thereof were guilty of prejudicial misconduct. In support of this ground made on his motion for a new trial defendant made affidavits, and by consent of the prosecution testimony was introduced orally on both sides. One Brant, at the trial, gave important evidence for the people. One of the jurors, Gordon, was the employer of the son-in-law of Brant at Santa Barbara. On several occasions during the trial Gordon was seen in company with Brant, riding in Gordon's automobile to the courthouse. Another juror, Gates, accompanied them on at least one occasion. On another occasion Gott and Fitzgerald, witnesses for the state, were with them. Appellant did not show that the persons mentioned had discussed at any of these times the case or any of the evidence. The attorney who represented the appellant at the trial testified that, when a map or plat used to illustrate the scene of the shooting, and which had been introduced in evidence, was handed to the jury, the jury were instructed by the court not to discuss the map, and that, notwithstanding this injunction, Jurors Gordon and Gates did point out the various places delineated on the drawing and discuss the same. It appears by the record that the jury, after having retired to the jury room to deliberate upon a verdict, and before agreeing thereto, was returned into court, where the request was made that the jury be allowed to take certain exhibits, including this map. By consent of people and defendant, the exhibits were given to the jury, which again retired to the jury room. It was while the jury was in the courtroom in the presence of the judge that it is claimed Gates and Gordon discussed the map. Gordon testified there was no such discussion had in the courtroom, and that while he had invited the three witnesses mentioned to ride with him to the courthouse, he had had no conversation with them about the case or the evidence; that he had merely picked them up on the street while all were on their way to attend the trial. Not only did appellant fail to furnish the trial judge with any proof that any improper communications had passed between the jury and witnesses, but positive testimony was furnished that no such communications passed. Conceding that it is always better that jurors should so conduct themselves as to avoid even the suspicion that they may have had discussion with witnesses about the case in which they are sitting, a suspicion alone may not be taken as sufficient to establish the fact claimed. Had the showing made by the defendant, involving the association of Gordon with the witnesses Brant, Fitzgerald, and Gates, stood alone and uncontradicted, the trial judge would not have been authorized to conclude that there had been no interchange of improper communication. Referring to the question as to whether Jurors Gates and Gordon, disregarding the injunction of the court, passed remarks between themselves upon the map exhibit while in the courtroom, it will be seen that the same condition of conflicting evidence was again presented to the trial judge. But we cannot perceive how, conceding that the jurors did do what is charged against them, prejudicial error would be created. The jury came into the courtroom and asked for the exhibits, including the map. Defendant consented that they have the map, and it was taken to the jury room for examination. The map had been regularly introduced in evidence, and its contents were presumably well known to the jury.

Another ground of the motion for a new trial was that the court had misdirected the jury in matters of law, and erred in its decision in the course of the trial. The discussion of the alleged errors in the giving of instructions should be prefaced by a summary of the charge as given by the court. The trial judge in this case gave very full instructions touching the right of peace officers to use deadly weapons in making arrests. He defined what constituted a disturbance of the peace and what constituted resisting an officer. While, as counsel for appellant suggest, the trial judge evidently thought that Knight and Wilson had not the right to attempt the arrest of Flores and Lopez at the time they did, this view of his was given expression only at the time of the sentencing of this appellant. The instructions did not so declare, either directly or by reasonable inference. And we deem it proper to say, at the end of an exhaustive perusal of the record, that we find nothing to indicate on the part of the trial judge the hostile prejudiced attitude ascribed to him in the briefs of counsel. We find but one instruction offered by defendant and marked in the record as "refused." That instruction defined the crime of manslaughter and its substance was contained in the charge read by the court to the jury.

[6] Instruction No. 4 is attacked on the ground that the assumption was presented to the jury that there was an absence of evidence showing that appellant did not intend the death of Lopez. This instruction was in the following words:

> "A person must be presumed to intend to do that which he voluntarily and willfully does in fact do, and must also be presumed to intend all the natural, probable, and usual consequences of his own voluntary acts. Therefore, when one person assaults another violently with a dangerous weapon, likely to kill, and which does in fact destroy the life of the party assailed, the natural presumption is that such assailant intended death, or other great bodily harm; and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, this presumption must prevail. The willful use of a deadly weapon without excuse or provocation generally indicates a felonious intent."

The instruction correctly stated the law, and is one so frequently given as to have become almost axiomatic. It must not be read alone, but must be read in connection with the entire charge, and particularly that portion of it which advised the jury that it must find beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed the acts charged. It was qualified, too, by instructions defining the right of peace officers to resort to the use of deadly weapons in making arrests or in defending themselves against attack while so engaged.

[7] Instruction No. 29, it is contended, was inappropriate and erroneous under the defense made to the charge. By this instruction the jury was advised that when a homicide is proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation or that would justify or excuse it, devolves upon a defendant, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime amounts only to manslaughter, or that the defendant is justifiable or excusable. Of this instruction counsel say:

> (1) "It is a practical assumption by the court that the commission of the homicide by the defendant has been proved"; (2) "otherwise the instruction could have no application to the case, and, by the words of the instruction itself, it should not have been given, since the very last clause of the instruction itself provides that it is not to be applied when the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the defendant was justifiable or excusable."

Read in connection with other instructions given, there was no assumption of guilt reasonably to be deduced from this instruction. In making the second point against it, counsel has tried the case for the jury and rendered his verdict. The charge made in the information was murder, and the jury had the right to determine under the evidence whether defendant was guilty at all, or, if guilty, whether his guilt was of the first or second degree, or was manslaughter.

[9] It is argued that the testimony of two witnesses to the effect that about a month before the shooting of Lopez they had heard Wilson say that he was going to "get" Lopez, Flores, and another man named, and that he had a big gun that would stop them, referred to statements and incidents too remote to be competent. This testimony was not remote in point of time, and was introduced in support of the attempt on the part of the prosecution to show malice of Wilson. As has already been noted, the jury evidently did not pay great heed to this testimony for the offense of which they convicted the appellant involved no particular malicious intent. But there is another and complete answer to any objection that might have been here made to this evidence, and that is that it appears that no objection at all was urged at the trial against its introduction. The same condition of the record is shown and the same answers may be made to the contention for error in admitting the testimony of Ed Hames. Hames testified regarding some "trouble" that appellant had had a year before with Lopez over cattle, and to having heard appellant at that time say that he would kill Lopez. It would serve only to extend this opinion to an unwarrantable length to take up with more detail the objections urged against the admissibility of other testimony, or to alleged misconduct of the prosecuting officers. The testimony of which complaint is pointedly made was received without a word of objection from the defendant at the trial. Statements of the prosecuting attorneys, which it is claimed were calculated and intended to improperly influence the jury, were not objected to at the time, and no request was made to have the court instruct the jury to disregard them. The prosecuting officers were indeed zealous in their endeavors to convict the defendant. The introduction of an American flag found about the neck of Lopez, and the narrative of how it had been the subject of a quarrel on the day of the shooting when Lopez was said to have declared his willingness to fight for the flag, were no doubt "make-weights," for we can see no reason why the flag or the incident referred to tended to establish that Wilson shot Lopez either lawfully or unlawfully. Evidently the prosecutors, from the manner of their examination of witnesses, took the view, which they sought to impress upon the jury, that Wilson and Knight had not the right to attempt the arrest of Lopez and Flores. We must assume that the instructions of the court were heeded by the jury, and, as before noted, these instructions were comprehensive in defining the rights of officers as our law declares them to be.

[10] It is claimed that the court erred in sustaining objection to a question asked of the witness Bailey, who was called for the defense. Flores, a fellow participant with Lopez in the disturbance occurring on the day Lopez met his death, while testifying for the people, was asked on cross-examination whether Lopez had a gun at the time he was shot. Flores replied in the negative, and was next asked whether he had not, after the shooting, told Bailey that there was a gun found at the scene of the affray, and that it was Lopez's. He replied that he had not so stated. Bailey was interrogated as to the alleged statements of Flores. The record shows the examination of Bailey on this subject to have been as follows:

> "Q. Did you in the presence of Frank Flores and his mother on the Indian Reservation, near Santa Ynez, on the night of the 30th of April, 1917, have any conversation with Frank Flores about a gun? A. I asked Mr. Flores if the gun that Robles picked up over there near where the fight occurred was his gun. He stated that it was not. I said, 'Do you know whose gun it is?'
> "Mr. Ford (the assistant prosecutor): Just a moment. We object to that as hearsay.
> "The Court: That objection is sustained."

The objection, we think, was properly sustained on the ground stated by the prosecuting officer.

[11] It is claimed that the evidence showed without conflict that it was a bullet from Knight's gun, and not from Wilson's gun, that killed Lopez. Knight was using a .32 caliber gun, while Wilson's gun was a heavy .45 caliber weapon. The testimony of the physician who examined the wound in Lopez's head was that the aperture at the place of exit was much larger than the aperture at the point of entrance. There was testimony that the bullets used in Knight's gun were soft, and that the bullets used in Wilson's gun were hard, "steel-jacketed." The defense produced a witness who qualified as an expert and who had had experience in army hospitals, and had also made certain tests before the trial with guns and bullets of the kinds used by Wilson and Knight. The testimony of this witness was to the effect that a .45 caliber bullet such as was used in Wilson's gun would produce approximately the same size of hole at the point of exit as at the point of entrance, and that the kind of bullet used in Knight's gun would produce a smaller hole at the point of entrance than at the point of exit, owing to the fact that the bullet was softer and would spread out as it encountered the bone on the opposite side of a head. This evidence was not conclusive of the fact that a bullet from Knight's gun, and not from Wilson's, had passed through the head of Lopex, and it was still left for the jury to determine under all of the facts laid before them as to whether the deadly wound had been inflicted by appellant.

The law as stated by appellant's counsel touching the right of peace officers to use deadly weapons in effecting arrests is no doubt correctly set forth in the briefs. In the opening paragraph of this opinion we have expressed a view which accords with that which is given exposition in the authorities cited by appellant. The difficulty with appellant's position is that he leaves out of account the consideration that there was some substantial evidence given which showed that Wilson acted deliberately and without such provocation as the law deems sufficient to justify an officer in killing a person whose arrest on a charge of misdemeanor he is attempting to accomplish. It may be that that testimony was untrue; it may be that the shooting was an accident which occurred while Wilson in good faith was using only such force as the circumstances reasonably justified in assisting his fellow officer in the lawful undertaking of arresting a disturber of the peace. But we are not permitted to substitute our judgment for that of the jury, or to say on the facts that the verdict should have been otherwise. It may be well said that any error of a fairly substantial nature might be sufficient to justify a reversal of the case. This because of the fact that a verdict in favor of the defendant could not have been assailed on the ground that it was not fully supported by competent evidence. In other words, any substantial error would make it appear more readily that there had been a miscarriage of justice. However, we have searched with great diligence through the record, and have examined with much care all of the assignments of error made by counsel in their brief. We find nothing which would justify the conclusion that defendant was not given a fair trial, or that he was denied any right which the law guarantees to a person accused of crime.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Where a misdemeanor is admittedly committed within the city of Los Angeles, the police courts of that city have exclusive jurisdiction under St. 1913, p. 469, giving exclusive jurisdiction to police courts of the cities of the first and one-half class of all misdemeanors occurring within the city, so that a commitment issued by the justice of the peace of a township on an of-

Application by Lorton L. Dowell for a writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner discharged.

C. B. Ladd, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Erwin W. Widney, City Pros., and W. K. Crawford, Deputy City Pros., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. It appears by the return made to the writ that petitioner is held in custody by the chief of police of the city of Los Angeles under a writ of commitment issued by the justice of the peace of Malibu township. This commitment shows that the petitioner was convicted of the crime of battery and sentenced to serve a term of 90 days in the city prison. Petitioner bases his demand to be released from custody on two contentions, namely: (1) The justice of the peace of Malibu township has no authority to commit a person to the custody of the chief of police of Los Angeles city; (2) that the justices' court of Malibu township has no jurisdiction of a misdemeanor committed within the limits of the city of Los Angeles because exclusive jurisdiction to try all such offenses is conferred by legislative enactment upon the police courts of such city.

[1, 2] We are not pointed to the authority of any provision of statute or charter showing any right in a justice of the peace of a township to commit an offender to the custody of the chief of police of Los Angeles city. Commitments issued by justices of the peace of townships run to the sheriff of the county and not to local police officers. While we think that the petitioner is improperly held by respondent because of the lack of authority in the justice to commit to that particular officer's custody, it might be questionable whether the order to be made herein, granting the first contention of petitioner to be well founded, should be that he should be discharged absolutely from custody or remanded to the court having jurisdiction of the cause for further proceedings. However, involved in the second contention is the question as to whether the justice's court of Malibu township had any jurisdiction of the charge upon which petitioner was convicted. By general statute of the Legislature (Stats. 1913, p. 469), exclusive jurisdiction is given to police courts in cities of the first and one-half class (Los Angeles) of all misdemeanors occurring within the city. That the Legislature has the right to vest exclusive jurisdiction in police courts of misdemeanors arising within the limits of the cities is held in Union Ice Co. v. Rose, 11 Cal. App. 357, 104 Pac. 1006, and cases therein cited. Ex parte Dolan, 128 Cal. 460, 60 Pac. 1094, cited by respondent, does not deny to the Legislature the right we have ascribed to it, but holds only that the city charter may not do the same thing. As the misdemeanor with which petitioner was charged was admittedly committed within the present limits of the city of Los Angeles, we think that the police courts of that city only had jurisdiction of the offense. It follows, therefore, that the commitment issued by the justice of the peace of Malibu township is without force and is void.

It is ordered that petitioner be, and he hereby is, discharged from the custody of the chief of police of Los Angeles city.

1. CONTRACTS ⟹306(4) — BUILDING CONTRACTS—ABANDONMENT BY SUBCONTRACTOR—NOTICE.

Where contract between principal contractor and subcontractor provided that if subcontractor should delay work, the contractor might proceed therewith if after three days' notice to prosecute the work subcontractor does not do so, no notice was required to authorize contractor to complete work, where subcontractor entirely abandoned contract.

2. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY ⟹82(2)—BUILDING CONTRACTS—NONPERFORMANCE—DAMAGES.

Where subcontractor abandons work and owner completing the job deducted the cost thereof from amount payable principal contractor under his contract, the principal contractor was damaged to the extent of such deduction, and can recover such damages from subcontractor's bondsmen.

3. COSTS ⟹260(1)—DAMAGES FOR FRIVOLOUS APPEAL.

Where an appeal is obviously for purpose of delay, the court may impose additional damages for taking a frivolous appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the New England Equitable Insurance Company, a corporation, against the Chicago Bonding & Surety Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Watt, Miller, Thornton & Watt, of San Francisco, for appellant. Samuel Knight and F. Eldred Boland, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

ZOOK, Judge pro tem. Plaintiff's assignor, one Carr, entered into a contract with the regents of the University of California to build a classroom at Davis, and sublet the portion of his contract to defendant Macdonald, taking a bond from defendant surety company for Macdonald's faithful performance of his contract. Macdonald abandoned the work, whereupon Carr proceeded to do it himself, but later, becoming financially embarrassed, was unable to finish the work, and the regents took it over, completed the job, and deducted the cost thereof, amounting to $1,409, from the money payable to Carr under his contract. On this state of facts plaintiff had judgment against defendant surety company for $750, the full amount of its bond.

[1] But two points are presented on this appeal. The contract provided that in the event that Macdonald should delay the work Carr might prosecute it "if same is not done after three days' notice." It is claimed that Carr did not give this notice before proceeding with the work after Macdonald's abandonment, and that the surety was thereby relieved from liability. As was expressly held by this court in Bacigalupi v. Phœnix Bldg., etc., Co., 14 Cal. App. 632, 639, 112 Pac. 892, notice is unnecessary where the contractor entirely abandons the contract, which the trial court expressly found to be the fact in the case at bar.

[2] Appellant's only other contention is that because Carr did not himself complete the work, he was not injured by Macdonald's failure to do the work. The owner did complete the work, at an actual and reasonable cost of $925.50, and as this amount was deducted from the amount to be paid to Carr on his contract, it is obvious that he was damaged to the extent of this deduction.

[3] The appeal in this case, as in another case appealed by the same defendant at this term of court, is obviously without merit, and we are satisfied that the same was taken for the purpose of delay. We are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, and that the plaintiff should recover from the defendant surety company the sum of $50 as damages for a frivolous appeal. It is therefore so ordered.

LOBBETT & DEAN v. OAKLAND, A. & E. RY. (Civ. 2293.)

1. Street Railroads ⇐103(3)—Last Clear Chance Rule—Knowledge of Danger.

Where motorman slowed down, thinking plaintiff's truck was going to cross the tracks, but speeded up when he saw the truck slow down, assuming that it would stop before it reached the track, the last clear chance doctrine did not apply; actual knowledge of plaintiff's danger being necessary.

2. Appeal and Error ⇐1071(5)—Harmless Error—Immaterial Findings.

An erroneous finding that plaintiff could have avoided collision with a street car by turning his truck to the right or left was immaterial, where plaintiff was negligent in not having control of the truck when approaching the crossing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Action by Lobbett & Dean, a corporation, against the Oakland, Antioch & Eastern Railway, a corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

B. D. Marx Greene, of Berkeley, Greene & Sinclair and Barry J. Colding, of San Francisco, for appellant. Snook & Church, of Oakland, for respondent.

ZOOK, Judge pro tem. This is an action for damages arising out of a collision between plaintiff's motor truck and an interurban train of the defendant, as a result of which plaintiff's truck was badly damaged. The scene of the accident was at the crossing of Shafter avenue, over which defendant has a right of way, and Cavour street, in the city of Oakland. The crossing is at grade, and both streets are practically level at that point. There was practically no conflict of evidence upon the trial, and the facts, briefly stated, are as follows: Plaintiff's driver, who admitted that he was perfectly familiar with the crossing in question and had frequently seen trains of the defendant pass by at that point, was driving a five-ton truck, loaded with rock, westerly along Cavour street, at the rate of about eight miles per hour, about the maximum speed of the machine when loaded. When about 33 feet from the crossing, he threw out his clutch, and after he had gone about 8 feet further, he saw defendant's train approaching. He immediately put on both brakes in an endeavor to stop, but was carried by the momentum of the heavy load to a point 2 feet from the nearest rail of defendant, and within the interference line of the train. He made no endeavor to turn to the right or left along Shafter avenue, although the court expressly found that by so doing he could easily have avoided the collision. Defendant's motorman testified that he first saw the truck when about 300 feet from the crossing; he immediately put on the air brake in order to stop and let the truck cross ahead of him, and could have brought the train to a standstill before it reached the crossing; but, seeing the truck slowing down, he speeded up the train upon the assumption that the truck would stop in time. When he finally saw that the truck was in danger, he was unable to stop the train in time to avoid a collision. Upon this state of facts, the court found that both plaintiff's driver and defendant's motorman were negligent, and gave judgment in favor of defendant upon the ground of plaintiff's contributory negligence.

[1] Appellant's main contention is that, conceding its own negligence, the case is one for the application of the last clear chance rule, but we are of the opinion that this claim is not well founded. The motorman's negligence, if any, lay in his speeding up the train after having slowed down, and the reason given by him for doing so was his erroneous assumption that the truck would stop before it reached the crossing. He having shown a reasonable degree of care in slowing down but a moment before, when he thought the truck was going to cross, it is only reasonable to accept his statement that he thought any danger was passed when he speeded up again. Under these circumstances, there being no other evidence as to the state of the motorman's mind, the plaintiff has wholly failed to establish one of the principal conditions precedent to the application of the rule in question, namely, actual knowledge on the part of defendant's servant of the perilous position of the truck. Appellant's claim that the last clear chance rule applies where the defendant is in possession of facts from which a reasonable man would infer that plaintiff was in peril, although he may not have actual knowledge of such peril, is based upon a single sentence contained in the opinion of the Supreme Court in Arnold v. San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Ry., 164 Pac. 798. That the language relied on was inadvertently used in that case is apparent from the recent case of Collins v. Marsh, 169 Pac. 389, where it is said that:

> "It is well settled in this state that the 'last clear chance' rule does not apply where the defendant was not, but should have been, aware of the plaintiff's danger."

[2, 3] Appellant's only other contention is that the finding of the court that plaintiff's driver could have turned to either side and avoided the collision is not supported by the evidence. Inasmuch as plaintiff's driver was clearly negligent in not having his truck under control when approaching the crossing, this finding is immaterial and not necessary to support the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

Proceedings on motion for new trial are independent of the judgment.

5. DIVORCE 🔑284 — APPEAL — NEW TRIAL —EFFECT ON JUDGMENT.

In divorce suit, plaintiff's appeal from a judgment apportioning the property did not deprive the court of jurisdiction to modify the judgment on motion for new trial, which was an independent proceeding.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Suit for divorce by Maria Machado against Frank R. Machado. From the judgment rendered, and order denying new trial on condition, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Beggs & McComish, of San Jose, and Joseph Rafael, of San Francisco, for appellant. C. L. Witten, of San Jose, R. V. Burns, of Mountain View, and F. H. Bloomingdale, of San Jose, for respondent.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. This action was begun in 1913. Plaintiff had judgment for divorce on the ground of cruelty, and included in the judgment also was a settlement of property rights, to which she objected, and she appealed from the latter part of the judgment and was granted a new trial of the issues regarding property. The superior court retried those issues, and again adjusted the property rights of the parties. In this latter judgment it determined that what is known as the Guth ranch was separate property of the defendant, and what is known as the Alviso ranch was partly separate and partly community property, and awarded to the defendant as his separate property 40/63 of the Alviso ranch, and, determining that 23/63 thereof was community property, gave the defendant an even half of that. The court also added a provision to the judgment that the defendant should pay $50 a month to the plaintiff for the period of six months, and set aside all previous orders regarding alimony and support for plaintiff. It also decreed to be void a homestead which the plaintiff claimed on the Alviso ranch. The plaintiff appealed from this judgment on the 15th day of November, 1915. Thereafter, upon the hearing of a motion for a new trial, and on the 10th day of December, 1915, the court made an order modifying this judgment so as to award to the plaintiff 149/338 of the Alviso ranch instead of the 23/126 thereof, that is to say, one-half of 24/63 thereof, awarded her in the judgment. The condition of the refusal to grant a new trial to the plaintiff on the property issues was that the defendant should accept this latter division of the Alviso ranch, which he did. The plaintiff again appealed from this latter judgment as to property rights, and from this order.

[1, 2] Her first contention is that the order holding her homestead void and refusing to set it apart is unsupported by the evidence. The burden of showing not only the declaration of the homestead and the recording of the declaration, but also of showing that she was a resident upon the property at the time the declaration was made and recorded, rested upon the plaintiff. Apprate v. Faure, 121 Cal. 466, 53 Pac. 917. Her testimony is the only evidence upon this point, and it is conflicting and very uncertain, indeed difficult to understand; and therefore the trial court was justified in finding that that portion of her testimony which showed that she was not residing upon the property at the time of the declaration, but had abandoned it, was true. This being so, that finding is supported by the evidence.

[3] The plaintiff's next contention is that that part of the judgment at the second trial, providing that all orders theretofore made for the payment of alimony and for the support of the plaintiff should be vacated, was outside the issues of the case, in that, as it is claimed, no issue had been raised on this matter and no evidence introduced by either party relevant thereto. But evidence was introduced on the question of the value and character of the property of the parties, the very purpose of this evidence being to secure a just apportionment thereof between the parties. This justified the court in setting aside its former orders and in making a new judgment upon this subject. Indeed it is impossible for us to see what other purpose the appeal of the plaintiff upon the subject of property rights subserved except this.

[4, 5] The appellant's third contention is that her appeal from the judgment of November 9, 1915, deprived the trial court of jurisdiction to modify that judgment on motion for a new trial. But it has been the consistent practice of the courts of this state to insist upon the acceptance of modifications in judgments as a condition of refusing a new trial. The proceedings upon motion for a new trial are independent of the judgment. Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, § 2. None of the cases cited by the appellants seems to be a case where the court made it a condition of refusing a new trial that a modification of the judgment be assented to. Pashgian v. Stephenson, 10 Cal. App. 36, 100 Pac. 1075, was a case where a judgment was modified without a motion for a new trial, or at least no proceedings for a new trial appear in the record. In Shay v. Chicago Clock Co., 111 Cal. 549, 44 Pac. 237, a diminution of the record was suggested at the hearing of the appeal to bring up a document purporting to be a judgment nunc pro tunc. This nunc pro tunc judgment does not appear to have been made upon motion for a new trial. The same state of the record is found in Reynolds v. Reynolds, 67 Cal. 176, 7 Pac. 480. The plaintiff's motion for a new trial was pending. It was an independent proceeding of which the trial court had jurisdiction. Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, § 2. The appeal did not deprive the trial court of its authority. The court made an order on the hearing of this motion for a new trial that if the defendant should consent to a modification of the judgment the motion would be denied; otherwise it would be granted. The consent was given and the motion denied. The fact that this order was made after an appeal had been taken did not deprive the court of authority to make it, as it was a proper order in the proceeding for a new trial. Besides, it does not seem proper to permit the plaintiff to complain of this modification because it was altogether in her favor.

The fourth contention of the appellant is that the court erred in finding that all the personal property and the Guth ranch were the separate property of the defendant, and that the defendant had a $4,000 separate estate in the Alviso ranch.

It would serve no useful purpose to review the figures by which the court undertook to follow the issues and profits of the large business which the defendant owned as his separate property at the time of his marriage to the plaintiff, and of the changes in personal property and the investment and reinvestment of money which took place between his marriage and the beginning of this action for divorce. It is sufficient to say that the evidence supports the court's finding upon these points.

The fifth contention of the plaintiff is that she should have been given more than one-half of the community property. Leaving out of account the $50 a month allowed the plaintiff for six months it may be said that the trial court was exercising its discretion as to the division of this community property, and we cannot say that it abused its discretion in making the division as it did. The circumstances of the case presented many difficulties in the division and apportionment of the property of the parties; and the case itself is an illustration of the rule that the trial court must be given some latitude to use its own judgment in such matters.

PEOPLE v. FRAYSIER. (Cr. 675.)

1. WITNESSES 🔑370(1)—IMPEACHMENT.

Conceding arresting officer was hostile to accused, such matters went to his credibility, but did not conclusively show that his testimony or that of witnesses secured by him was false.

2. RAPE 🔑51(5)—EVIDENCE—WEIGHT.

Where prosecutrix testified that she told arresting officer of the rape in order to avoid being punished, but did not say that her story was false, such matter went to her credibility, but if believed by the jury her testimony was sufficient upon which to rest conviction.

3. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION 🔑176—ISSUES AND PROOF—TIME OF OFFENSE.

Failure to prove the exact day and hour of the crime is not fatal, where accused is not prejudiced thereby.

4. RAPE 🔑59(12)—INSTRUCTIONS—FAILURE TO MAKE COMPLAINT.

It is not error to refuse instructions that if prosecutrix made no complaint of the alleged crime the jury should view her failure to do so as a suspicious circumstance indicating that her story was false.

5. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑785(3)—INSTRUCTIONS—CAUTION.

The jury in prosecution for rape was sufficiently cautioned by instruction that a charge of rape is easy to make and difficult to disprove; that testimony of a child of tender years such as prosecutrix ought to be viewed with care and caution; and that evidence in such case must be weighed with utmost care and without bias or prejudice.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Louis Fraysier was convicted of statutory rape, and he appeals from the judgment and order denying motion for new trial. Affirmed.

A. C. Keane, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of statutory rape. This appeal is from that judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The defendant was a gardener making his living by growing and selling vegetables in San Francisco. His garden lay in the center of a city block shut in by fences and dwellings. Into that somewhat secluded place customers often sent their children to buy vegetables. Without elaborating the revolting details it will suffice to say that according to the testimony of the prosecutrix, a girl 12 years of age, she went to the defendant's garden one day in September, 1916, and was there ravished by the defendant. As is unfortunately often the case in prosecutions of this character, the testimony relied upon by the state is not as satisfactory as might be desired. This, perhaps, is inevitable. The prosecution was unable to fix the time of the day, whether in the forenoon or afternoon, nor the day of the week nor the date on which the assault occurred nearer than that it was some time three or four weeks before Labor Day. The prosecutrix testified that immediately after the assault she went home, but said nothing to her mother about the unusual occurrence, and straightway went out to play with some chums and forgot the matter; indeed she thought no more about it until the arresting officer called on her one day at school, when, to avoid being "put away" until she was 21 years of age, during which time she would not see her father and mother, she told the officer the story subsequently related by her in court.

With respect to the arresting officer it appears that on the day before, or not more than three days before, the arrest of the defendant, he had visited the defendant's garden, and finding there a little girl, the defendant, and a woman, drove the defendant and the woman from the premises, took the girl into a shack near by, and questioned her concerning her relations with the defendant. Failing to find them incriminating he took her to her home and told her to stay away from the defendant. The same night the defendant, the woman above mentioned, and the father of the little girl called at police headquarters and complained of the treatment to which the girl had been subjected. Not more than three days thereafter the same officer questioned the prosecutrix and caused the present charge to be brought against the defendant.

[1, 2] Conceding that the officer may have been hostile to the defendant, it of course does not follow that his testimony was false, or that he attempted to induce the prosecutrix to testify falsely. As to her testimony, while she stated that she told the officer the story about the assault in order to avoid being punished, still she did not testify that she had related a false story against the defendant, nor can we conclude that she did so. The criticism of these witnesses is as to a matter going to the weight and credibility to be given their testimony, which are considerations for the jury. We cannot say from a review of the entire record that the evidence of the prosecution was inherently improbable. The most that can be said is that its truth was open to suspicion. If believed by the jury it was sufficient to support their verdict and the judgment.

[3] Passing to the next point, there are, no doubt, cases where a defendant in making his defense would be seriously embarrassed by the failure of the prosecution to definitely fix the date of the alleged crime; but it does not appear that this defendant was prejudiced by such failure in this case. The prosecutrix gave the date of the assault as nearly as she could; and the case falls within the general rule that the proof need not show that the offense was committed on the day named in the charging paper. People v. Squires, 99 Cal. 327, 33 Pac. 1092; People v. Allen, 144 Cal. 298, 77 Pac. 948.

[4] The court committed no error in refusing to give an instruction to the effect that, if the jury found from the evidence that the prosecutrix made no complaint of the alleged act of the defendant, they should view such failure as a suspicious circumstance indicating that her story was a fabrication. People v. Jacobs, 16 Cal. App. 478, 117 Pac. 615.

[5] We think, too, that the jury were sufficiently cautioned by the court in the instruction advising them in effect that a charge of rape is one easy to make and difficult to disprove; that the testimony of a child of tender years "such as the prosecuting witness here" ought to be viewed with great care and caution; and that the evidence in a case of this kind was to be weighed with the utmost care, without bias or prejudice. People v. Currie, 16 Cal. App. 731, 117 Pac. 941; People v. Liggett, 18 Cal. App. 367, 123 Pac. 225. The jury were fully and fairly instructed in every phase of the law applicable to the facts of the case.

Respecting a remark made by the trial judge of which complaint is made by the appellant, it was directed to counsel during a discussion as to the admission of certain evidence. It was quite harmless. It did not amount to misconduct. Counsel must have taken this view of it at the time it was made, for he did not assign it as misconduct or request the appropriate admonition.

VERDIER v. STOLL. (Civ. 2496.)

Appeal and Error 🔑766 — Briefs—Statement of Case—Sufficiency.

Though in default of compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, requiring printing of parts of the record for appeal, judgment appealed from must be affirmed. The mere fact that appellant's brief on appeal insufficiently printed such portions of the record as he desired to call to the attention of the court, so as not fully to comply with the statute did not require dismissal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Milton T. Farmer, Judge.

Action by Marie Verdier against V. J. Stoll. Judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals, and plaintiff moves to dismiss the appeal. Motion denied.

R. J. Hudson, of Bakersfield, for appellant. Alfred Siemon, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the appellant has not complied with that portion of section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure to the effect that, in filing briefs on an appeal, the parties must "print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court."

The reproductions of parts of the record, made in appellant's brief, are very meager; perhaps we might even assert, from the inspection we have made of the brief for the purposes of the present motion, that they are insufficient to present the merits of the case for our consideration, when we come to dispose of the appeal. That, however, is far from saying that the appeal should be dismissed. The printing of parts of the record in the briefs, under section 953c, involves a considerable expense, and it may be that, in individual cases, counsel have entered and will enter into understandings designed to obviate the necessity of printing. This might be done, for instance, through a statement of a case in one brief, with an express assent to its correctness in the opposing brief. For us to dismiss appeals for an apparent insufficiency of an appellant's brief in the particular now insisted upon, in any case, would lay down a rule depriving litigants of the right to fully and satisfactorily state an agreed case in their briefs without the printing required by the section now under consideration. We must take this occasion, however, to reiterate the established rule, so many times stated by the Supreme Court and by this court, that, in default of a compliance with the terms of section 953c by appellants, the judgments from which they appeal must be affirmed, unless, indeed, a compliance with the section is obviated by such a condition of the briefs as is above mentioned. The dangers of a departure from the requirements of section 953c are illustrated by a quotation from our opinion in Sou. Cal. Iron & Steel Co. v. Maier, 172 Pac. 615, No. 2115, decided March 15, 1918:

> "There is only a typewritten transcript of the record. The quotations from pleadings and from evidence, as printed in the briefs, are less complete than they should have been. But by piecing together a scrap found in one brief with other scraps found here and there in other briefs, together with positive admissions of fact by counsel, we find enough, although barely enough, material for a decision on the merits. It is a dangerous practice for attorneys, in preparing their briefs, to neglect the provisions of section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure."

The motion is denied.

BAY SHORE LAUNDRY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 1822.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 20, 1918.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑380—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT — "WILLFUL MISCONDUCT."

An experienced laundryman, who while operating a wringing machine removed, for a definite purpose and contrary to Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (St. 1913, p. 279) §§ 55, 62. 67, a guard which he knew was provided for his safety, was chargeable with "willful misconduct" within section 12, subd. 3, and could not recover for resulting injuries; the removal of the guard being intentional, deliberate, and willful, because done for a definite purpose, and also a misdemeanor under sections 55 and 67.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Willful Misconduct.]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑348—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—PRESUMPTION—"WILLFUL."

It must be presumed that in Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 12, subd. 3, as to willful misconduct barring recovery, the Legislature had in view the definition of "willful" as found in Pen. Code, § 7, being a purpose to do an act, without necessarily intending to violate a law or injure another.

Proceedings under Workmen's Compensation Act by Paul Verdier against the Bay Shore Laundry Company. From an award of the Industrial Accident Commission for applicant, the company makes application for writ of review. Order awarding compensation annulled.

C. F. Laumeister, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Chris. M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The commission awarded one Paul Verdier compensation in the sum of $675 for injuries received while in the employment of petitioner, and the question involved herein is whether said commission exceeded its jurisdiction in making said award. In fact, the only question in dispute before us is whether the applicant is chargeable with "willful misconduct" within the contemplation of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (Stat. 1913, p. 279).

[1] Subdivision 3 of section 12 of said act excludes from its beneficial provisions every case where the injury is proximately caused "by willful misconduct of the injured employé." As to this, the law was changed in 1917, but the amendment did not take effect until January 1, 1918, and it is not disputed that the said statute of 1913 is applicable to the case at bar.

There is herein no controversy as to the facts, but the whole argument revolves around the conclusion of the commission that the applicant was not guilty of willful misconduct. The view of the case taken by the commission may be had from the following findings:

"That said injury arose out of and in the course of said employment, was proximately caused thereby, and occurred while the employé was performing service growing out of and incidental to the same as follows: His minor hand and arm were accidentally caught in a wringing machine which the employé was operating while it was in motion and while the safety guard thereto attached was not in a position to prevent such an accident. * * * That the operation of said wringing machine in said manner was not in deliberate violation of an enforced rule of instruction made by the employer for the protection of the employé, and, although careless and negligent, it was not intrinsically reckless or foolhardy. That the said injury was not proximately caused by willful misconduct."

It is to be observed that the commission does not find what caused the safety guard to be displaced. The evidence herein shows that the applicant himself displaced it while the machine was in motion. There is no dispute, also, that he did this intentionally. It was not the result of thoughtlessness, inadvertence, accident, forgetfulness, or stress of emergency. Nothing of that kind is claimed. Indeed, the only attempted excuse is that he thought he might gain some time and that he had seen other employés do likewise. To remove the covering it was necessary to manipulate a lever, and this was done by Verdier thoughtfully and, we may say, deliberately. Neither is there any finding that the removal of the guard contributed to the accident and was therefore a proximate cause of the injury. But as to the evidence of that there can be no possible dispute. If the guard had been in place, the applicant would not have been hurt. There were, indeed, two conditions or circumstances inseparably connected with the injury. One was that Verdier's foot slipped from the brake, thereby causing him to lose his balance and fall toward the revolving machine, and the other was the fact that said machine was exposed to contact with his hand in consequence of the removal of said guard. If either of these conditions had not been present and co-operating, the injury to the hand and arm would have been avoided. It is plain, therefore, that the removal of the covering had a proximate causal connection with the injury and, indeed, this is not disputed.

It was found that the act of the applicant was not "in deliberate violation of an enforced rule or instruction made by the employer for the protection of the employé." As a fact this is partly true, but it carries an erroneous implication. The act of removing the guard was "deliberate," but there was no "enforced rule or instruction of the employer." However, it is plain that no such rule or instruction was required. This safety device was furnished by the employer for the protection of the employé. The very object was to prevent such accidents, and its purpose was well known to the applicant, who was an experienced workman, having been engaged in that line for 20 years, and being entirely familiar with the use of such device. There is no contention that he did not fully comprehend the significance of its use and the danger attending its operation without the covering. The applicant could not have been better informed if specific instruction had been given. He must have known that this protection was furnished for his safety, and how important it was that he should not remove it while the machine was in operation. The commission does, indeed, find that he was "careless and negligent," but not guilty of willful misconduct. In this connection, it is admitted by respondents that he is properly chargeable with misconduct, but it is claimed that it lacks the element of willfulness contemplated by the statute. The contention is that there must be a "mens rea," a condition of mind bordering upon criminality, to justify the commission or the court in repudiating his claims for compensation. In support of the position this quotation is made from In re Burns, 218 Mass. 8, 105 N. E. 601:

> "Willful misconduct is much more than mere negligence or even gross culpable negligence, * * * conduct of a quasi criminal nature."

Attention is called, also, to what was said in Diestelhorst v. Industrial Accident Commission, 32 Cal. App. 771, 164 Pac. 44, as follows:

> "May not a person, although guilty of an infraction of an order given for his protection, show that at the time he was unmindful of the order and that his act was the result of inattention and thoughtlessness and without any real purpose to be contumacious."

The doctrine of the foregoing decisions may be fully indorsed and accepted, but it is difficult to see what comfort is thereby afforded to the applicant herein. The Compensation Act of 1913, § 55, provides:

> "No employé shall remove, displace, * * * destroy or carry off any safety device or safeguard furnished and provided for use in any employment or place of employment, or interfere in any way with the use thereof by any other person, or interfere with the use of any method or process adopted for the protection of any employé in such employment, or place of employment, or fail or neglect to do every other thing reasonably necessary to protect the life and safety of such employés."

Section 67 of said act provides:

> "Every employer, employé or other person who, either individually or acting as an officer, agent or employé of a corporation or other person, violates any safety provision contained in sections fifty-two, fifty-three, fifty-four or fifty-five of this act, or any part of any such provision, or who shall fail or refuse to comply with any such provision, or any part thereof, or who, directly or indirectly, knowingly induces another so to do is guilty of a misdemeanor."

It is to be observed, furthermore, that respondents, said commissioners, by virtue of the authority conferred upon the commission by said compensation act, made and issued certain laundry safety orders, effective August 1, 1916, in which the following is provided:

> "(a) All extractors must be equipped with metal guards which must entirely cover the openings to the outer shell. The guard must always be kept in position when the extractor is in motion."

Section 62 of said act provides that every employé shall obey and comply with the requirements of the safety orders of the commission. Hence it cannot be disputed that Verdier was guilty of a crime when he removed the guard, and that he knew that his act was likely to result in injury to himself. The Massachusetts case, therefore, does not save him. We have already seen that there is no room for the application of the Diestelhorst decision.

[2] Moreover, there can be no doubt that the misconduct of Verdier was willful within the meaning of the statute. The definition of the term is found in the Code, and it must be presumed that in said Compensation Act the Legislature had in view that definition. Section 7 of the Penal Code provides:

> "The word 'willfully,' when applied to the intent with which an act is done or omitted, implies simply a purpose or willingness to commit the act, or make the omission referred to. It does not require any intent to violate law, or to injure another, or to acquire any advantage."

That Verdier had a willingness and purpose to commit the act of removing the guard is beyond question. From the act itself such presumption would follow, but he makes it certain by his testimony as to why he performed the act. It is not required to show that the injured person committed the wrongful act maliciously to prevent his recovery. If the Legislature had so intended it would, of course, have so provided. It was deemed proper to exclude one who was guilty of intentional or willful wrongdoing, and if we are to regard the facts in this case and the plain ordinary significance of the terms employed by the Legislature, it must be held that the applicant herein is in the excluded class.

In brief, the situation is this: Verdier's act constituted a misdemeanor and was therefore of a criminal nature. According to his testimony he performed said act for a definite purpose. It was therefore intentional, deliberate, and willful. Furthermore, he was an experienced laundryman, and understood the construction and operation of the mechanism. He realized that it was a high-speed machine and dangerous; he knew that the guard was provided for his protection and to prevent accidents, and that if he removed it the danger of accident was greatly increased. There was no good reason for his act. In fact, the only excuse offered by him was that he thought he might save time and he had seen other employés do the same thing. No such explanation could be accepted as satisfactory by any court. If he is to be exonerated for a reason like that, the provision of the statute becomes a meaningless and empty phrase. Besides, we may add, that it is quite apparent that he would not have saved any appreciable time by removing the guard while the machine was in motion, as the performance of that act required only a fraction of a second.

Indeed, the case is covered and controlled by the decision of the Supreme Court in Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 Pac. 35, and Fidelity & Deposit Co. v. Industrial Accident Com., 171 Cal. 728, 154 Pac. 834, L. R. A. 1916D, 903. In the former it is held that:

> "A workman who violates a reasonable rule made for his own protection from serious bodily injury and death is guilty of misconduct and that where the workman deliberately violated the rule with knowledge of its violation he is guilty of willful misconduct."

Therein the willful misconduct consisted in handling "hot" electrical wires without the use of rubber gloves, contrary to an express rule of the employer. In the other case the Supreme Court held that the employé was guilty of willful misconduct where he met his death, while engaged in his employer's business, from the overturning of an automobile driven by him in violation of the state motor vehicle act fixing a speed limit of 30 miles per hour.

As suggested by petitioner, these two cases represent two different classes of offenders; the first, where the provision breached by the employé is contained in a private rule or regulation of the employer. In this class the employé must have actual knowledge of the existence of the rule, and must be bound to obey it to make his willful breach thereof willful misconduct. The second class represented by the Fidelity Case, supra, is where the provision breached is embodied in a public statute. In this class the employé is charged with knowledge of the provision, and the breach thereof is willful misconduct as a matter of law. The case herein manifestly belongs to this latter class. It may be added that there was not even an attempt made to dispute the presumption that the applicant had knowledge of the existence of the statute and regulations in reference to safety devices.

We do not feel called upon to consider specifically all the cases cited. The essential principles herein involved are well settled, and we feel constrained to hold that the order awarding compensation was beyond the jurisdiction of the commission, and it is therefore annulled.

BRANDES v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SANTA BARBARA COUNTY.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 22, 1918.)

CONTEMPT 🔑23—SERVICE OF ORDER.

Before a party can be brought into contempt for not complying with an order of court, such order must be served upon him.

Original application by Sarah A. Brandes for a writ of review to review an order of the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Santa Barbara, adjudging her guilty of contempt. Order annulled.

B. F. Thomas, of Santa Barbara, for petitioner. Thompson & Robertson, of Santa Barbara, and Robert M. Clarke, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. The petitioner was granted a divorce from her husband, H. L. Brandes. The interlocutory decree was, in part, to the effect that Brandes should make certain conveyances of real and personal property to petitioner, and that "at the time of the execution and delivery" of such conveyances the petitioner should deliver to a certain bank a certain sheriff's certificate of sale held by her. Upon the allegation that he had himself complied with the decree, Brandes initiated a proceeding for contempt of court against petitioner on the ground that she had not delivered up the certificate of sale. In the affidavit which instituted the proceeding, Brandes averred that a copy of the decree had been served on petitioner, and that demand had been made upon her to comply with its terms. In an answering affidavit, petitioner alleged that the decree was never served upon her, and that no demand had ever been made that she deliver up the certificate of sale. Upon the issues thus framed the trial court found with the petitioner, but, nevertheless, it made its order adjudging her guilty of contempt. It is this order which is sought to be annulled in the present proceeding.

The action of the trial court was erroneous. "Before a party can be brought into contempt for not complying with an order of court, such order must be served upon him." Hennessy v. Nicol, 105 Cal. 138, 142, 38 Pac. 649, 650.

The order is annulled.

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT 🔑54, 57 — DISBARMENT—FINDINGS.

Findings are not required in proceedings for disbarment of an attorney at law; but they are not prohibited, and, when present, are properly a part of the record which the appellate court may review.

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT 🔑56—ORDER OF SUSPENSION—PREJUDGMENT.

Part of order suspending attorney from practice, requiring disbarment at the end of two years at another hearing, probably before another judge, and on other evidence of additional conduct involving moral turpitude, was improper, as an attempt to prejudge and predetermine matters not before the court when the order was made.

3. Attorney and Client 🔑56 — Order of Suspension—Invalid Part—Disregard as Surplusage.

Where the latter part of the trial court's order suspending an attorney at law from practice for five years, with the privilege to apply for reinstatement at the end of two years, which was invalid as an attempt to prejudge him on evidence of additional conduct involving moral turpitude, could be separated from the first part of the order, which was certain, and met all the requirements of a final judgment, it might be disregarded as surplusage.

4. Attorney and Client 🔑39 — Advertising to Procure Divorce—Statute.

The conduct of an attorney at law in publishing in newspapers of general circulation an advertisement reading, with his name: "Attorneys. * * * Divorce, Probate, and Criminal Law My Specialties. Notary Public. Consultation Free"—was contrary to and in violation of Pen. Code, § 159a, making a misdemeanor advertising to procure divorce, or to act as attorney in any suit for alimony or divorce, etc.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

In the matter of the proceedings for the disbarment of William R. Biaggi. From an order of suspension from practice, respondent appeals. Judgment modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

J. P. Fitzgerald, of San Jose, for appellant. C. L. Witten and Clarence C. Coolidge, both of San Jose, and L. D. Bohnett, of Campbell, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order made by the trial court, after a trial and hearing, whereby it was adjudged and decreed:

> "That William R. Biaggi, the respondent, be suspended from the practice of law for the period of five years. That at the end of two years respondent may apply to be reinstated, and that, if it be proved to the satisfaction of the court at that time that the respondent has fully and fairly complied with the order of suspension, and has not, directly or indirectly, or by any subterfuge whatsoever, practiced or attempted to practice law, either by securing assignments of causes of action to himself, or in any other manner, then, in that event, that the respondent be restored to the roll of attorneys. On the other hand, at the end of two years, if it shall appear to the court that he has directly violated the order of court, or been guilty of any additional conduct involving moral turpitude, that, at that time, an order of permanent disbarment be entered by the court. In the event that the court is not satisfied by the showing made by the respondent at the end of two years, and does not permanently disbar the respondent, in accordance herewith, then, in that event, the order of suspension shall continue in force for the entire period of five years."

[1] It is contended that, in proceedings for suspension or disbarment, the judgment or order should specify the particular charge or accusation upon which the attorney was disbarred or suspended. The rule contended for is applied chiefly to contempt proceedings, where summary action has been taken without the formalities of accusation, answer, etc., and where the record consists of the order of suspension alone. In re Shortridge, 5 Cal. App. 379, 90 Pac. 478; Ex parte Henshaw, 73 Cal. 497, 15 Pac. 10; State v. Watkins, 3 Mo. 480; Crites v. State, 74 Neb. 687, 105 N. W. 469. It has been held that, where the accusation in a disbarment proceeding charges certain facts, which show conspiracy, and prays that accused be found guilty and be disbarred, the final order of the court that the application of plaintiff shall be granted is a sufficient finding of the guilt of the accused; the court saying that:

> "There being but one charge, it is clear from the record that defendant was found guilty of that charge." State v. Howard, 112 Iowa, 256, 83 N. W. 975.

The record before this court includes the accusation, answer, findings, and judgment. The findings state specifically the particular charges upon which the judgment in question is predicated, and, while findings are not required in proceedings for disbarment (Matter of Danford, 157 Cal. 425, 108 Pac. 322), they are not prohibited, and, when present, are properly a part of the record which this court may review (In re Wharton, 114 Cal. 367, 46 Pac. 172, 55 Am. St. Rep. 72).

[2, 3] It is urged that the judgment is conditional, and therefore void. The Code defines a judgment to be:

> "The final determination of the rights of the parties in an action or proceeding." Code Civ. Proc. § 577.
> "If a judgment though upon the merits or determining some substantial rights, leaves necessary further judicial action before the rights of the parties are settled it is not final." Freeman on Judgments (4th Ed.) vol. 1, § 16.

That part of the court's order which requires the respondent's disbarment at the end of two years, at another hearing, before another judge, most probably, and upon other evidence of additional conduct involving moral turpitude, must be held to be an attempt to prejudge and predetermine matters not before the court at the time the present order was made. Consolidated Mining Co. v. Huff, 62 Kan. 405, 63 Pac. 442. There is no difficulty, however, in separating the latter part of the court's order from the first part, which decrees that William Biaggi be suspended from the practice of law for the period of five years, with the privilege of applying for reinstatement at the end of two years. That decree is certain, and meets all the requirements of a final judgment, and hence the latter part of the order, which is invalid, may be disregarded as surplusage. Philbrook v. Newman (C. C.) 85 Fed. 139.

[4] The trial court found on ample evidence that Biaggi appeared before the superior court of Santa Clara county as attorney in the matter of certain adoption proceedings, and falsely stated to that court that the father of the minor child in question had never taken any interest whatever in said child, and that Biaggi did, at that time, "intentionally, willfully, knowingly, and fraudulently conceal" from the court the fact that the father was then endeavoring, in an action before another department of the same court, to obtain the custody of the child; and, further, that from the month of October, 1911, up to February 22, 1916, Biaggi caused to be published in certain newspapers of general circulation an advertisement reading:

"ATTORNEYS

"Wm. R. Biaggi. Divorce, Probate and Criminal Law My Specialties. Notary Public. Consultation Free. 426–27 Bank of San Jose Bldg. Phone San Jose 1638."

The court properly held that appellant's conduct in thus advertising was contrary to and in violation of the provisions of section 159a of the Penal Code. This disposes of all of the points worthy of discussion.

The judgment hereinbefore set forth shall be modified, to read that William R. Biaggi, the respondent, be suspended from the practice of law for the period of five years; that at the end of two years respondent may apply to be reinstated. As so modified, the judgment stands affirmed.

LONG v. JOHN BREUNER CO. (Civ. 1783.)

(District Court of Appeals, Third District, California. March 29, 1918. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court May 27, 1918.)

1. Negligence 🔑136(22) — Sloping Entrances to Buildings — Question for Jury.
Whether a storekeeper was negligent in maintaining a 35 to 50 per cent. incline at the entrance to the store held, under the evidence, for the jury.

2. Negligence 🔑44—Entrances to Stores —Duty to Keep Safe.
It is the duty of a merchandise storekeeper to keep the entrances to the store in a safe condition, and to use ordinary care to avoid accidents to those entering.

3. Negligence 🔑136(26) — Contributory Negligence—Question for Jury.
Whether plaintiff who walked rapidly, in an occupied state of mind, out of a store entrance inclined at 35 to 50 per cent., was guilty of contributory negligence, held, under the evidence, for the jury.

4. Negligence 🔑68—Contributory Negligence—Duty of Injured Persons.
It was the duty of a patron of a store to exercise ordinary care in passing out of a defective entrance.

5. Trial 🔑139(1)—Province of Jury—Evidence.
Motion for nonsuit will not be granted when there is any substantial evidence which, with the aid of all legitimate inferences favorable to plaintiff, would support a verdict or finding that the material allegations of the complaint are true.

6. Negligence 🔑136(9) — Question for Jury.
Negligence is a question of fact for the jury, even where there is no conflict of the evidence, if different conclusions upon the subject can be drawn from the evidence by reasonable and impartial men.

7. Evidence 🔑513(2)—Expert Testimony.
Where negligence alleged was maintenance of 35 to 50 per cent. incline at the entrance of a store, it was proper to allow architects to testify that the usual grade was 3 per cent., and that 10 per cent. was the greatest approved grade.

8. Evidence 🔑505 — Expert Testimony—Opinion or Fact.
Testimony of an architect as to the usual grade for entrances to buildings and as to the highest approved grade are expressions of fact, and not opinions.

9. Negligence 🔑125 — Similar Facts—Evidence.
In action for injuries by slipping on inclined entrance to store, it was competent to show that other persons had previously slipped and fallen on such incline, as such evidence tended to show the dangerous character of the incline, the cause of plaintiff's fall, and to bring home to the defendant knowledge of the dangerous condition.

10. Negligence 🔑125 — Similar Facts—Evidence.
In action for injuries by falling on steep incline at entrance of store, previous accidents on such incline may be shown, if they are similar in their general character, and circumstances need not be shown to be precisely similar.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Margaret Long against the John Breuner Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Myrick & Deering and J. Walter Scott, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento, and E. L. Stockwell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. A jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $4,500 as damages sustained by her on account of injuries caused by her slipping and falling upon an incline in front of the main entrance to the store of the defendant in Sacramento. Judgment was entered for that amount, from which, and from the order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

The defendant conducts a furniture store on the south side of K street between Sixth and Seventh streets in said city of Sacramento. At the time of the accident to plaintiff there was a concrete incline or apron leading from the entrance to the store to the sidewalk. The grade of this incline was from nothing, where it joined the sidewalk, to 35 per cent., as testified by one witness, or 50 per cent., according to another, at the point where plaintiff was injured. On each side the concrete of the apron was rounded off to meet the grade of the sidewalk. This rounded off portion was about a foot in width and gradually diminished as it approached the edge of the curbing, and it had been chipped with a chisel to roughen the surface. There is a column at each side of the entrance; the distance between them being about 12 feet. On the easterly column two steel rods supporting an awning were affixed to it, the lower end of the rod being 3½ feet above the sidewalk. These rods prevented one from walking within about 8½inches of the post. On October 24, 1914, the plaintiff, who was then 60 years of age and engaged as a teacher in the public schools of Sacramento, did some shopping in defendant's store. Upon leaving the store she went obliquely out of the door, turned to the east, and slipped on the rounding part of the incline, very close to the column at the east side of the entrance. There had been no rain that day and the incline was dry. The seriousness of the injuries suffered by plaintiff is not questioned by defendant.

It is first contended by appellant that its motion for a nonsuit should have been granted; the grounds of the motion being that defendant was not negligent in maintaining the inclined passageway, and that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to look and pay attention to the passageway as she went out.

The plaintiff, testifying on direct examination, said that there was "no foreign substance" on the floor near the approach, and that she did not stumble; that she merely slipped and fell. "I could not say," she proceeded, "whether I was standing on my toes or flat on my foot. I was just walking, that is all. I slipped on the right foot, my foot nearest to the building. I had not observed the nature of the incline or approach before I slipped." She further testified that on the occasion of the accident she wore a pair of Oxford ties or low shoes, with low heels, which "were broader and flatter than these." referring to the shoes she was wearing when testifying. On cross-examination she stated: That she had frequently gone into the store in question through the front entrance and the entrance at which she sustained her injuries; that she could not say whether she had ever particularly noticed the slope or the nature thereof before the accident, although, she said, at the time of the mishap she had "no present knowledge" of the slope or the approach or its character—that is to say, she was then "conscious of knowing" nothing of the slope. She said that her son had just returned to her home in ill health and that, while that fact "probably would have caused me some disturbance of my mind that day," she "was not at all out of my mind in any way. I knew what I was doing all the time. * * * I myself had been perfectly well prior to this time. I was probably walking rather rapidly at the time this happened, for I always do, or always did. I could not give any idea about how rapidly I proceeded as I left the store. I know probably I walked as I generally do, in rather a rapid manner. The skirt I wore that day was neither broad nor narrow. It was a medium width skirt—it was not wide. It was what you call a sensible skirt." She was asked whether she walked directly into the iron rod or column standing near the entrance, and whether, as she was in the act of falling, she attempted to grab the rod. She replied that she did not think so; that she was looking straight ahead. "I know," she added, "my mind is generally occupied."

It is not deemed necessary to reproduce herein in detail the testimony of the expert witnesses as to the grade or slope of the incline and as to the usual grade or slope of entrances to public buildings. It is enough to say that from the testimony of those witnesses the jury were, so far as it may be determined from the bare record before us, justified in finding, as impliedly they did find, that the incline upon which the plaintiff fell had a grade or slope of 50 per cent. or, in other words, where the plaintiff was injured, an abrupt descent of approximately 1 foot to each 2 feet of distance; that the passageway over and through which the plaintiff passed, at a point just before she reached the point at which she fell, had a grade of at least 22 per cent. the part having the lowest degree of steepness having a gradient of 14½ per cent.; that the degree of grade or slope maintained generally to entrances from sidewalks to buildings employed for business purposes is a maximum of 5 per cent. to 10 per cent. the usual grade, however, being about 3 per cent. Thus, as is suggested by counsel for respondent, it is clear that there was evidence from which the jury could justly have concluded, as manifestly they did conclude, that the grade at the point where the plaintiff fell and was injured, being 50 per cent. was from five to ten times in excess of the maximum grade which it was the custom to establish, maintain and use for entrances to public buildings, and over sixteen times greater than the usual grade of such entrances, which it was testified is 3 per cent.

[1-4] The above is a sufficient reference to the evidence to show that, without question, the case as made by the plaintiff was one which the court was required to submit to the arbitrament of the jury. In other words, the evidence as to the character of the entrance, that is, as to the grade or slope thereof, was such as to make the question whether the defendant was guilty of negligence in thus maintaining it, or whether the entrance as so maintained was unsafe or dangerous for the use for which it was intended and to which it was put, peculiarly one for the jury's solution. And in clear and readily understandable language the question was submitted to the jury by the trial court in its charge, wherein it correctly instructed the jury that the defendant being engaged in conducting a merchandise store which it invited the public to patronize, the duty rested upon it to keep the entrances and passageways to and from the premises as so occupied and used by it in a safe condition, "and to use ordinary care to avoid accidents or injury to those properly and lawfully entering upon or leaving its premises through such entrances or passageways in connection with the transaction of business on such premises"; and, further, that "if you find that said entrance or passageway (the entrance or passageway where the plaintiff here was injured) was in an unsafe or dangerous condition, and that such condition was the proximate cause of said injuries to plaintiff, defendant is liable therefor if its managers, officers, or agents knew of such alleged unsafe or dangerous condition, or if, as careful and prudent men, they should have known it, provided that plaintiff was in the exercise of ordinary care."

Nor can we say, on the evidence, that, as a matter of law, the plaintiff was herself guilty of negligence proximately causing or contributing to the accident and her consequent injuries. It was, of course, the duty of the plaintiff in passing over the entrance to exercise ordinary care to avoid being injured by reason of the alleged defectiveness of the passageway, or, as the court instructed the jury, to exercise ordinary prudence under the circumstances—that degree of care which would or should be observed under the given circumstances by the average ordinarily careful person. Whether the conduct of the plaintiff when attempting to pass through and over the entrance measured up to that degree of care was, in our view, a question for the jury under the proofs as adduced before them. The plaintiff declared that she started to pass through the passageway in rather a rapid walk, her usual manner of walking. She had frequently passed through the same entrance, but had never particularly noticed the character of the grade from the store to the sidewalk. While she had her mind to some extent on an invalid son, she said she was "not at all out of her mind in any way," and "knew what she was doing all the time." She further testified that it was not a wet or rainy day; that there was no "foreign substance" on the floor of the passageway, by which she meant, undoubtedly, that there was nothing thereon which would cause her to slip or stumble; and that she did not slip or strike anything which would cause her to lose her footing. Counsel for the defendant insist, however, that the plaintiff failed "to look and pay attention to the nature of the passageway as she went out from the store, thereby occasioning her downfall." There is no testimony warranting that assertion, except in so far as such an inference might be drawn from her statement that she had never particularly noticed the nature of the incline, and that she left the store through the entrance at her usual rapid walking gait. But from her statement that she was "not at all out of her mind in any way," "knew what she was doing all the time," referring to the time that she was in the act of passing over the approach, the inference is equally reasonable that she was paying attention to her steps or exercising reasonable care for her own protection when attempting to pass down the incline.

[5, 6] It would seem to be hardly necessary to repeat herein these well-settled propositions: (1) That a motion for a nonsuit is not to be granted when there is any substantial evidence which, with the aid of all legitimate inferences favorable to the plaintiff, would support a verdict or finding that the material allegations of the complaint are true. Burr v. United Railroads, 163 Cal. 663, 665, 126 Pac. 873; Kimic v. San Jose-Los Gatos, etc., Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 379, 104 Pac. 986; Archibald Estate v. Matteson, 5 Cal. App. 441, 90 Pac. 723; Nonrefillable Water Co. v. Robertson, 8 Cal. App. 103, 96 Pac. 324; Bush v. Wood, 8 Cal. App. 651, 97 Pac. 709; O'Connor v. Hooper, 102 Cal. 528, 36 Pac. 939. (2) That "negligence is a question of fact for the jury, even where there is no conflict of the evidence, if different conclusions upon the subject can be drawn from the evidence." Wahlgren v. Market St. Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 656, 62 Pac. 308, 64 Pac. 993. (3) That "it is only where the evidence is such that but one conclusion with respect to negligence could be reached by a reasonable and impartial man that the question becomes one for the court." Burr v. United Railroads, 163 Cal. supra.

Considering the testimony in view of the foregoing rules, it is clear that the motion for a nonsuit was properly disallowed upon both the grounds upon which it was predicated: (1) That the evidence failed to show that the defendant was guilty of negligence in the manner in which it maintained the passageway where the plaintiff was injured; (2) that it was the plaintiff's own negligence which directly caused or contributed to her injuries. After the motion for a nonsuit was denied, the defendant introduced testimony which, naturally enough, tended to destroy the effect of that presented in support of the complaint. The effect, however, was only to create an evidential conflict, which it was for the jury to settle.

[7, 8] It is next contended that the ruling whereby certain architects and building contractors, testifying as experts, were permitted to give testimony relative to the standard or generally approved grade of approaches to public buildings was erroneous and prejudicial. The disposal of this point will at the same time dispose of the statement by counsel for the defendant that the court allowed the same witnesses to testify directly to the dangerous condition of the approach in question.

According to the testimony of the architects and building contractors, as we have already shown, the usual or approved grade for such slopes is 3 per cent. and the maximum no greater than 5 to 10 per cent. The importance and significance of this testimony is obvious, since, accepting it as showing what the customary or standard and approved grade of the inclines to such approaches is, readily it is thus made to appear that the slope of the approach to the defendant's building, where the plaintiff was injured, was greatly in excess of what it should be to render it reasonably safe to those passing over it. The contention is that the testimony involved mere opinions of the witnesses upon a subject not coming within the category of those upon which opinion testimony is required or allowable, and therefore the ruling permitting it to be received involved an invasion of the province of the jury.

But, in point of fact, the testimony referred to, while that of experts, did not involve a direct expression of the opinions of those witnesses as to the safety of the approach in question. They were not asked, nor did they express, their opinions as to the character of the grade or the condition for safety to those using it of the approach where the plaintiff received her injuries. They were merely asked to state as a fact—a matter within their own knowledge—what the standard or generally approved grade of approaches to public buildings is. In reply, they stated what such grade is as a fact of which they had knowledge and not as their opinions of what it is. They stated no conclusion from their own opinions respecting the ultimate issues which it was for the jury to draw. But their testimony, it is to be admitted, was as to a matter not within common knowledge; and if we should concede that it was in the strictest sense opinion testimony, we would still be of the belief that it was not only proper but essential to an enlightened consideration and determination of the questions whether the defendant was negligent in the maintenance of the approach where the plaintiff was injured, and, if so, whether such negligence was the proximate cause of her injuries. In other words, it was proper and necessary to the elucidation of other pertinent facts in issue.

Manifestly, to determine whether there was negligence in the act and fact of maintaining the approach in the condition in which it then was, the jury were required first to find whether the approach, as then maintained, was in and of itself dangerous or unsafe as a passageway to the defendant's store. The average person, without experience in or knowledge of such matters, certainly would not know from his own knowledge or observation what the standard and approved grade of such approaches is. Nor would he probably know or comprehend, from a mere description of the incline or the degree of the grade thereof by others, whether it was of a degree of grade to make it a dangerous place for persons to pass over. By a comparison of what the architects and building contractors declared to be the standard or uniformly approved grade of such approaches with the grade of the approach to the defendant's store, as it was described by the witnesses who had taken measurements of it with a view of ascertaining the degree of the grade thereof, the jury could the more readily and intelligently determine whether the latter approach was safe or unsafe to pass over.

Thus it is clear that the testimony was important and relevant, and that it was competent we make no doubt. It belongs to a class of testimony which has been uniformly sanctioned by the courts and text-writers as essential if, indeed, not well-nigh indispensable, in many instances, particularly in jury trials, to the crystallization of intelligent and just results. In Ruling Case Law, vol. 11, p. 573, we find the rule with respect to opinion testimony, as deduced from the cases, of which there is an almost unlimited number, as follows:

> "It may be stated as a general proposition that there are two classes of cases in which expert testimony as to the facts is admissible. To the one class belong those cases in which the conclusions to be drawn by the jury depend on the existence of facts which are not common knowledge and which are peculiarly within the knowledge of men whose experience or study enables them to speak with authority upon the subject. If, in such cases, the jury, with all the facts before them, can form a conclusion thereon, it is their sole province to do so. In the other class we find those cases in which the conclusions to be drawn from the facts stated, as well as knowledge of the facts themselves, depend upon professional or scientific knowledge or skill not within the range of ordinary training or intelligence. In such cases not only the facts, but the conclusions to which they lead, may be testified to by qualified experts. The distinction between these two kinds of testimony is apparent. In the one instance the facts are to be stated by the experts and the conclusion is to be drawn by the jury; in the other, the expert states the facts and gives his conclusion in the form of an opinion which may be accepted or rejected by the jury. If the knowledge of the experts consists in descriptive facts which can intelligently be communicated to others not familiar with the subject, the case belongs to the first class."

[9] The last point is as to the testimony of one Williams, who testified for the plaintiff. This witness was permitted, over the objection of the defendant, to testify that he had, on two different occasions prior to the accident to the plaintiff, slipped and fallen while walking over the approach where the plaintiff received the injuries of which she here complains. It is contended that this testimony was inadmissible because it brought into the case a collateral issue, a matter res inter alios acta. The specific ground of objection was, first, that there was no showing that the defendant or any of its officers or agents knew that Williams had fallen upon the incline, "or that they had knowledge that the incline was of such a character as might reasonably be expected to lead to the fall of some customer." Further objecting, counsel urged that, if the testimony was offered for the purpose of showing that the entrance was inherently unsafe, it was not admissible in the absence of a showing that the circumstances and conditions "surrounding the falls of Williams" were the same as those existing at the time the plaintiff fell, and that no such showing was made.

We think the evidence was admissible upon the general proposition that testimony of previous accidents similar to the one in question not only tends to show the dangerous character of the place, but, where the previous accidents have occurred under substantially the same general circumstances of the subsequent accident, tends to disclose the cause of the latter, and, furthermore, tends to bring home to the person maintaining the place where the injury occurred knowledge of the dangerous condition of such place. Dyas v. S. P. Co., 140 Cal. 296, 305, 306, 73 Pac. 972; District of Columbia v. Armes, 107 U. S. 519, 2 Sup. Ct. 840, 27 L. Ed. 618; Smith v. Seattle, 33 Wash. 481, 74 Pac. 674; Wigmore on Evidence, § 458; Chamberlayne, Modern Law of Evidence, § 3198.

In the Armes Case, a policeman who saw Armes fall on a sidewalk which was defectively constructed and maintained was asked, after testifying to the accident, whether, while on his beat, other accidents had happened at that place. The question was objected to on the ground that it tended to introduce collateral issues into the case, but the objection was overruled, and the witness replied that he had witnessed other accidents there. The United States Supreme Court, replying to the point as thus made with reference to that testimony, said, speaking through Mr. Justice Field:

> "The admission of this testimony is now urged as error; the point of the objection being that it tended to introduce collateral issues, and thus mislead the jury from the matter directly in controversy. Were such the case, the objection would be tenable; but no dispute was made as to these accidents, no question was raised as to the extent of the injuries received, no point was made upon them, no recovery was sought by reason of them, nor any increase of damages. They were proved simply as circumstances which, with other evidence, tended to show the dangerous character of the sidewalk in its unguarded condition. The frequency of accidents at a particular place would seem to be good evidence of its dangerous character—at least it is some evidence to that effect. Persons are not wont to seek such places, and do not willingly fall into them. Here the character of the place was one of the subjects of inquiry to which attention was called by the nature of the action and the pleadings, and the defendant should have been prepared to show its real character in the face of any proof bearing on that subject. Besides this, as publicity was necessarily given to the accidents, they also tended to show that the dangerous character of the locality was brought to the attention of the city authorities."

See, also, Quinlon v. Utica, 74 N. Y. 603; Chicago v. Powers, 42 Ill. 169, 89 Am. Dec. 418. There are many other cases to the same effect, but the doctrine is too well settled to make further citations herein necessary.

[10] It is in effect contended, however, that before previous accidents may be shown it must be made to appear that such previous accidents occurred under circumstances precisely similar to those characterizing the later or subsequent one, and that no such showing was made in this case. We think, though, that the rule is that the previous accidents need only be similar in their general character to the one in question to render proof of them admissible. There is no claim that Williams did not fall upon the approach upon which the plaintiff fell and received her injuries. Nor is there any claim that the approach, as it existed at the time of the accident to the plaintiff, had not been in the same condition continuously for a long period of time prior and down to the time when the plaintiff fell thereon. Indeed, it appears that Williams was able to identify the approach from a photograph thereof which was taken shortly after the plaintiff was injured and which was exhibited at the trial, and this was some evidence that the general conditions surrounding the approach when he fell thereon on the two occasions referred to by him were substantially the same as they were when the plaintiff received her injuries.

We have now considered all the general propositions upon which a reversal is urged, and, as is manifest from the foregoing discussion, we have discovered in the record no just reason for disturbing the result arrived at below.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

A bond executed by a contractor and a surety company, covering a contract for street improvements, which recites that, "if the said principal fails to pay for any materials furnished for the work of improvement described in said contract, or for any work or labor done thereon of any kind, the said sureties will pay the same" to a stipulated amount, is an independent contract to pay for labor and material furnished the contractor, and is distinct from an agreement to faithfully perform the work.

3. Municipal Corporations 🔑347(1) — Public Improvement Contracts — Surety's Liability.

Where a contractor for street improvements has given a bond, wherein the surety agrees to pay for labor and material furnished the contractor in doing the work described in the contract, the bond to inure to the benefit of any and all persons, companies, or corporations who perform labor on or furnish materials to be used in such work, the right of a materialman to recover on the bond is not affected by the fact that the materials were furnished and used under an unauthorized extension of time for the completion of the contract.

4. Principal and Surety 🔑102 — Discharge of Surety—Assignment.

A surety on the bond of a contractor for street improvements is not released because the contractor has assigned his contract, where such assignment is made to enable the assignee to complete the contract as the assignor's agent.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles Stone Company against the National Surety Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Surety Company appeals. Affirmed.

Carroll Allen and Bertin A. Weyl, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Gurney E. Newlin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. Acting under the city charter and pursuant to the provisions of the Vrooman Act (St. 1885, p. 147), the board of public works of the city of Los Angeles duly entered into a contract with defendant Standard Construction & Development Company for the improvement of Melrose avenue in said city. By the terms of the contract the work was to be completed within 210 days from the date thereof, which was September 14, 1912. With the execution of the contract the contractor, as principal, and the National Surety Company, as surety, in pursuance with the provisions of section 6½ of the act under which the proceedings were had and taken (Act 3930, Gen. Laws 1915, p. 1722) executed a bond which, after reciting that the principal therein named had entered into a contract for doing the work specified therein, obligated itself as follows:

> "Now, therefore, if the said principal fails to pay for any materials furnished for the work of improvement described in said contract, or for any work or labor done thereon of any kind, the said sureties will pay the same to an amount not exceeding said sum of $25,600. This bond shall inure to the benefit of any and all persons, companies, or corporations who perform labor on or furnish materials to be used in said work of improvement."

The bond was duly approved, and the contractor entered upon the performance of the work, which under extensions duly granted by the board of public works, it, and its assignees, continued to June 11, 1913, on which day the time for completing the improvement, within the extensions of the contract theretofore duly made, expired. Notwithstanding such termination of the contract, and the fact that by reason thereof the board of public works was divested of all power to further extend the time for completing the improvement, said board did, on June 12th, make a purported order further extending the time within which, and other like extensions made, the work of improving the street was completed in accordance with the specifications therefor.

This action was to recover upon said bond and from the surety thereof the value of labor and materials furnished by plaintiff and used in doing the work at a date subsequent to June 11, 1913, when, as stated, the time for doing the work had expired. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which the defendant National Surety Company appeals.

[1] Appellant's chief contention is that since, under the terms and extensions of the contract, the time for doing the work specified therein expired on June 11th, no recovery can be had on the bond for the value of materials furnished by plaintiff subsequent to said date. No lien for materials or labor attaches to public improvements, and the purpose clearly intended by the Legislature in requiring the giving of such bond was to provide a security for materialmen and laborers to which they could confidently look for protection against loss. The bond under consideration is in the terms of the statute, and, in addition to stating that, if the contractor named as principal therein failed to pay for material furnished for the work described in the contract or labor done thereon the surety would pay the same, contained the provision that:

> "This bond shall inure to the benefit of any and all persons, companies, or corporations who perform labor on or furnish materials in said work of improvement."

The only purpose served by such reference to the contract (for the faithful performance of which another bond is required) was to identify the particular work to which the bond related. The obligation of the surety does not depend upon the validity of the contract or the faithful performance thereof by the contractor. It exists independently of such facts. The covenant is that in case the principal fails, not in the performance of his contract with the city but in his obligations, express or implied, to pay for materials furnished in doing the work described in his contract with the city, the surety will pay them. "The surety is charged with notice that he is entering into what is in a very proper sense a public obligation, and one that will be relied upon by persons who can in no manner control the conduct of the nominal obligee and with respect to whom the latter is a mere trustee." Equitable Surety Co. v. United States, 234 U. S. 448, 34 Sup. Ct. 803, 58 L. Ed. 1394. Hence the question as to whether the contract under which the work is done be a valid one, or whether the contractor fails to perform it according to its terms and specifications, entitling him to an acceptance of the same as completed, is no concern of the persons furnishing materials for the work. Unaffected by irregularities in the procedure of defects which render the contract void, the materialman may look to the covenant of the surety, which, in effect, is an express promise, in case of failure so to do by the principal, to pay any and all debts of the contractor, in so far as they are incurred for labor and materials furnished in performing the work. French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 Pac. 92. Otherwise, and "if the sureties on the bond can defeat the claims of laborers and materialmen because of irregularities in the making of the contract referred to in the bond, it follows that every man, who contemplates selling a foot of pipe to a contractor, and every laborer, before commencing work with his shovel, must employ counsel learned in the law to ascertain whether the corporation counsel has properly performed his duties," verify the statement of the surety that the contract, reference to which is made in the bond is valid and binding, and see that it is faithfully performed. Bell v. Kirkland, 102 Minn. 213, 113 N. W. 271, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 793. Obviously, to so interpret the statute would defeat the purpose of its enactment. In the case of Kansas City Hydraulic Press Brick Co. v. National Surety Co. (C. C.) 149 Fed. 507, the court in considering a like question under a similar statute said:

> "The simple proposition, so far as this question is concerned is this: The plaintiff furnished material to Atkin. Atkin agreed to pay for it. The surety company agreed that, if Atkin did not, it would, and the consideration of this agreement to do so was the furnishing of material by plaintiff to Atkin and the payment of the usual premiums * * * for signing such bonds, and in the opinion of this court that contract stands untainted and in full integrity regardless of the invalidity of the contract between Atkin and the city of Kansas City."

[2, 3] The bond on the part of the surety company must be deemed an independent contract, whereby it agreed, subject to payment by the principal therein named, to pay for labor and materials furnished the contractor in doing certain street work specified in a contract with the city therefor; and the right of a materialman to recover thereon is unaffected by the fact that the materials constituting the subject of the action were furnished and used in completing the work under an extension of time for so doing made by the board of public works, which by reason of the time of completion having expired such board had no power to make.

While appellant concedes that all orders extending the time for doing the work made prior to June 12th were lawfully made, it nevertheless insists the effect of such extensions so made was to release the surety from liability to materialmen. This contention is based upon the claim that, since the contract as originally drawn fixed the time for the performance thereof, the extension granted constituted a material alteration of the contract by reason of which since the surety is entitled to stand upon the strict terms of his contract it is exonerated. The principle invoked has no application to the bond under consideration, for the reason that, as heretofore stated, the surety's obligation is not for the performance of the contract so claimed to have been altered, but independent thereof, and given for a wholly different purpose. U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co. v. United States, 191 U. S. 416, 24 Sup. Ct. 142, 48 L. Ed. 242. The covenant contained in the bond is not for the benefit of the city as a party to the contract for doing the street work, but for the benefit of all persons furnishing labor and materials to the contractor for doing the same.

[4] There is no merit in the contention that the surety was exonerated from liability by reason of the fact that the contractor without the consent of appellant made assignments of the contract for doing the work. As to these assignments the court by findings upon which no attack is made found that the assignment made to Powell was to secure the latter for money advanced by him to enable the contractor to do the work. None of the work was done by Powell and no materials furnished to him. Subject to the right of Powell under this naked assignment, the contractor for the purpose of enabling J. L. Davis, as its agent, to complete the contract, assigned the same to him, who thereafter, as the duly authorized agent of and acting for the contractor, completed the improvement, the materials for which were delivered to Davis, as such agent of the contractor, who agreed to pay therefor.

While these findings dispose of appellant's contention, we may say that the rule which permits a surety to stand upon his strict legal rights should not be construed as limiting the benefits of a bond of this character to those only who supply labor and materials directly to the contractor. The covenant in the bond should be read in the light of the statute, the purpose of which was to protect those who furnish labor and materials for work described in the contract, and not the particular engagements under which the work is done. See French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 Pac. 92; Williams v. Tingey, 26 Cal. App. 574, 147 Pac. 584; Hill v. American Surety Co., 200 U. S. 197, 26 Sup. Ct. 168, 50 L. Ed. 437; Flagstaff M. Co. v. Cullins, 104 U. S. 176, 26 L. Ed. 704.

Under the provision of section 6½ of the act, materialmen and laborers, in order to maintain suit to recover therefor, are required to file their claims with the proper officer "within 30 days from the time the improvement is completed." Appellant insists that part of plaintiff's claim while filed within 30 days after the acceptance of the work, was not filed until the expiration of 30 days from actual completion thereof. The court, however, found that plaintiff, as provided in section 6½ of the act, did file its claim in the proper office within 30 days from the completion of the work. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, disclosed by the record, appellant is bound by this finding.

HUB HARDWARE CO. v. ÆTNA ACCIDENT & LIABILITY CO. et al.

1. Principal and Surety 🔑347(2)—Public Improvement Contracts—Principal's Assignee.

A bond given by a contractor, specifying, as St. 1911, p. 738, expressly provides, that the principal and surety are bound to any and all persons, companies, or corporations who perform labor on or furnish material to be used in the improvement, inures to the benefit of the contractor's assignee.

2. Principal and Surety 🔑59 — Suretyship Contract—Construction.

If a surety enters into suretyship contract with the law before him, the law becomes part of the agreement.

3. Municipal Corporations 🔑353—Public Improvements — Assignability of Contract.

A street improvement contract is assignable by the contractor.

4. Municipal Corporations 🔑347(1)—Public Improvement Contracts — Surety's Defenses.

That a city has failed to establish an official street grade as it was authorized to do by Improvement Act 1911, does not release the liability of the surety on a contractor's bond to pay for material and labor used in the improvement, since the invalidity of the contract with the city does not involve the liability of the surety.

5. Municipal Corporations 🔑347(1)—Public Improvement Contracts — Surety's Defenses.

That materials have been furnished and used for a street improvement after the expiration of the time for completing the contract does not relieve a surety on a bond for the payment of material and labor used, the surety's liability being independent of the contract between the contractor and the city.

6. Municipal Corporations 🔑373(3)—Public Improvement Contracts—Time of Filing Claim.

Where a contract for street improvements provided that an assessment should be levied after two blocks of the improvement was completed, a materialman, who had furnished material used in the two blocks, but had not filed his claim therefor within 30 days of the completion of such two blocks, was not deprived of his remedy, where his claim was filed within 30 days after the completion of the total improvement.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Wellborn, Judge.

Action by the Hub Hardware Company against the Ætna Accident & Liability Company and another. From a judgment for the plaintiff, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and J. Karl Lobdell, all of Los Angeles (Edward E. Bacon, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. Arthur M. Ellis and G. C. De Garmo, both of Los Angeles, for respondents. Neice & Packard and Crouch & Crouch, all of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff was given judgment on the pleadings, and the corporation, which had executed a surety bond, appeals from the judgment.

The material facts are as follows: The superintendent of streets of Colton entered into a contract, on May 28, 1913, with one Paonessa for the improvement of a certain street in that city. Appellant, as surety, executed the required statutory bond for the payment of laborers and for materials furnished. Paonessa assigned the contract, and plaintiff furnished materials to the assignees, who actually performed the work. The so-called "Improvement Act of 1911," under which the work was done, authorizes the levy of an assessment upon the completion of two blocks or more of the improvement without waiting for the completion of the whole. This plan was followed in the matter of the work in question upon completion of that part of it upon which the materials furnished by plaintiff were used. Plaintiff, being unable to collect its claim from the assignees of the original contractor, who had received the amount due from the city, sued said assignees and the surety company. The original contractor, Paonessa, was not made a party defendant. Plaintiff recovered judgment against the surety company alone.

Appellant's first contention is that its liability under the statute is not and cannot be extended to the assignees of the contractor—that it is bound only to indemnify creditors of the contractor. In this behalf its counsel quote from the act (Stats. 1911, p. 738) the following language:

> "If the contractor, person, company or corporation to whom said contract was awarded fails to pay for any materials so furnished for the said work or improvement, or for any work or labor done thereon of any kind, that the sureties will pay the same, to an amount not exceeding the sum specified in said bond."

And they cite County of Sonoma v. Hall, 132 Cal. 589, 62 Pac. 257, 312, 65 Pac. 12, 459, and Towle v. Sweeney, 2 Cal. App. 29, 83 Pac. 74, to the effect that sureties may not be held unless the principal, sued independently of the bond, would be liable. If the quoted portion of the statute were all the provision for a surety bond there would be great force in the argument of appellant's counsel, but the statute also provides in the same section of which a part is quoted by them that the bond "shall be made to inure to the benefit of any and all persons, companies or corporations who perform labor on, or furnish materials to be used in the said work or improvement."

[1, 2] The bond itself specifies that the principal and surety "are held and firmly bound unto any and all persons, companies or corporations, who perform labor on, or furnish materials to be used in the said work of improvement aforementioned, in the sum of seventeen thousand five hundred dollars." Statutes upholding liability inuring to the benefit of those with whom the person bound has no contractual relation have been repeatedly sustained. If the surety makes the contract with the law before him the law enters into and becomes a part of the agreement. Jones v. Great Southern Fireproof Hotel Co., 86 Fed. 370, 30 C. C. A. 108; Hollenbeck-Bush Planing Mill Co. v. Amweg, 170 Pac. 148.

[3] In this case the surety did bind itself, in conformity with the requirement of the statute, to pay for any materials furnished to be used in the described work. Clearly, the obligation was not merely for the benefit of the contractor. That such contracts as the one made by Paonessa and the city are assignable may not be doubted. Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 241. It has been held that such an action as this is not based upon the personal liability of the original contractor, but upon the obligation of the bond. Williams v. Tingey, 26 Cal. App. 574, 147 Pac. 584. To be sure, that was a case in which the materials were furnished to a subcontractor, not to an assignee, and appellant seeks to draw a distinction, asserting that "it may well be that a different rule should apply" to a subcontractor from that invoked in favor of an assignee. We can see no reason why there should be a different rule under the very broad liability assumed by this appellant on the execution of the bond. In French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 Pac. 92, the court was considering an assignment of a contract made by one who had contracted with a city. The surety was made responsible for all work of any kind done upon the tunnel to be constructed, which the contractor did not pay for. The court held that neither the contractor nor the surety could shift the burden of their obligation by assignment "without the consent of the parties entitled to its benefits." That case is authority which supports respondent's theory that the assignment of the contract by Paonessa did not release appellant.

There is no force in the contention that the surety could be bound only for the reasonable value of the materials furnished and not for the agreed price. No issue was made in the pleadings upon this matter. Appellant admitted by its answer that any materials used in the street work, "as alleged in said complaint," were "sold and furnished" to the assignees of Paonessa.

[4] Appellant calls attention to one of the defenses pleaded in its answer that failure to establish the official grade of the street was fatal to the proceedings, and that therefore the bond was unauthorized, without consideration, and void. It is argued that, since the "Improvement Act of 1911" authorizes the council to grade or regrade a street "to the official grade," it has no jurisdiction to perform the work and to require the bond unless the official grade has been established. It is argued that without the establishment of the official grade the contract is void, and all concomitants, including the bond, are likewise of no effect. A similar contention was made in a case involving a surety bond, upon the ground that the original contractor had secured the work in violation of the statute requiring competitive bidding. It was held that the invalidity of that contract did not involve the liability of the surety company, the bond having been given to secure, not the performance of the work by the original contractor, but the independent contracts of materialmen and laborers. Kansas City Hydraulic P. B. Co. v. National Surety Co., 167 Fed. 496, 93 C. C. A. 132. The same principle is declared in Bell v. Kirkland, 102 Minn. 213, 113 N. W. 271, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 793, 120 Am. St. Rep. 621; Kansas City v. Schroeder, 196 Mo. 281, 93 S. W. 405; National Surety Co. v. Wyandotte Coal & Lime Co., 76 Kan. 914, 92 Pac. 1111; United States v. National Surety Co., 92 Fed. 549, 34 C. C. A. 526; Kiessig v. Allspaugh, 99 Cal. 452, 34 Pac. 106; McMenomy v. White, 115 Cal. 339, 47 Pac. 409; Summerton v. Hanson, 117 Cal. 252, 49 Pac. 135.

[5] Appellant also asserts that as part of the materials were furnished after the time limited in the contract with the city, it cannot be held liable for all the supplies. Plaintiff's claim is based upon materials furnished "between the 27th day of September, 1913, and the 22d day of November, 1913," while the time for the completion of the contract was fixed at 150 days from June 12, 1913, a period which expired November 9, 1913. But the respondent correctly argues that whatever may be the effect between the contractor and the municipality of this irregularity the surety, having undertaken to pay for all labor and materials furnished for that particular work, cannot be relieved because of any irregularity in the performance of the contract. Los Angeles Stone Co. v. National Surety Co., L. A. No. 4541, 173 Pac. 79, opinion filed May 8, 1918.

[6] It is next contended that plaintiff's claim was not filed with the superintendent of streets within the time prescribed by the statute. Section 19 of the "Street Improvement Act of 1911" provides that a person furnishing materials and one whose claim has not been paid by the contractor "may, within thirty days from the time said improvement is completed, file with the superintendent of streets a verified statement of his or its claim, together with a statement that the same, or some part thereof, has not been paid." It is alleged in the complaint that on January 8, 1914, "and within thirty days after the completion and acceptance of that portion of said street work between H street and A street" plaintiff filed the verified notice prescribed by the statute. The answer admitted the fact of completion and acceptance, but denied the date thereof set forth in the complaint, and denied that any statement of claim was served upon or filed with the street superintendent within 30 days after the completion of said improvement or work. Conceding that the claim was not filed within 30 days after the completion of that part of the improvement on which plaintiff's materials were used, namely, the area between H street and A street, respondent insists that it is in time because its claim went in before the completion of the portion lying between A street and Mill street. It has been held that such a claim may be filed before the contract is completed (French v. Powell, supra), and since the "improvement" for which Paonessa secured the contract involved both parts of North Eighth street, respondent insists that it was in time in filing its claim at any date before the completion of the whole work specified in the agreement, notwithstanding the fact that the supplies furnished were used only upon the portion required to be graded and paved with concrete and asphalt. This contention must be upheld. While two sorts of paving were contemplated and bargained for, the price to be paid Paonessa was a lump sum, and the "improvement" was a single one. An assessment was levied, it is true, upon completion of a part of the work, but this is permitted and authorized by the statute. It is also true that the materials were used upon that part of the street covered by the assessment, but the surety, under its responsibility for materials furnished upon all the area included in the contract, may not complain unless the claimant fails to file the prescribed statement with the superintendent of streets until more than 30 days after "the time said improvement is completed."

The judgment is affirmed.

LOS ANGELES & ARIZONA LAND CO. v. MARR. (L. A. 4229.)

1. Deeds ⚷170—Restrictions—Construction.

Restriction, in deed providing forfeiture of title for breach, was not uncertain as to what property it affected, where, by disregarding an exception of property which deed did not cover, the description was plain.

2. Pleading ⚷35 — Restrictions — Violation—Remedies.

Where deed contained restrictions violated by purchaser, and grantor sued to recover land, and asked reformation to apply the restrictions more definitely, when in fact they did apply as written, his allegations looking to reformation should be disregarded as superfluous.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis R. Works, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles & Arizona Land Company against Winifred F. Marr. From a judgment granting motion for nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Goodrich & Martinson, of Los Angeles, for appellant. E. R. Young, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment against it, entered upon the granting of a motion for a nonsuit.

Plaintiff's predecessor, Verdugo Canyon

Land Company, was the owner of a tract of land in Los Angeles county, and had made a contract with the defendant for the sale to her of a lot in said tract. A deed conveying the lot was executed subsequently. The contract, as well as the deed, contained various restrictive covenants, with a provision that in the event of any violation by the grantee, title should revert to the grantor. The complaint was framed upon the theory that the contract and the conveyance were uncertain with respect to both the description of the land conveyed and the terms of the restriction, and that the uncertainties were the result of mutual mistake of the parties. It was further alleged that the defendant had violated the covenant. The prayer was that the contract and the deed be reformed to express the true intent of the parties, and that the plaintiff be declared to be the owner of the lot and recover its possession.

The effort to have the instruments reformed has brought needless complication into the suit. Both parties are now agreed that the description of the lot purchased was clear and definite, and that no reformation was required in this respect. We are satisfied that the contract and deed, read with the aid of the map to which they refer, contain as well an adequate definition of the terms and scope of the restrictive covenants.

The grantor's land was known as tract No. 250. It contained several hundred acres, and was shown, with its subdivisions, on the above-mentioned map, which was on file in the office of the county recorder. The tract was traversed by an avenue, called Canada boulevard, running north and south, and was subdivided into numbered blocks and lots, the numbers of lots running consecutively through the entire tract. Block 205, containing some 39 acres, lay at the southerly end of the tract. It had not been divided into lots. The property purchased by the defendant was lot 54. It lay to the west of Canada boulevard, some distance northerly from the limits of block 205.

The conditions embodied in the deed read as follows:

> "This instrument is hereby made and executed upon the express condition and reservation that no malt, vinous or spirituous liquors shall be sold, given away or distributed directly or indirectly upon the property herein described, except under a restaurant license on the south 20 acres of block 205 thereof, and no building except for residence, hotel, church or school purposes (and the necessary outhouses, to be used in connection therewith) shall be erected or maintained upon the herein described property lying west of Canada boulevard (except block 205 thereof), and no residence, hotel, church or schoolhouse shall be erected or maintained upon the property last above described of a less value than $2,000. * * *
> "In the event of a violation of any of these conditions or reservations this instrument shall become null and void, the grantee herein shall forfeit all right or title to said property and all interest therein shall revert without notice to the grantor herein."

The dispute arises on the italicized portion of the provisions above quoted.

[1] The contention of the respondent is that the restriction is so indefinite with reference to the property affected as to be meaningless and inoperative. And this was apparently the view taken by the plaintiff at the time its complaint was framed. It may be admitted that terms more apt to express the intent of the parties might readily have been chosen. The restrictive clause, read as a whole, seems to refer, not only to the lot conveyed by the deed, but to the entire tract delineated upon the map. In all probability the language was simply copied from some prior instrument which defined the conditions upon which the various lots in the tract were to be sold. Thus, the clause begins by prohibiting the sale of liquors upon the property "herein described, except on the south 20 acres of block 205 thereof." Block 205 was not a part of the property described in the deed, and the exception, while proper in an instrument referring to the entire tract, was meaningless in a contract or conveyance covering only a parcel of property entirely outside of block 205. Coming to the specific restriction here involved, it is provided that "no residence * * * of a less value than $2,000 * * * shall be erected upon the property last above described." The property "last above described" is "the herein described property lying west of Canada boulevard (except block 205 thereof)." This sufficiently designates lot 54, which is "the herein described property," and is "lying west of Canada boulevard." The only possible question arises from the exception of block 205, which, as we have seen, was not a part of the property described, and hence could not be excepted from it. There is, therefore no uncertainty or doubt about the property designated as to which the restriction shall apply. There is merely a meaningless or unintelligible attempt to exclude from the operation of the restriction something which could not be included or excluded. It will not be doubted that the parties to this transfer intended that the restrictive covenants should apply to lot 54, which was the subject of the dealing between them. They were certainly not contracting with reference to block 205, which was remote from the land which was being sold. Obviously the exception of block 205 is a false reference in the description, and as such it must be rejected, thus giving effect to the deed according to the true intent of the parties. More v. Massini, 37 Cal. 432; Irving v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 15, 4 Pac. 766. "If the land * * * is described as an entire tract excepting a parcel described, and the description of the parcel in the exception is vague and uncertain, the uncertainty will affect the exception only, and that will fail and not the grant." 2 Devlin on Real Estate (3 Ed.) § 1013c; De Roach v. Clardy, 52 Tex. Civ. App. 233, 113 S. W. 22; Bromberg

v. Smee, 130 Ala. 601, 30 South. 483; Loyd v. Oates, 143 Ala. 231, 38 South. 1022, 111 Am. St. Rep. 39. On similar considerations, it must be held that the words "except block 205 thereof" are not to be regarded, and that the words "the herein described property lying west of Canada boulevard" are apt and sufficient to designate the property conveyed, i. e. lot 54.

[2] We may, therefore, view as immaterial the allegations designed to show a mistake in the framing of the instrument, and the prayer for reformation. The plaintiff had a right to seek redress for the violation of the restrictions contained in the deed as it was executed. There was in the complaint a sufficient basis for this relief, and the matter relating to reformation is to be treated as superfluous.

The validity of restrictions of this kind, when imposed, as was the covenant in this case, for the benefit of other lands owned by the grantor, is not questioned. Quatman v. McCray, 128 Cal. 285, 60 Pac. 855; Firth v. Marovich, 160 Cal. 257, 116 Pac. 729, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1190. There was a sufficient prima facie showing of the defendant's violation of the restriction, continuing after repeated demands for compliance. The nonsuit should not, therefore, have been granted.

SCHERER v. DANZIGER. (L. A. 4180.)

1. Master and Servant 🔑278(13)—Injury—Negligence—Place to Work—Sufficiency of Evidence.

Evidence in action for injury to engineer of pumping plant on ranch by hand being drawn into exposed cogwheel of pump, held to warrant jury's finding of employer's failure of duty as to furnishing safe place to work.

2. Master and Servant 🔑125(9)—Injury—Negligence—Notice.

Relative to negligence of master as to furnishing safe place to work, it need not be shown he had personal knowledge of removal of cover of cogwheel; the foreman in full charge of the plant having notice.

3. Master and Servant 🔑107(5)—Injury—Unsafe Place — Change Suggested by Employé.

That the place would not have been dangerous but for changes made on suggestion of the injured employé does not affect employer's liability; the dangerous condition arising from elimination of an important part of the employé's plan.

4. Negligence 🔑101—Contributory Negligence—Employers' Liability Act—Comparative Negligence.

Under Employers' Liability Act (St. 1911, p. 796), not only are defenses of assumption of risk and fellow servant's negligence unavailable, but contributory negligence, if slight, while employer's negligence is gross, in comparison, does not bar recovery, but only permits diminution of damages.

5. Master and Servant 🔑289(25) — Contributory Negligence — Question for Jury.

Evidence in servant's action for injury to engineer, through rag which he was carrying catching in exposed cogwheel, held to make question of contributory negligence one for the jury.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Willis I. Morrison, Judge.

Action by John Scherer against J. M. Danziger. From an adverse judgment and order, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. N. Goodwin and Hunsaker & Britt, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Gray, Barker & Bowen, and Wheaton A. Gray, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Plaintiff recovered damages for personal injuries suffered by him while in the employ of the defendant. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff was an engineer, and was employed to run a pumping plant on defendant's ranch. The plant, comprising a gasoline engine and two pumps, was located in a pumphouse. The engine and one of the pumps stood on the main floor of the house, and the other pump was in the basement. Power was transmitted from the engine to the pumps by means of belts. The pump on the main floor was fitted, among other parts, with a cogwheel 20 inches in diameter, which meshed with a smaller gear wheel or pinion. The plaintiff had been tightening the nuts on stuffing boxes on the side of this pump. Having done this, he wiped the nuts with a rag held in his right hand. He then turned to leave the pump, and as he was passing by the cogwheels the rag which he held was caught in the gears, drawing his hand into the wheels, and causing the injuries of which he complained. The negligence charged consisted of the defendant's act in requiring the plaintiff to remove from the cogwheels a cover which he had theretofore placed over the same, thus leaving the cogwheels uncovered and unprotected. There will be no occasion to discuss the further claim that defendant was negligent in failing to furnish plaintiff with cotton waste for wiping the machinery. The answer denied any negligence on the part of the defendant, and set up an affirmative plea that plaintiff's injuries were caused by his own negligence.

It is argued that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a finding of negligence on the part of the defendant. This contention cannot be sustained. Taking, as upon this appeal we are bound to do, the version of the evidence most favorable to the plaintiff's claims, we may fairly say that the record shows this state of facts: During the entire time of plaintiff's employment, one Moebius was in general charge of the defendant's ranch as foreman. His authority was superior to that of the plaintiff, and he had power of direction and control over the latter. Soon after the plaintiff entered the defendant's employ, he suggested certain changes in the arrangement of the pumphouse, and these were carried out with the defendant's consent. The belt transmitting power to the lower pump ran down one side of a flight of stairs leading to the basement. Among other changes, the plaintiff extended a wooden platform over this side of the stairs, and moved to the edge of the extension an iron railing which before had run within a few inches of the cogwheels on the upper pump. This left a space of some 18 inches between these wheels and the railing. The purpose of the alterations was to give plaintiff easier access to the upper pump, and to obviate the danger of contact with the belt. With things in this condition, the plaintiff regarded the exposed cogwheels as dangerous, and constructed a sheet iron cover, which he placed over the cogwheels. Soon thereafter Moebius, the foreman, objected to the cover, which apparently caused some noise in the operation of the machinery. After several discussions, he finally ordered the plaintiff to take the cover off. The plaintiff replied, "If I have to take it off now, I will take it off; but you have to take the responsibility if any one gets hurt." The foreman persisted in his command, and the plaintiff removed the cover. On the following day the accident occurred.

[1-3] This evidence fully warranted the jury in finding that the defendant had failed in his duty to use ordinary care to furnish to his employé a reasonably safe place in which to work. The plaintiff was not obliged to prove that the defendant had personal knowledge of the removal of the cover. Moebius was in full control of the plant, and notice to him was, of course, notice to his principal. There is no force in the claim that there would have been no element of danger in the situation if the location of the railing had not theretofore been changed in accordance with the plaintiff's own suggestions. The alterations had the approval of the defendant, and, if carried out according to plaintiff's ideas, would have included the covering of the cogwheels. The dangerous condition was created, not by the adoption of plaintiff's plan, but by the elimination of an important part of that plan.

[4, 5] When the accident occurred, the Employers' Liability Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 796) was in force. Under that law the defenses of assumption of risk and negligence of a fellow servant were not available to the defendant. Nor, under that statute, was the plaintiff's right of action destroyed by the fact that he may have been guilty of contributory negligence. He was still entitled to recover, if his contributory negligence was slight and that of the employer was gross in comparison; the jury being permitted to diminish the damages "in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employé." Perry v. Angelus Hosp. Ass'n, 172 Cal. 311, 156 Pac. 449. Regardless, however, of any comparison of negligence, it cannot be said that the evidence required a finding that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence at all. He was, it is true, aware of the uncovered condition of the gears, and of the danger involved in coming in contact with them. But his duties required him to work at the pump to which the gears were attached, and it was clearly a question for the jury whether, in leaving the pump, he was exercising ordinary care in his manner of carrying the rag which caught in the gears, or in other respects. It appeared that the engine was fitted with two clutches, by means of which either pump might be stopped without interrupting the motion of the engine or of the other pump and it is argued that it was negligent for the plaintiff to go to the pump to tighten the nuts on the stuffing boxes without first stopping the pump by means of the clutch. But this again was a question of fact for the jury. The plaintiff testified that the stuffing boxes had to be tightened frequently, that it was not customary to stop the pump when that work was done, and that "no employer would stand for anybody stopping a pump" for such work. The facts do not bring the case within the exceptional class of those in which a court is warranted in declaring, as matter of law, that negligence has been established. In any event, the jury was certainly authorized to find that the plaintiff's negligence, if any, was slight, and that of the defendant, comparatively speaking, gross, and to diminish the damages accordingly. Proper instructions covering this phase of the law were given.

The court's charge to the jury, as a whole, was full, clear, and correct. The appellant attacks certain instructions given or modified, but we think his criticisms, if well founded at all, are directed to points too unimportant to have affected the result. Of the single assignment of error in the admission of evidence, it may likewise be said that the ruling did not work substantial prejudice to the defendant.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

1. Street Railroads ⚷114(14)—Collisions—Contributory Negligence—Evidence.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding, that automobilist killed by street car at street crossing was not negligent.

2. Costs ⚷260(4) — Frivolous Appeals — Penalty.

Where defendant was extremely negligent, bordering on criminality, and there was very clear evidence to the effect that a person killed was not negligent, an appeal on the ground that deceased was negligent as a matter of law, and that defendant was entitled to a directed verdict, was frivolous, and a penalty will be added to the damages.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Action by Ella H. Levings and others against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, E. E. Morris, and A. W. Ashburn, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. John F. Poole and George A. Boden, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in an action for damages for the alleged negligence of the defendant in the operation of one of its cars, by which a collision occurred with an automobile being driven by one Willard F. Levings, husband of the plaintiff Ella H. Levings, and father of the other plaintiffs, in which the said Willard F. Levings lost his life. The collision occurred at the intersection of Colorado street and El Molino avenue, in the city of Pasadena, where, upon the afternoon of September 14, 1913, an east-bound car being operated by the defendant's employés on Colorado street struck the automobile of the deceased going north on El Molino avenue and attempting to cross Colorado street. The appellant presents but one question upon this appeal, and that is the question whether upon the facts of the case the deceased was chargeable with such contributory negligence, as a matter of law, as would prevent a recovery of damages for his death. It is admitted by the appellant that the car which collided with the automobile of the decedent was being operated at a speed in excess of that allowed by the ordinances of Pasadena, which provide for a maximum speed of 20 miles an hour within said city. Aside from this admission, however, there is ample evidence tending to show that the car, immediately before and at the time of the collision, was being run at a rate of speed so greatly in excess of the aforesaid speed limit as to amount to negligence so reckless as to be near the border line of criminality. A number of witnesses to the accident declared that the car came down Colorado street at a rate of speed of from 40 to more than 60 miles an hour. Others described this speed as "terrific" and "furious." The occupants of the automobile who survived the collision declared that no bell was rung or other warning given until just before the car crashed into the automobile. There was also evidence showing that after the impact the car, in spite of efforts of the motorman to stop it, ran 300 feet before being brought to a standstill.

It will thus be seen that there was ample proof that the defendant's negligence was of the most gross and inexcusable kind. Upon the question of the contributory negligence of the deceased driver of the automobile, the uncontradicted evidence of its surviving occupants was to the effect that the automobile as it approached the intersection of El Molino avenue with Colorado street was traveling at a rate of speed of from 10 to 15 miles an hour; that its deceased driver and its other occupants looked in both directions up and down Colorado street through the palms which line the avenue, but only partly obstruct the view, and that no car was in sight, and that there was no sound nor warning given of an approaching car. One of the occupants of the machine was a musician with an ear trained to distinguish sounds, and she testified that she heard no sound of warning of the car's approach. The distance from the southerly curb line of Colorado street to the street car track was 26 feet. As the automobile emerged from El Molino avenue to cross this distance the car was for the first time seen approaching at the speed above indicated, but at the top of the hill more than a block away. The driver of the automobile at once attempted to stop it, but could not do so before reaching the track. The car traveled the length of the block, which was shown to be 300 feet, while the automobile was going a distance of not to exceed 26 feet, and after striking and demolishing it, went a further distance of 300 feet before being brought to a stop.

[1, 2] Upon this state of the record the appellant contends that the deceased driver of the car must be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and that the appellant was entitled to a verdict in its favor upon that ground alone. This contention has not the slightest semblance of merit. The cases cited by appellant to sustain it have no application to a state of facts such as the record herein discloses. The appeal is entirely without merit, and a clear case is presented for the imposition of a penalty upon the appellant for having begun and prosecuted a frivolous appeal.

The judgment is affirmed, with $100 added damages for an appeal, which was frivolous and taken for delay.

ROBINSON et al. v. BRIEST. (L. A. 4212.)

1. Quieting Title 🔑44(1) — Burden of Proof.

In a suit to remove cloud on title, plaintiff has the burden to prove the facts alleged, and on which the claim for judgment is based.

2. Mines and Minerals 🔑23(6) — Assessment Work—Notice of Failure to Contribute.

Rev. St. U. S. § 2324 (U. S. Comp. St. 1916, § 4620), provides for assessment work on mining claims, and that upon the failure of a co-owner to contribute his proportion, the co-owner, who has performed the labor, may give notice to the delinquent for 90 days, and if at the expiration of such time the delinquent fails or refuses to contribute his interest, the claim shall become the property of the co-owner who has made the improvements. Civ. Code, § 1426*o*, provides that when the notice in Rev. St. U. S. § 2324, is given it may be recorded in the office of the county recorder, and the original or certified copy of the record shall be prima facie evidence that the delinquent has failed or refused to contribute his proportion of the assessment work. A co-owner filed a notice provided for in these two sections, but did not file it within 90 days after service. Held, that such notice did not invoke the rule of evidence within section 1426*o*.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Catharine N. Robinson and another against Grant A. Briest. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Ben Goodrich, Olin Wellborn, Jr., and Stephen Monteleone, all of Los Angeles (Alfred H. McAdoo, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. McFarland & Irving, of Riverside, for respondents.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. This action grew out of the following facts: Plaintiff, Catharine N. Robinson (wife of James M. Robinson), and defendant were co-owners of two certain groups of mining claims, upon one of which defendant asserted that he, at his own expense, had done the assessment work required by section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. St. 1916, § 4620) for the years 1910 to 1912, both inclusive; and that upon the other group he had done said assessment work for the years 1908 and 1912, both inclusive.

On November 5, 1913, he caused to be served upon plaintiff, as such co-owner, the notice provided by said section, wherein it was stated that if the co-owner neglected to pay and contribute her share of the expenditure so claimed to have been made by defendant within 90 days from the date of service, her interest in said mining property would become that of defendant.

The complaint, filed February 3, 1914, after stating the fact of service of said notices, alleged that plaintiff and defendant jointly, and not defendant alone, had done the assessment work, each contributing one-half the cost and expense thereof; that notwithstanding such fact defendant threatened to and would, unless restrained from so doing, file the notices so served, and an affidavit of service thereof, with the recorder of Riverside county, in which said mining claims were located, as provided in section 1426*o*, Civil Code, thus depriving plaintiff of the record title to a one-half interest therein, all to her irreparable damage, and prayed that it be adjudged that no sum whatsoever was unpaid by plaintiff on account of work and labor done in performing the annual assessment work on said mining claims, and asked that defendant be enjoined from filing the notices and affidavits of service thereof in the recorder's office of Riverside county. No injunctive order, however, was at any time issued.

By his answer, filed March 3, 1914, defendant, admitting that plaintiff was a co-owner of said property up to the expiration of 90 days after service of the notices, denied that she had, as alleged, contributed anything towards said assessment work for the years specified in the notices, and alleged the doing of the work by himself alone, as stated in the notices so served upon plaintiff, which notices, given pursuant to section 2324, United States Revised Statutes, together with affidavits of service thereof, were, on February 9, 1914, filed for record in the recorder's office of Riverside county.

The sole purpose of the action, as stated in the complaint, was to obtain an injunction restraining defendant from filing for record the notices and affidavits of service, as provided in section 1426*o*, Civil Code, which is as follows:

> "Whenever a co-owner * * * of a mining claim shall give to a delinquent co-owner * * * the notice in writing * * * provided for in section twenty-three hundred and twenty-four, Revised Statutes of the United States, an affidavit of the person giving such notice, stating the time, place, manner of service, and by whom and upon whom such service was made, shall be attached to a true copy of such notice, and such notice and affidavit must be recorded in the office of the county recorder, in books kept for that purpose, in the county in which the claim is situated, within ninety days, after the giving of such notice. * * * The original of such notice and affidavit, or a duly certified copy of the record thereof, shall be prima facie evidence that the delinquent mentioned in section twenty-three hundred and twenty-four has failed or refused to contribute his proportion of the expenditure required by that section."

The theory of the plaintiff, as alleged in the complaint, was that the filing of the notices, with affidavits of service thereof, would, under this provision of the statute, vest in defendant record title to the interest in the property theretofore owned by her, to which, however, if plaintiff had, as she alleged, contributed her share in doing the assessment work, he would not be entitled and therefore should be restrained from doing an act which would cloud her title. Thompson v. Pack (D. C.) 219 Fed. 624. As heretofore stated, however, the notices and affidavits, in the absence of any injunctive order, were filed on February 9, 1914.

[1] At the trial of the issues so joined by complaint and answer plaintiff declined to offer any evidence in support of the allegations contained in the complaint, and having rested, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which motion was denied. This ruling, in our opinion, was clearly erroneous. The act which it was sought to enjoin having been performed, no purpose could be served by the making of an order enjoining its performance. On the other hand, assuming as the trial court apparently did that the complaint was sufficient in stating a cause of action to quiet title as against the defendant's claim based upon the admitted service of the notices as provided by section 2324, U. S. Rev. Stats., by reason of which, if the facts therein stated were true and plaintiff neglected within 90 days after such service to contribute her share, her interest in the mines would become the property of defendant, it devolved upon her to affirmatively prove that, as alleged, she had contributed her share towards doing the assessment work. From the effect declared by section 2324 to follow from the service of the notices, plaintiff, as such co-owner, if not delinquent, might safely rest until defendant by affirmative action invoked a judicial determination of the question, in which case the burden of proof would rest upon him to establish the facts upon which he based his claim to her interest in the property. O'Hanlon v. Ruby Gulch Min. Co., 48 Mont. 65, 135 Pac. 913. Having, however, sought affirmative relief upon the theory that the acts of defendant clouded her title, the burden was upon her as plaintiff to prove the facts alleged, and upon which she based her claim to recover judgment quieting her title. In Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Cal. 128, in discussing the test as to whether or not a certain instrument would cast a cloud upon the title of the plaintiff's property, it was said:

> "Would the owner of the property, in an action of ejectment brought by the adverse party, founded upon the deed, be required to offer evidence to defeat a recovery? If such proof would be necessary, the cloud would exist; if the proof would be unnecessary, no shade would be cast by the presence of the deed."

The statute (section 1426*o*, Civil Code) provides that the filing of the documents shall be within 90 days after the service of notice, which service was had on November 5th. As appears from the pleadings, they were not filed until after the expiration of 90 days; hence, by such act of filing, defendant obtained none of the rights or advantages which he might have secured by a compliance with the provision of section 1426*o*. Therefore, there was no cloud of record upon her title. Construing the complaint as stating a cause of action based upon the allegation that plaintiff had paid her full share for work done upon the mines, it devolved upon her, since such allegation was denied, to prove such fact. This she did not do, and in the absence of such proof it follows that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for nonsuit.

[2] With his answer defendant filed a cross-complaint, alleging that he had performed the required assessment labor upon the property for the years designated in said notices, which were served on November 5, 1913, and that on February 9, 1914, he filed with the recorder of Riverside county, wherein the mining property was located, the original of said notices, together with affidavits of service thereof, and asked that his title to the entire property be quieted as against plaintiff. To this cross-complaint plaintiff filed an answer denying the allegation that defendant had contributed other than one-half the entire expense of doing said work. After the denial of defendant's motion for nonsuit, the trial of the issues so joined by cross-complaint and answer proceeded, defendant offering in evidence the notices and affidavits of service filed with the recorder of Riverside county on February 9, 1914, upon the theory that, under the provisions of section 1426*o*, Civil Code, they constituted prima facie evidence that plaintiff had failed or refused to contribute her proportion of the expenditure upon said mines required by section 2324, Rev. Stats. of the United States, to which section 1426*o* is supplementary. But the provision contained in section 1426*o* requires that the documents shall be filed within 90 days after the making of such service; otherwise the filing is a futile act. It appears from his pleading that they were not filed until 5 or 6 days after the expiration of such time, and hence did not constitute prima facie evidence under the provisions of the rule specified in the section. Conceding that defendant was under the allegations of his cross-complaint, entitled to a decree of forfeiture, nevertheless, since the documents were not filed within 90 days from service, he was in no position to invoke the rule of evidence declared in section 1426*o*, Civil Code. It devolved upon him, in accordance with the ordinary rules of evidence, to establish the facts which entitled him to the forfeiture provided for by section 2324, Rev. Stats. of the United States, namely, that he and plaintiff were co-owners of the property; that he had done the annual assessment work as claimed; that plaintiff had not contributed her share of the expense of doing the same; that he had served upon her the notice provided for in said section; and that she failed or refused to contribute her proportion of such expenditure within 90 days from the service of such notice.

The judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff quieting her title was not within the issues joined by the complaint and answer, and no such relief was asked. Moreover, conceding such issue to have been joined, no evidence was offered by her in support of the allegations of her complaint.

The judgment is reversed.

MORTON v. ANGST. (Civ. 2151.)

APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1002—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF FACT.

Where there is a conflict in the evidence, the finding of the trial court will be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Jennie Morton against Avis E. Angst, executrix of the estate of Annie E. Luscombe, deceased. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur H. Barendt, of San Francisco (Arthur Wright, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. Frank Stewart and J. W. Howell, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action to recover upon a rejected claim against the estate of a deceased person. As stated by counsel for appellant, the cause of action is upon a quantum meruit for services alleged to have been rendered to the decedent by the plaintiff, both claim and complaint containing the incidental allegation that the decedent had promised to provide for plaintiff by will, but had not done so in the will admitted to probate.

An agreement to make any provision for any person by will is invalid, unless the same or some note or memorandum thereof is in writing, subscribed by the party to be charged or by his agent. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 7. It is in evidence that in April, 1913, the decedent made a will which by its terms gave to the plaintiff the sum of $150, and also made the plaintiff one of four residuary legatees, but this will was revoked by the later will which has been admitted to probate and in which no provision is made for the plaintiff. The court found the facts to be that the plaintiff did not render any services to the decedent in reliance upon or because of any promise of decedent to make plaintiff a beneficiary under her will, and that no contract was ever made by the decedent or on her behalf, either in writing or otherwise, wherein the decedent promised to compensate the plaintiff by bequest or otherwise for any services rendered to the decedent by the plaintiff. This finding is sustained by the evidence. The only testimony to which our attention is directed by counsel and upon which he relies as constituting proof that plaintiff rendered services because of or in reliance upon the existence of a will in her favor is so vague, indirect, and unsatisfactory that the court could not very reasonably have made any other finding than that which it did make.

Concerning the services alleged to have been rendered to the decedent for which the plaintiff seeks to be compensated, the court found that the plaintiff occasionally did perform some acts of service for the decedent. but that the same were done and performed voluntarily by the plaintiff without the expectation of making any charge therefor; that said services were rendered solely on account of friendship which had existed for a long time between the plaintiff and the decedent, and that the decedent treated such services as and believed them to be only acts of friendship; that decedent had no knowledge that plaintiff intended to make any charge for such services, and did not intend or expect to compensate the plaintiff therefor, otherwise than by reciprocal acts of friendship; that the value of the services rendered by plaintiff is not the sum of $1,000 nor any other sum. These findings also are amply supported by the evidence. It does appear that the plaintiff and the decedent for many years were intimate friends; that from time to time each of them visited the other; that the plaintiff did perform on behalf of the decedent certain acts of service in relation to shopping, hat making, letter writing, etc. They were such acts as one woman might do for another as acts of friendship, although some of them were also such acts as might have been done by a secretary or companion or milliner. But the court had before it all the evidence of these circumstances, related in detail by various witnesses, and made its findings as above stated. The utmost that can be said in favor of the appellant on this question is that there was a conflict in the evidence. That being so, it is a familiar rule that the findings must be affirmed. It appears to us that the claim of the plaintiff is without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

Whether plaintiff passenger was guilty of negligence in alighting from a train after it had started to leave the station, held a jury question.

9. Damages 🔑132(2)—Personal Injuries—Excessive Damages.

Where plaintiff, an able-bodied woman performing the housework for a family, was rendered helpless by the breaking of her hip, requiring the constant assistance of others, held, that a verdict for $5,000 was not excessive, in view of the probability of permanence of injury, pain suffered, and amount of medical bill.

10. Appeal and Error 🔑1066 — Instructions Not Applicable—Harmless Error.

Instructions based upon theory that plaintiff passenger was thrown from the car, while perhaps not applicable, could not have misled the jury, where the evidence on the point was perfectly clear.

11. Trial 🔑267(3) — Requested Instructions—Modification.

Defendant's requested instructions to find for defendant if plaintiff passenger was injured in any other way than by being violently thrown from the car excluded every other cause of injury, and was properly modified, so as to include the other theories upon which the cause was tried.

12. Trial 🔑267(2) — Requested Instructions—Modification.

Defendant's requested instruction being lengthy, involved, and argumentative, and therefore calculated to mislead the jury, was properly modified, so as to remove in a measure the objectionable features.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by Mary Fitzgerald against the Southern Pacific Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Louis Oneal and James P. Sex, both of San Jose, for appellants. E. M. Rea and John P. Fitzgerald, both of San Jose, for respondent.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. Plaintiff was injured on the 9th day of November, 1912, while leaving a Southern Pacific train at Madrone station in Santa Clara county, and defendant appeals from a judgment in her favor on account thereof entered pursuant to the verdict of a jury.

[1] The first claim of defendant is of a variance between the complaint and the proofs of plaintiff; it being claimed that the complaint alleged only that plaintiff was thrown from the train, and that this is not shown by the evidence.

Plaintiff's cause of action as stated in her complaint is that while she was a passenger on defendant's train, and when in the act of getting out of and off from its car and being still thereon the said car was, through the negligence of defendant and its agents, servants, and employés, suddenly started without allowing plaintiff sufficient time to get off, and in further consequence of the insufficient alarm preparatory to starting the train, and of the negligence of defendant's employés in running and conducting the train, the plaintiff was violently thrown therefrom to her injury.

The testimony shows that Miss Fitzgerald was a passenger on a train of the defendant from San Jose to her home at Madrone station on the day of her injury; that she was sitting in the rear coach about one-fourth of the way back from its front door when the train stopped at Madrone; that the train stopped there for a very brief time, the brakeman being ready to give the signal to start the train when it stopped, and no warning being given her of the starting of the train; that when she knew the train had stopped at Madrone she left her seat and walked as fast as she could to the front platform of the coach, and that when she got inside of the steps she saw that the train was very slowly moving; that she then got down as quickly as she could and got off the step, or, as she says at one point of her testimony, "jumped off"; that while she could see that the train was moving it was not going very fast, but that it was just moving and that was all. She fell on the platform, and was picked up suffering from a broken hip. There was, in addition to these facts, the evidence of several impartial witnesses, who were either passengers on the train, or had business at the platform when the train stopped, from which the jury was warranted in finding that the train stopped for an unusually short interval on this occasion. It further appears that Miss Fitzgerald was 71 years old; that had she been carried past her station the next stop would have been four miles away; that her train check, showing that she was a passenger for Madrone, was not taken up by the conductor, thus indicating that the train officer overlooked the fact that she was destined for Madrone station; and it further appears that the conductor was an extra conductor, on that run for the first time. From all this it appears that the jury were justified in finding that the train was started so quickly as to give the plaintiff no sufficient time to leave it, and that in consequence thereof she fell and was injured. The complaint appears to be a sufficient basis for the admission of this evidence.

[2, 3] That the defendant knew the case which it must meet to be that which the plaintiff presented appears from the defendant's answer in which it denies that she sustained her injury "by reason of any fall from said train, or by reason of being thrown therefrom," and avers "that she willfully attempted to alight from said train while it was in motion." The distinction upon which defendant bases its claim of a variance is one of verbiage, not of meaning; and the defendant was in no way surprised or misled thereby. Further, this objection of defendant was not definitely pointed out at the trial when, if sound, it might have been removed by a simple amendment. Even if plaintiff's contention as to variance were correct, still the complaint and answer are to be read together, and as it appears by so doing that the defendant was not prejudiced thereby in any substantial right, the matter is within the rule of section 475 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the case will not be reversed on this ground.

It is contended that as a matter of law the evidence shows the plaintiff to have been guilty of contributory negligence in getting off the train, and that the manner in which she did so, and not any of the alleged acts of the defendant, was the sole proximate cause of her injury.

[4-6] Carriers of passengers must use the utmost care and diligence for their safety, and are liable for injury caused by their slight negligence. The relation between carrier and passenger continues until the passenger has alighted. The carrier must exercise as high a degree of care in affording passengers a reasonable opportunity to alight in safety as in carrying them safely. Maxwell v. Fresno City Ry. Co., 4 Cal. App. 746, 89 Pac. 367.

It was conceded upon the oral argument that there was sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in finding negligence on the part of the defendant in not stopping its train for a sufficient length of time to enable the plaintiff to depart therefrom in safety. The facts which it is claimed establish negligence of the defendant and contributory negligence of the plaintiff are interwoven. The questions are questions of fact for the jury. Carr v. Eel River R. R. Co., 98 Cal. 366, 33 Pac. 213, 21 L. R. A. 354; Raub v. Los Angeles, etc., R. R., 103 Cal. 474, 37 Pac. 374.

In the former case the Supreme Court said:

> "It is the duty of a railroad company to stop its train at a station for a reasonable time, in order that passengers may get on and off its cars with safety to themselves, and if it fails so to do, and injury results to passengers from the starting of the train while passengers are alighting, the company is guilty of negligence, and is responsible in damages for such injury. A common carrier of passengers for hire is bound to use the greatest care and diligence in their transportation consistent with the carrying on of his business. The act of a passenger in jumping from a moving train is not negligence per se but it is for the jury to say under all of the circumstances of the case whether the act of jumping was justifiable or not; and if the passenger jumped when carried less than 100 feet beyond the station after an attempt to alight at the station, where there was no sufficient time to alight with safety, and there is no evidence as to the speed of the train at the time of jumping, it is proper to instruct the jury that if they find that the train did not stop a reasonable length of time to allow the plaintiff to get off, and that she jumped therefrom while the train was in motion, and under such circumstances that an ordinarily cautious, careful, and prudent person would not have apprehended danger therefrom, she was entitled to recover; but if they found that the jumping was under circumstances where such a person would have apprehended danger, it was an act of carelessness which would relieve the defendant from responsibility, and entitle it to a verdict."

In the latter case the rule was stated substantially thus:

> "It is the duty of a railroad corporation to afford a reasonable time for passengers to alight from its cars at the station to which it has assumed to carry them, and if a passenger is injured while attempting to alight at such station, by reason of the sudden and unannounced starting of the train, the burden is thrown upon the company of showing that the injury was not the result of its own act or negligence. * * * Where it appears that when the train reached the station it stopped a short distance beyond the platform, and that while the plaintiff was in the act of alighting, and when he had reached the lower step of the car, the train started without any warning, throwing plaintiff to the ground, which caused the injuries for which the action was brought, the facts do not prove contributory negligence per se, but the question of the plaintiff's negligence should be submitted to the jury."

[7] These are plain statements of a simple rule of law. It is not necessary to analyze the facts out of which they arose in order to understand them. In the Raub Case the plaintiff was shown to have jumped from the train while it was moving; but no real distinction is made in the application of the rule between jumping from a moving train and stepping therefrom. The rule applies to both sets of facts. That these questions are questions of fact is not only the settled rule in California, but while particular circumstances may, in some cases, justify the court in declaring as a matter of law that a passenger is negligent in alighting from a moving train, the general rule is that whether or not alighting from a train when it is in motion constitutes contributory negligence is a question of fact for the jury to determine in view of all of the circumstances of the particular case. See note to Hoylman v. K. & M. Ry. Co., 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 741.

Here there are no particular circumstances which take the case out of the general rule, and the trial court properly left the question of negligence and contributory negligence to the jury. The appellants rely upon three cases which they claim are in conflict with the two cases last above cited. These cases are Campbell v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 135 Cal. 137, 67 Pac. 50; Craven v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 72 Cal. 345, 13 Pac. 878; Joyce v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 147 Cal. 274, 82 Pac. 204.

Campbell's Case was a clear case of due care on the part of the carrier, a street car company, and of negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The plaintiff asked the conductor to stop the car so that he might alight. The conductor did not hear his first request. He repeated it, and the conductor then heard it and took steps to stop the car, at the same time admonishing him not to alight until the car had stopped. The passenger did leave the car before it stopped, and, in doing so, was injured. The court found that the plaintiff was negligent in so doing, and that his negligence was the sole cause of the injury. It will be noted that the court found from the facts of the case that the sole cause of the injury was the negligence of the plaintiff. The defendant's employé was doing all he could to comply with the request that the car be stopped. In defiance of the warning not to do so, and when he had no excuse, as his request to stop was being complied with, he stepped open-eyed into the danger by which he was injured.

In the case of Mrs. Craven the court stated the problem thus:

> "The whole evidence revolved around this one question, Did the plaintiff, at the very time of the accident, negligently jump off the train while it was moving, and thus cause or contribute to the injury? If she did not, then the verdict should have been for plaintiffs. If she did, then there can be no doubt that her negligence contributed proximately to the injury."

It will be noted that in stating the problem the court incorporated the idea of negligence in jumping off the train while it was moving, thus importing that it might be possible to get off a moving train without negligence. The jury found a verdict for the defendant in that case upon conflicting evidence as to whether, after the train had stopped, it was started carelessly and suddenly without giving Mrs. Craven a reasonable chance to alight, thus causing her to fall, or whether she jumped from the train while it was in motion, and thus caused or contributed to her own injury. The trial court refused to grant a new trial, and the Supreme Court sustained this order. There is nothing in the case supporting counsel's contention that jumping from a train or getting off a train while in motion is, in and of itself, conclusively negligent. Indeed in that very case the Supreme Court approved an instruction reading that, "if you believe the defendant did not afford the plaintiff Mrs. Craven a reasonable time for this purpose, but started the train suddenly while she was in the act of getting off the car and before she had time to alight, it failed to perform its duty, was guilty of negligence, and is liable to her for damages she has suffered thereby," given in connection with another instruction to the effect that if the negligence of the plaintiff caused or contributed to her injury she was not entitled to recover.

In Joyce v. Los Angeles Ry. Co. the plaintiff asked the conductor to stop at Hewitt street, and he told her that he would do so, and that Hewitt street was three blocks further on. While the conductor was on the street in front of the car, according to custom, signaling the car on its crossing a steam railroad track, the plaintiff, without notice to or knowledge of either conductor or motorman that she intended to leave the car, alighted therefrom two blocks before reaching Hewitt street and on the wrong side, and in consequence thereof was injured. She was warned by one of the passengers not to get off the car as it was in motion. She had no reasonable excuse for leaving the car. The jury found against her, and the Supreme Court held that this finding was sustained by the evidence. In both this case and Campbell's Case the car was not yet stopped, and in each of these cases the official of the car had been asked to stop it at a certain point by the passenger who was injured, and the passenger left the car while in motion and before the motorman had an opportunity to comply with the request to stop the car. In each case it was held that the carrier was not negligent. It is true that the court employed some general language in both the Joyce Case and Campbell Case, which seems to be, on first reading and if construed without reference to the facts to which the court was applying it, in conflict with the rule as laid down in the case of Carr v. Eel River and Raub's Case. This language is all embodied in the Joyce Case and the gist of it is embraced in the following quotations:

> "It is said in Booth on Street Railway Law, § 337: 'But it has been held to be negligence per se, which justifies a nonsuit, to step off the car while it is being slowed up, in order to stop in response to a passenger's request or when incumbered by a load or bundle.'"

And further:

> "It is said in Schouler on Bailments and Carriers (3d Ed.) § 662: 'Thus a railway passenger is not justified in jumping from the train while it is in motion, even though the carrier was negligent, whether in carrying him past the station or in starting before he had due opportunity to land.'"

The language quoted is not, however, necessarily in conflict with the rule that the question whether a passenger leaving a moving train is guilty of contributory negligence is in this state a question for the jury. The most that can be said is that it was held to be negligence per se to leave a rapidly moving car while it was being slowed up in response to a passenger's request, and that the quotation from Schouler is no more than a statement of what has been held in some cases to be the law, quoted by way of argument to show how far some authorities have gone, and was not intended to lay down a rigid rule to the effect that getting off a moving train or car is in itself conclusively a negligent act.

[8] These cases are thus seen to be reconcilable with Carr v. Eel River and the Raub Case, supra, which are therefore held to state the rule in California. In all the cases cited by appellant on this point the carrier was either found to have been guiltless of negligence or particular facts sustained a finding that under all the circumstances plaintiff was negligent in getting off the moving train. It is nowhere held that leaving a moving train constitutes negligence per se, and the cases cited by defendant in support of the contention are all thus seen to be either causes which particular facts took out of the general rule, or where the court found "negligence" in getting off the train while it was in motion, which upon all the facts is tantamount to a finding of contributory negligence. In this case it does not appear as a matter of law under all the circumstances that plaintiff was negligent in alighting from this train. The question was properly left to the jury for decision.

[9] It is claimed that the damages awarded by the jury were excessive. The verdict was for $5,000. As a result of her fall the plaintiff, who prior thereto was an able-bodied woman performing the housework for a family, was rendered helpless, requiring the constant assistance of others. She was in a hospital for a long time and suffered great pain from the injury. The trial occurred over 2½ years after the injury, and during all the time between the injury and the trial the plaintiff was in constant pain. She was unable to walk, except with crutches, at the time of the trial. Her broken hip had not united, and to all appearances her condition will be permanent. Her hospital bills and the services of one among several doctors whose services were necessary cost her $527. We cannot say under these circumstances that the amount of damages awarded by the jury were excessive.

[10] Many complaints were made of instructions given by the court and of the refusal to give instructions requested by the defendant; but an examination of the instructions as a whole discloses no reason for a reversal of this case. Without reciting the various instructions, it may be said that of those given by the court No. 5 was copied substantially from Carr v. Eel River, 98 Cal. 366, 33 Pac. 213, 21 L. R. A. 354, and correctly stated the law; Nos. 8 and 9 were based upon the theory that Miss Fitzgerald was thrown from the car and while perhaps not applicable in this case, nevertheless could not have misled the jury, as the evidence on that point was perfectly clear; Nos. 10 and 11 correctly stated the law; and No. 12 was generously fair to the defendant. No. 16, which is criticized because of its assumption that the plaintiff's nervous system was shocked by her injury, is not objectionable on this score because the evidence beyond question shows that her nervous system was shocked and injured.

[11] The instructions requested by defendant were correctly modified by the court, and those refused were properly refused; for example, as originally presented, defendant's requested instruction No. 5 directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant if Miss Fitzgerald was injured in any other way than by being violently thrown from the train, thus excluding every other cause of injury, and it was for this reason incorrect. The court modified it properly so as to include the other theories upon which the case was tried.

[12] Defendant's instruction No. 12 was a lengthy, involved, and argumentative instruction calculated not intentionally but in fact to mislead the jury, and was properly modified so as to, in a measure, remove these objectionable features. Defendant's instruction No. 13, as presented by the defendant, undertook to state to the jury that if they believed Miss Fitzgerald's testimony that she was injured in consequence of voluntarily alighting from the train while it was moving, they must bring in a verdict in favor of the defendant, thus holding her guilty of contributory negligence, whereas, as a matter of law, as we have seen, the question of contributory negligence was one for the jury to decide.

The criticism of other instructions is not sufficiently important to require mention.

Judgment and ordered affirmed.

WALKER et al. v. KINGSBURY, State Surveyor General. (Civ. 1805.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS 🔑53—GRANTS OF STATE FOR SCHOOLS — LANDS IN RESERVATIONS—LIEU LANDS.

Land withdrawn by the Secretary of the Interior pending determination as to the advisability of including it within a forest reservation is within a reservation within Rev. St. U. S. § 2275, as amended by Act Cong. Feb. 28, 1891, c. 384, 26 Stat. 796 (U. S. Comp. St. 1916, § 4860), appropriating and granting to and authorizing the state to select other lands where the school lands are within any reservation.

2. PUBLIC LANDS 🔑106(2) — DETERMINATIONS OF INTERIOR DEPARTMENT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The question whether lands withdrawn from entry and settlement pending determination whether they should be included in a forest reservation and released thereafter were eliminated from the forest reserve is one of law as to which the courts are not controlled by departmental rulings.

3. PUBLIC LANDS 🔑53—LIEU LANDS—"NATIONAL FORESTS"—"FOREST RESERVATIONS."

Forest reservations authorized in 1891 are identical with "national forests" as they are called in Act Cong. March 4, 1907, c. 2907, 34 Stat. 1269 (U. S. Comp. St. 1916, § 5122), and in St. Cal. 1917, p. 1218, authorizing reselection when lands once selected as lieu lands are closed on account of the release of base lands from national forests, and neither act requires that the land shall have been permanently included in a national forest as a prerequisite to reselection, but it is sufficient if the lands have been withdrawn from settlement and entry pending determination of advisability of including it within the national forest.

4. MANDAMUS 🔑10—RESELECTION OF LIEU LANDS—WHEN ISSUABLE—FUTILE ACTS.

The mere fact that the Land Department at Washington might refuse a reselection of lieu land where base land has been released from a national forest does not prevent award of writ of mandamus to compel the surveyor general of the state to make the reselection where petitioners had the clear right to a reselection, since the court could not assume that the Secretary of the Interior would arbitrarily interfere with such right.

Original petition in mandamus by Thomas B. Walker and the Waland Lumber Company, Incorporated, against W. S. Kingsbury, as Surveyor General of the state. Writ granted.

A. E. Bolton, of San Francisco, and Pardee & Pardee, of Susanville, for petitioners. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and R. T. McKisick, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Mandamus. It appears from the petition that on January 9, 1907, section 16, township 46 north, range 3 east, Mt. Diablo base and meridian, in this state, was unsurveyed land, and on that date was, by order of the Secretary of the Interior, "withdrawn from all forms at disposal under the public land laws of the United States, except the mineral laws, as a proposed addition to the Modoc Forest Reserve, in California"; that prior to June 4, 1908, J. E. Pardee, petitioners' assignor, made application to the state surveyor general to purchase certain described lands, "as indemnity state school land," said land so selected being vacant public land and subject to selection by the state as indemnity state school land; that about June 4, 1908, the state surveyor general filed in the Susanville land office indemnity state school land selection list No. 5765, for the land described in the Pardee application, assigning as a base certain land in said section 16; that thereafter the said application was approved by the surveyor general, and on May 25, 1909, a certificate of purchase, No. 5853, for said selected land, was issued to said Pardee, who assigned said certificate to petitioner Walker, and the latter conveyed to petitioner lumber company an interest therein; that on December 26, 1911, said section 16 was restored to settlement, and to entry on January 25, 1912; that thereafter, to wit, on November 14, 1912, said selection, No. 5765, was held for cancellation by the commissioner of the general land office, "for the stated reason that said base land in section 16 * * * had since the date of said selection, been eliminated from the Forest Reserve," and, thereafter, to wit, August 3, 1915, "the said selection was canceled by the United States Land Department for the same stated reason for which it had been held for cancellation as aforesaid"; that said selected lands are subject to selection by the state as indemnity state school lands; that on October 9, 1917, petitioners made application to the respondent as state surveyor general, to reselect said lands pursuant to the act of the Legislature of the state of California approved May 26, 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1218), sometimes referred to as chapter 674 of the Statutes of 1917, but the surveyor general refused and still refuses to make such reselection.

In his answer respondent admitted certain of the facts alleged in the petition, including those averments setting forth certain official actions and the dates thereof; alleged that the withdrawal of said lands in section 16 "was but temporary, and was made for the purpose of examining their adaptability and fitness to be added to and included within said Modoc Forest Reserve"; admits that said section 16 was restored to settlement and entry as alleged, but denies that the order of the secretary of the interior "eliminated said section 16 from said Modoc Reserve or from any national forest, and denies that said section 16 was at any time in said complaint mentioned, or ever, or at all, a part of or included within the exterior boundaries of any National Forest whatever," and denies that said section was ever or at all excluded from said Modoc forest reserve or from any national forest.

At the hearing respondent filed copy of certain official correspondence relating to the subject of the action. From these documents it appears that on November 14, 1912, the Commissioner of the General Land Office wrote to the register and receiver of the Susanville land office, in which attention was called to the filing by the state the indemnity land selection in question "included within the boundaries of a temporary forest withdrawal." The letter proceeds:

"An examination of the records of this office shows that the above-described lands were included in departmental withdrawal of January 5, 1907, for a proposed addition to the Modoc national forest, but were restored to settlement December 26, 1911, and to entry January 25, 1912. These lands having now been eliminated from the forest reserve, there appears no reason which requires or justifies any exchange of lands with the state. The selection in lieu thereof is therefore held for cancellation."

It further appears that transferee Pardee appealed from this decision to the Secretary of the Interior. In his decision, April 6, 1915, the secretary of that department said:

"The appeal contends that the base tracts were at the time of selection and when the selection was completed a portion of unsurveyed section 16 within an established reservation for forest purposes and so was a proper legal and unsatisfied base. This contention is not well founded. Said section 16, within which the land lies, had been withdrawn temporarily with a view to inclusion in a forest reserve, but October 11, 1911, it was restored from said withdrawal never having been in fact included in any established forest reserve. Land temporarily withdrawn and not included in any forest reserve is not proper base for indemnity school selection. State of California, 37 Land Dec. 499. The decision is correct and is affirmed."

Petitioners claim the right to have the state make a reselection of the land originally selected, basing their claim upon the act of May 26, 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1218), section 1 of which reads as follows:

"Section 1. Where the state has made a selection of other land in lieu of a sixteenth or thirty-sixth section within a national forest and such selection has been or may be rejected or held for rejection by the general land office for the stated reason that since the date of such selection the base land has been excluded from such national forest, it shall be the duty of the surveyor general, where the state has sold the selected land and upon application therefor by the holder of the certificate of purchase, to reselect the land on basis of the character of the bases used at the date the original selection was made, whenever such bases are available; provided, that the party applying for such reselection shall pay all of the fees and expenses required under the rules of the United States Land Office."

The position taken by the Interior Department was that, the withdrawal being but temporary, and the land not having as yet been incorporated as part of a forest reserve, and having been, when the case was acted upon, restored to entry, the state could not use it as base for indemnity and hence the selection was disallowed and was on August 3, 1915, canceled. We do not understand that petitioners claim any right arising from the original selection made under Mr. Pardee's application except as it brings them within the class of persons for whose benefit the act of May 26, 1917, was passed. We are thus brought to the question: Was the act intended to apply to selections made in lieu of school land not only situated within the boundaries of a forest reserve, but also to land temporarily withdrawn and for the time added to and forming a part of such reserve? The language of the act is:

"Where the state has made a selection of other land in lieu of a sixteenth or thirty-sixth section within a national forest and such selection has been or may be rejected * * * for the stated reason that since the date of such selection the base land has been excluded from such national forest, it shall be the duty of the surveyor general," etc.

So-called lieu locations are initiated under section 2275 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended February 28, 1891 (chapter 384, 26 Stat. at L. 796; volume 6, Fed. Stat. Ann., p. 462 [U. S. Comp. St. 1916, § 4860]), which, so far as here pertinent, reads as follows:

"Sec. 2275. Where settlements * * * have been made, before the survey of the lands in the field, which are found to have been made on sections 16 or 36, these sections shall be subject to the claims of such settlers; * * * and * * * other lands of equal acreage are hereby appropriated and granted, and may be selected * * * in lieu of such as may be thus taken by pre-emption for homestead settlers. And other lands of equal acreage are also hereby appropriated and granted, and may be selected by said state or territory where sections 16 or 36 are mineral land, or are included within any Indian, Military, or other reservation, or are otherwise disposed of by the United States."

It is the latter part of the section with which we are here concerned, and particularly as to the scope and meaning of the language, "or other reservation, or are otherwise disposed of by the United States." Does this provision authorize the use of sections 16 and 36 (school lands) as base, when withdrawn as the land in question was and attached to a forest reserve, and which, when the selection was made, had not been as yet incorporated in a forest reserve permanently? This question was decided in Alberger v. Kingsbury, 6 Cal. App. 93, 91 Pac. 674, and the decision had the approval of the Supreme Court by denying a petition for hearing in that court. The land in that case was withdrawn for the same purpose and in like manner and was to form part of the same forest reserve as was the land in the present case. The action was to compel defendant to receive and file the plaintiff's application to purchase certain land in lieu of section 16, concededly within the township withdrawn. It was in accordance with the decision in that case, made in July, 1907, that defendant, in 1908, when the Pardee application was made, approved the location. In the Alberger Case the question was very fully and carefully discussed and was well sustained by decisions of the United States Supreme Court. We quote briefly:

> "The words 'other reservations' are evidently used in a broad sense in the statute. The word 'reservation' is defined in the Standard Dictionary as 'that which is reserved, kept back, withheld.' The said sixteenth section, to which the state would be otherwise entitled, has been by the proper authorities of the United States—the Land Department—kept back, withheld, and reserved. It has been reserved with a view to including it in a permanent forest reserve. The state is not now entitled to it because the United States has seen fit to reserve it for its own uses. It is no answer to this to say that the reservation may not be made permanent, and that the state may yet be entitled to the land. That might be said as to any other kind of reservation, for military purposes, for Indians, or any other purpose. A reservation is a reservation, no matter what may be the purpose, nor for how long a time the reservation may continue. The statute does not fix a time during which it shall continue, and we are not at liberty to do so. In our opinion, the question as to time refers only to the time when the state desires to take the land. Can the state take the section in place now? Evidently not, because it has been reserved and withheld from sale. * * * When the reservation exists, no matter how long it may continue, and the state is deprived of the lands in place, it immediately has the right to select and take other lands in lieu of the lands withheld from it. This right continues as long as the withdrawal or reservation continues. We know of no decision or rule of law that requires the state to try the question as to the time the United States may desire to keep the land in reserve." "The term 'reservation,' as used with relation to the public lands, means a withdrawal of a specified portion of the public domain from the administration of the land office and from disposal under the land laws, and the appropriation thereof, for the time being, to some particular use or purpose of the general government." 32 Cyc. 858.

It will be observed that the decision of the interior department was made after the land in question was restored to entry. It was restored in December, 1911, to settlement, and in January, 1912, to entry. It was in November, 1912, that the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in passing upon the Pardee location, wrote to the register and receiver of the Susanville land office, calling their attention to the fact that the land was included within the boundaries of a temporary forest withdrawal, and stating that:

> "Lands were included in departmental withdrawal, of January 5, 1907, for a proposed addition to the Modoc National Forest, but were restored to settlement December 26, 1911, and to entry January 25, 1912. These lands having now been eliminated from the forest reserve, there appears no reason which requires or justifies any exchange of lands with the state."

It was on appeal from this decision that the Secretary of the Interior in 1915 confirmed the ruling of the Land Department. How far the fact that the land was restored to the state before the Interior Department was called upon to decide the Pardee location, we do not know. However, it is fair to assume that the location was, in part at least, canceled because it was the opinion of the Land Department of the government, expressed in the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, that "land temporarily withdrawn and not included in any forest reserve is not proper base for indemnity school selection."

[1, 2] We may well ask what was meant by the Interior Department in its decision when it said, "These lands having now been eliminated from the forest reserve, there appears no reason," etc. How could the lands have been "eliminated from the forest reserve" if they did not form a part of the reserve before being eliminated? Here was a question of law, and not of fact; for no question of fact was involved. The only question before the Land Department was one of construction of the act of Congress on an admitted state of facts. As a question of law, we think the decision in the Alberger Case unassailable and should have been followed in disposing of the Pardee selection; for on a pure question of law the courts are not controlled by departmental rulings.

> "It is urged that this question of title has been determined in the Land Department adversely to the claim of the plaintiff. This is doubtless true, but it was so determined, not upon any question of fact, but upon a construction of the law; and such matter, as we have repeatedly held, is not concluded by the decision of the Land Department. Johnson v. Towsley, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 72, 20 L. Ed. 485; Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 330, 23 L. Ed. 424; Quinby v. Conlan, 104 U. S. 420, 26 L. Ed. 800; Doolan v. Carr, 125 U. S. 618, 624, 8 Sup. Ct. 1228, 31 L. Ed. 844; Lake Superior Ship Canal, R. & I. Co. v. Cunningham, 155 U. S. 354, 15 Sup. Ct. 103, 39 L. Ed. 183." Wisconsin Central v. Forsythe, 159 U. S. 46, 61, 15 Sup. Ct. 1020, 1025, 40 L. Ed. 76.

[3] The question now before us must be dealt with not only in view of the admitted facts, but also in view of the law and the rights of parties under the law. We are to determine the true intent of the remedial statute of 1917 under which petitioners are seeking relief. It may be proper to state that, when these reservations were first authorized in 1891, they were called "forest reserves." Later, in 1907, by act of Congress they were called "national forests," and the latter appellation is the one used in the act of 1917 supra, but both designations refer to the same thing. The Legislature has said by the act of 1917 that, where the state has made a selection of other land in lieu of a sixteenth or thirty-sixth section "within a national forest," and such selection has been rejected "for the stated reason that since the date of such selection the base land has been excluded from such national forest," it shall be the duty of the surveyor general to reselect the land, etc. The Pardee selection was in lieu of part of a sixteenth section; it was finally rejected for the stated reason that since the date of the selection the base land had been excluded from the forest reservation, and it was for that reason the state was not entitled to indemnity. If, therefore, the base land used for the selection was within a national forest, petitioners' right to the reselection sought would seem to be clear. It was held in the Alberger Case that this base land was a part of the reservation, although made so temporarily, and until restored to entry, its legal status was the same as any other land included in the reserve. Bearing in mind that the terms "forest reserve" and "national forest" mean the same thing, what did the Legislature intend when it enacted this law? Did it intend to confine the relief to cases only where school land had been permanently incorporated in a forest reservation and afterwards restored to entry, or did it intend to give relief not only to such cases, but also to cases where the school land had been temporarily attached to and for the time made a part of a reservation or national forest.

Respondent's position is thus stated in his brief:

> "We respectfully contend that the issue really presented is one of fact, viz. was said section 16, T. 46 N., R. 3 E., M. D. B. & M., ever included within or excluded from a national forest? It is to be borne in mind that the right granted by the provisions of chapter 674 of the California Statutes of 1917 is by carefully guarded language restricted to cases wherein 'the base land has been excluded from such national forests.' The act says nothing about 'other reservations,' or 'temporary forest reserves.' It is distinctly and definitely limited in its application to national forests."

It seems to us we are authorized to presume that the Legislature used the terms "national forest" in the sense the court in the Alberger Case regarded them; that the indemnity provided by section 2275 of the Revised Statutes U. S., included such a reservation as is here involved.

We do not think we are compelled to put an interpretation on the terms "national forest" which would restrict their meaning to lands embraced in what respondent is pleased to designate as a permanent reservation, as distinguished from lands embraced in a temporary reservation, which latter, for the time being, are part of such permanent reservation. We have seen that in applying existing statutes the courts make no such distinction. The withdrawal of land for forest purposes is a reservation of such land, and operates as effectively for all purposes of disposition when temporarily withdrawn as when set apart with no present intention to restore it to entry. In point of fact, government reservations of land cannot be said to be permanent in the sense that the land may not at some time be restored to entry. Land set apart as Indian or military reservations has been in various instances restored to public entry. Respondent's construction of the statute assumes that school land in what he speaks of as a permanent national forest may be restored. Otherwise the statute would have no application. No satisfactory reason can be suggested for assuming that the Legislature intended to restrict the right of indemnity to cases where the land restored had been withdrawn from a permanent reservation. No such cases had arisen when the act of 1917 was passed, nor was there any reason for anticipating that they would arise in the near future. But cases had arisen, and presumably were by the Legislature known to exist, where the restored land had been incorporated in a reservation with a view of becoming part of a permanent national forest, and for sufficient reason had been restored to entry. Such land bore the same legal relation to the national forest as did land included in the permanent boundaries, and was equally entitled to the remedial provisions of the act of 1917. There was no reason, therefore, for making any distinction between the two classes of land selected and subsequently restored. We think that when the state made the Pardee selection it used school land as a base which had become for the time, part of and was "within a national forest"; that, when the Legislature used the language "within a national forest," it intended to refer to all school land which had been used as base for lieu selection, which had been withdrawn by the Land Department for forest reservation purposes, and where such selection, as in this case, has been rejected by the General Land Office for the stated reason that since the date of such selection the base land has been excluded from forest reservation uses.

[4] Respondent advances the point that the writ should be denied because, if issued, it would be an idle act, and this for the reason that, should the writ be granted, and should the respondent comply therewith, the reselection would be rejected when it reached the Land Department at Washington If petitioners have the clear right to the reselection, as we think they have, under the act of 1917 we may not assume that the Secretary of the Interior will arbitrarily interfere with its consummation. The Land Department has held both ways, as we understand, during different administrations, on the very question here involved. That Department may not, should the question again be presented, hold to its more recent ruling. At any rate, our duty is to announce the law of the case and leave the consequences to take care of themselves. We cannot deny the relief sought on the assumption that it would be an idle act.

Our conclusion is that the writ should be granted; and it is so ordered.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

BATT v. STEDMAN. (Civ. 1793.)

1. Mines and Minerals 🔑19(1)—Location Notice—Statute.

Civ. Code, § 1426, providing that one may locate a lode claim by posting a notice of location at the "point of discovery," must be complied with.

2. Mines and Minerals 🔑38(15) — Location Notice—Place of Posting.

Although plaintiff testified that he posted notice of location within 75 feet of the "point of discovery," where immediately following such testimony he stated that he put the notice on the lode, where the quartz showed, a finding that the notice was posted at the "point of discovery," as required by Civ. Code, § 1426, was warranted.

3. Mines and Minerals 🔑38(24)—Action to Quiet Title — Title of Plaintiff — Finding.

In action to quiet title to lode claim, where plaintiff's right of possession and ownership was not dependent upon a prescriptive title, it was sufficient to find that at the commencement of the action plaintiff was the owner and entitled to possession, so that the portion of the finding as to possession and ownership "for more than five years prior" to commencement of action could be regarded as surplusage.

4. Mines and Minerals 🔑38(19) — Lode Location—Sufficiency.

In action to quiet title to a lode claim, held, under the evidence, that, though markings on the ground were not exactly where they should be, they were sufficient, when taken with the amended location, to identify the land claimed with reasonable certainty.

5. Mines and Minerals 🔑19(1)—Location Notices—Construction.

Location notices should be liberally construed, and in determining the sufficiency of a location notice the most important guide is the purpose of the notice, which is to identify the land claimed with reasonable certainty.

6. Mines and Minerals 🔑38(19) — Location Certificates—Sufficiency.

Testimony as to finding stone monuments on boundaries of lode claim and reference to such monuments in amended location certificate, held to satisfy Civ. Code, § 1426, requiring a description of the claim by reference to some natural object.

7. Evidence 🔑379—Surveyor's Map—Correctness.

In suit to quiet title to mining claims, correctness of surveyor's map purporting to show area in conflict between the locations of plaintiff and defendant, held sufficiently established by the evidence.

8. Mines and Minerals 🔑17(1)—Place of Location—Validity.

Where plaintiff when he located placer claim made a discovery of gold therein, and since has mined the claim and done the assessment work every year, it must be held that the land was valuable for placer mining.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by August J. Batt against Francis M. Stedman. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. W. Molkenbuhr, of San Francisco, for appellant. W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

HART, J. As respondent states that appellant, in his brief, has substantially stated the case, we adopt appellant's statement, as follows:

"This is an action to quiet title, pursuant to section 2326, Revised Statutes of the United States [U. S. Comp. St. 1916, § 4623], brought upon adverse claims of respondent on the Samson lode and Annex placer locations to appellant's application for United States patent on the Mammoth lode claim. After trial, without a jury, the court rendered judgment in favor of respondent, awarding to him certain areas in conflict with appellant's claim. Appellant, nevertheless, was awarded (upon his cross-complaint) the possession of a small fraction of the Mammoth location. Appellant moved for a new trial, which motion was denied. An appeal was thereafter taken from the judgment.

"Respondent's initial and sole location of the Annex placer claim was made January 1, 1909. Respondent's first attempted location of the Samson lode claim was made January 1, 1911; an alleged amended location followed on August 26, 1911. A third location was made, but it was contended during the trial that it was made pursuant to advice and instructions of respondent's counsel; the latter testifying that had he known of the existence of the second location of August 26, 1911, he would not have advised respondent to relocate; that his advice was given because a certificate of the searcher failed to report the second location.

"Appellant located the Mammoth lode claim on July 15, 1912; an amended location, preparatory to application for patent and subsequent to a survey, was made August 27, 1914. Respondent's Samson location was claimed to have been made upon a vein running easterly and westerly; appellant's location was upon a vein having a northerly and southerly course.

"Upon motion for a new trial, appellant urged, and upon this appeal urges, that the judgment be reversed because certain indispensable findings in favor of respondent are not supported by the evidence."

1. Appellant contends that finding No. 1 is not supported by the evidence. Said finding is:

"At the date of the commencement of this action plaintiff was, and for more than five years prior and up to said date had been, ever since has been, and now is, the owner in fee, in the actual possession and entitled to the possession of" two parcels of land, described by metes and bounds.

[1, 2] Appellant makes the point that the location notice of the Samson lode claim was not posted at the point of discovery, as required by section 1426, Civil Code. The claim is that the evidence shows it to have been posted at a point 75 feet from the discovery.

There can be no question that the requirement of the Code must be complied with. Said section 1426 is almost identical in language with section 3610 of the Political Code of Montana, under which latter section it has been held that the posting of a notice of location 60 feet from the point of discovery did not comply with the provisions of the section. Butte Northern Copper Co. v. Radmilovich, 101 Pac. 1078.

Appellant calls attention to the following testimony of the plaintiff:

"Mr. Carlin: Q. You made a discovery of gold on the lode? A. Yes, sir. After I made that discovery I filed on the claim. I posted the notice. Q. Where? A. On the lode.

"The Court: Where, with relation to the point of discovery? A. Within probably 75 feet of the point of discovery."

Immediately following said testimony is this question and answer:

"Mr. Carlin: Tell the court how you posted that notice, and what you did in posting it. A. In the first place, I dumped out some rock and found there was gold on it, and I went on and made out the papers and put up a post; nailed a box on it; put the notice in it and put it on the lode and surrounded it by a monument of rock right where the quartz shows—where the lode shows."

It is quite evident that the trial court must have considered the witness' statement that he posted the notice "within probably 75 feet of the point of discovery" as a slip of the tongue or, perhaps, made through a misapprehension of the question asked him, and that the finding was based on the last answer above quoted, which showed there had been a compliance with the requirements of the section as to posting. Therefore the rule that the legal right to possession of mining claims can only come from a valid location (Horswell v. Ruiz et al., 67 Cal. 111, 7 Pac. 197) is satisfied in this case.

[3] That portion of said finding No. 1 which declares that plaintiff, "for more than five years prior" to the commencement of the action, had been the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of the Samson lode claim, is criticized as being erroneous for the reason that respondent's first location was made on January 1, 1911, and the complaint was filed December 23, 1914, a period of less than four years. As seen, the finding described two parcels of land by metes and bounds. It is conceded that the description of one of these parcels covered the Samson claim and the other the Annex. The Annex claim having been located January 1, 1909, the finding, so far as that parcel was concerned, was true, more than five years having elapsed between the date of the location and the filing of the complaint, while it would seem that it was not true as to the Samson claim. As stated by appellant, the action is brought upon adverse claims by respondent to appellant's application for patent. Plaintiff's right of ownership and possession is in no way dependent upon a prescriptive title, and the words, "for more than five years prior" in the finding, so far as referring to the Samson claim, may be disregarded as surplusage. Doherty v. Cal. Nav., etc., Co., 6 Cal. App. 131, 91 Pac. 419; Risdon v. Steyner, 9 Cal. App. 344, 99 Pac. 377. It was sufficient to find that, at the commencement of the action, plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of said mining claims.

[4] It is next contended that the Samson lode location was not distinctly marked on the ground. The plaintiff testified as follows:

"I stepped from the point where I put the [location] notice 300 feet in a southerly direction, crosswise from the lode. * * * Q. What did you place when you went over the 300 feet? A. Put a monument there of 4x4, about 3 feet high, between 3 and 4 feet, and placed it there and surrounded it by rocks. From this monument I went in an easterly direction 750 feet, and also put there a 4x4, and placed a rock around it—a similar monument. Then I went 300 feet in a northerly direction, and placed another monument there. That brought me about in the center line of the claim on the lode. Then I went 300 feet in a northerly direction and placed another similar monument there, just the same. Then I went 750 feet easterly, and I placed a similar monument there. Then I went on 750 feet more, and I placed another similar monument. The monuments were all similar, except as to markings. Then I went in a southerly direction 300 feet, and placed a similar monument there. That took me to about the center of the lode. Then I went 300 feet more, southerly, and placed another monument. Then I went 750 feet in an eastern direction to the point of beginning, you might call it, on the side line. There were markings on the monuments or stakes, which said the 'Samson Mining Claim,' and gave the description of the corners. For instance, the northeast corner was marked 'NE' and so on. I don't think I marked the stake in the center on the south side line. Q. When you got through there, state how your claim was marked on the ground. A. So any one could see it; plain."

The above description is meaningless, considered as the description of a lode mining claim. The first stake south of the discovery and the last one named would be 3,000 feet apart, and the lines would not entirely inclose any land. But it will be observed that if the word "easterly," which we have underscored in the above description, were to be read "westerly," a parallelogram would be described having the prescribed dimensions of a lode mining claim, to wit, 1,500 in length and 600 feet in width. That the claim was in fact so marked would appear from the testimony of R. A. Grass, who signed as a witness the notice of location of the Samson claim made on January 1, 1911. He testified:

"I was there when Batt put up the stakes. We put up the notice and then Mr. Batt put up the corners and the side stakes. The notice was put up about the center of the claim, east and west. I ascertained the existence of the lode that was there; it ran east and west. It may vary a few degrees; it may be a little north of west. There was an outcrop in the ground which you could follow. The claim was located on that lode and 300 feet on each side thereof. The claim was 1,500 feet in length. The corners and sides were marked with stakes. Mr. Batt and his son put the stakes up and I went to see. He told me to see whether those stakes were up—they were all up, the corners or end and side line stakes; they might not have been in a straight line because we did not have any surveying instruments. There were stone monuments around all of the stakes. After we got through marking the claim, there was nothing to prevent any person going on there and seeing the boundaries of the claim. It was in plain sight; any one could see the monuments."

In the amended location certificate, dated August 26, 1911, the boundaries of the Samson claim are described as follows:

> "Beginning at a monument of stones placed on center of said ledge or lode, thence 300 feet southerly to monument of stones placed on south boundary line, thence westerly 750 feet to a monument of stones placed on southwest corner, thence northerly 600 feet to a monument of stones placed on the northwest corner, thence easterly 1,500 feet and parallel with said vein to a monument of stones placed on the northeast corner, thence southerly 600 feet to a monument of stones placed on the southeasterly corner, thence westerly 750 feet to monument of stones and place of beginning."

J. C. Reaves, a deputy United States mineral surveyor, testified that he surveyed the Samson and Annex claims in November, 1914; that he had with him a copy of the amended location certificate of the Samson lode; and that Mr. Batt pointed out to him location stakes and monuments. At the northwest corner he found a 4x4 pine post in a mound of stone; the post was marked "Samson NWcor." At the southwest corner he found a 4x4 post in a mound of stones. At a point on the south side line he found a mound of stone, but no stake, and he also found a stake in a mound of stone at the east end of the lode line. A post was standing with the remains of a box "in which the location notice was said to have been posted; that post and the box on it faced an outcrop of quartz near a tunnel." The witness said he found no evidence on the southeast corner, on the southwest corner, or on the corner on the north side line, and he stated that "the southeast corner fell in the burned portion of Forbestown, that had burned probably since the posts were set." The witness described the courses and distances he ran, which differed in more or less degree from the calls in the amended location certificate and from the claim as delineated by the remaining monuments. We are not inclined to detail his testimony at length.

[5] "Location notices should be liberally construed, having reference to the circumstances under which, and the character of the parties by which, they are generally made; and in determining the sufficiency of a location notice, the most important guide is the purpose of the notice, which is to identify the land claimed with reasonable certainty." Green v. Gavin, 10 Cal. App. 330, 101 Pac. 931. In Talmadge v. St. John, 129 Cal. 430, 62 Pac. 79, it is held that "the proceedings of miners in the location of mining claims are to be regarded with indulgence, and their notices of location are to be liberally construed." It is true that the surveyor drew in some of the lines as they were marked on the ground in order to bring the boundaries of the claim within the limits prescribed by law. In Lindley on Mines, § 396, citing Doe v. Sanger, 83 Cal. 203, 23 Pac. 365, it is said, "For the purpose of obtaining parallelism, or casting off excess, the lines may be drawn in." We hold that, while the markings on the ground were not exactly where they should be, they were sufficient, taken with the amended location certificate, "to identify the land claimed with reasonable certainty."

[6] Section 1426 of the Civil Code requires "a description of the claim by reference to some natural object, or permanent monument, as will identify the claim located." It is the contention of appellant that the Samson location certificates do not show a compliance with that requirement. It is held in Talmadge v. St. John, supra, that "a reference to permanent posts or stone monuments erected on the exterior boundaries is sufficient." The testimony of the witness, Reaves, as to his finding stone monuments on the exterior boundaries of the claim, and the reference in the amended location certificate thereto, satisfy the requirement of the Code section in this respect.

[7] Appellant contends that a map made by the surveyor and appearing in the transcript, which purports to show the area in conflict between the locations of plaintiff and defendant, is without support in the evidence. As we have seen, the surveyor testified that he found four fixed monuments, on certain corners and one side line of the claim, and with one boundary line fixed the remaining three could easily be established. The witness testified:

> "I established no point; I simply extended the original, the mound pointed out to me by Mr. Batt, being the locator, and pointed out to me that he located to be the original location monument. In surveying, I considered both the data on the ground, as well as that given in the notice of location."

We think the correctness of the map is sufficiently established by the evidence.

As to the contention of appellant that the location as established by the surveyor is excessive, it appears from the map that the claim does not form a perfect parallelogram. From the northwest and the southwest corners the respective lines run to the north and south center side stakes on a course S. 42° 08′ E., and from the latter points to the northeast and southeast corners on a course S. 68° 28′ E. As a consequence of the angles thus shown, the west end line is 627 feet and the east end line is 608 feet in length. But the surveyor testified that the distance "would be 600 feet at right angles." So as to the distance from the point of location to the original mound in the center of the south side line, which appellant asserts exceeds 370 feet. We have the testimony of the surveyor that he surveyed a claim 600 by 1,500 feet.

[8] We cannot hold with appellant in his claim that the Annex placer location is void because respondent failed to show that the land was valuable for placer mining. In Garibaldi v. Grillo, 17 Cal. App. 540, 120 Pac. 425, we held:

"Where minerals have been found, and the evidence is of such a character that a person of ordinary prudence would be justified in the further expenditure of his labor and means, with a reasonable prospect of success in developing a valuable mine, the requirements of the statute have been met."

Plaintiff testified that when he located the placer claim on January 1, 1909, he made a discovery of gold therein; that he panned and found there was some gold on the claim; that he has mined the claim more or less every year—"placer mining, washing the earth." He stated that he had kept no record of how much gold he had taken out; that he mined with water, using sluice boxes and ground sluices. He has done the assessment work each year since locating the claim. Under these circumstances, it must be held that the land was valuable for placer mining.

Other points made by appellant we do not consider necessary particularly to notice. This seems to be a case where a miner, in good faith, located mining claims on unoccupied public domain of the United States. At the time of the commencement of the action he had been in possession of one claim for almost six years, and of the other for nearly four years. The annual assessment work had been done by him on both claims. Gold had been found in both, and a tunnel 212 feet in length had been run on the lode claim.

We think the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

McNEELY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (Civ. 2539.)

1. JUDGMENT ⚷98, 241 — JOINT TORT-FEASORS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 579, providing that in an action against several defendants the court may, in its discretion, render judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others whenever a several judgment is proper, where two joint tort-feasors are sued and one of them suffers default, a judgment may be taken against him and the action proceeded with against the other and a separate judgment rendered against him.

2. MANDAMUS ⚷31—COMPELLING TRIAL OF CASE—DISCRETION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 579, where in an action against two joint tort-feasors one suffered a default and judgment was entered against him, the court had no discretion, although default had been set aside and appeal from order setting aside was pending, to determine whether the trial should proceed as to the other defendant, and writ of mandate will lie to compel judge to try action.

Original application for a writ of mandate by Robert McNeely against the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Charles Wellborn, Judge thereof. Peremptory writ issued.

W. A. Alderson, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. G. F. McCulloch, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. This proceeding concerns a certain action in which the petitioner, as plaintiff, sued one Connell and one Hill for damages as joint tort-feasors. Hill appeared in the action and made answer to the complaint, but the default of Connell was taken, whereupon the petitioner elected to proceed against the latter under the default, and judgment in the sum of $1,500 was entered against him. Connell then came forward, and presented a motion to set aside the default, and the motion was granted. The petitioner appealed from the order thus made, and the appeal is now pending. The action was set down for trial against Hill, but, at the time set, the respondent refused to proceed with the hearing. The petitioner then filed in this court his application for a writ of mandate, requiring the respondent to try the action as to Hill, and an alternative writ was issued.

[1] It is contended that the petitioner is entitled to the writ under the terms of section 579 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads:

> "In an action against several defendants, the court may, in its discretion, render judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others, whenever a several judgment is proper."

The respondent contends, however, that, in an action against several joint tort-feasors, a several judgment is not proper, and cites McCool v. Mahoney, 54 Cal. 491, and Marriott v. Williams, 152 Cal. 705, 711, 93 Pac. 875. These cases decide that where an action is tried against joint tort-feasors, only one judgment may be pronounced against them all; but a later case has announced the rule that where, as in the action now in question, two joint tort-feasors are sued and one of them suffers default, then a judgment may be taken against him and the action be proceeded with against the other and a separate judgment be rendered against him. Cole v. Roebling Construction Co., 156 Cal. 443, 105 Pac. 255.

[2] It is insisted that, after judgment had been rendered against Connell, it was left to the discretion of the respondent to determine whether a trial should proceed as to Hill, and the well-known rule is invoked that the writ of mandate will not run to control judicial discretion. Under section 579 the court did have a discretion to determine whether a judgment should be rendered against Connell in advance of a trial against Hill. Further than that there was no discretion reposed in the court. Under the latter part of the section the petitioner has the right to press the action for trial, and it is the duty of the respondent to try it.

A peremptory writ of mandate will issue as prayed for.

MARCONI WIRELESS TELEGRAPH CO. OF AMERICA v. NORTH PACIFIC S. S. CO. (Civ. 2305.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. April 2, 1918.)

1. Damages 🔑189—Breach of Contract—Prima Facie Case — Damages to Unpaid Price.

In an action for breach of contract whereby plaintiff was to install wireless equipment on defendant's steamer, keep it in repair, and furnish and pay a competent operator, it being obvious that plaintiff would be put to expense in performing, its mere introduction of the contract and showing of breach did not make a prima facie case of damages to the extent of the unpaid contract price; the burden being upon plaintiff to prove the profits it would have made had defendant complied with its contract and paid for the services.

2. Telegraphs and Telephones 🔑33(1) — Filing of Rates — Furnishing Wireless Service.

Public Utilities Act (St. 1911 [Ex. Sess.] p. 18) § 18, requiring, under penalty imposed by section 76, every telegraph corporation to print and file with the Railroad Commission a schedule showing the charges for the transmission of messages, does not include the kind of service performed by a wireless company in installing apparatus on a steamship and furnishing an operator therefor.

3. Telegraphs and Telephones 🔑33(1) — Failure to File Charges—Illegality of Contract—Statute.

Even if Public Utilities Act, § 18, requiring every telegraph corporation to print and file with the Railroad Commission a schedule of charges for the transmission of messages, includes the service furnished by a wireless company in installing apparatus on a steamship and supplying an operator, it does not render a contract for such service unlawful or void, where the wireless company has not complied with the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company of America, a corporation, against the North Pacific Steamship Company, a corporation. From the judgment for plaintiff, both parties appeal. Affirmed on each appeal.

Samuel Knight and F. E. Boland, both of San Francisco, for plaintiff. Marcel E. Cerf and Charles H. Sooy, both of San Francisco, for defendant.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action wherein plaintiff seeks to recover from the defendant certain sums of money claimed to be due it for the installation and operation of certain wireless equipment on vessels in the possession of the defendant, under two written contracts. The complaint is in two counts. The first count is based on a contract dated January 15, 1914, and the second upon a contract dated July 1, 1913. Judgment went for the plaintiff on the first count for the sum of $1, and on the second count for the sum of $1,620. Both parties being dissatisfied with the judgment have appealed therefrom, plaintiff from that part thereof which awards to it only nominal damages, and defendant from the portion thereof by which plaintiff recovers the sum of $1,620.

Considering plaintiff's appeal first, it is disclosed by the record that in the month of January, 1914, the parties entered into the first of the above-mentioned contracts, whereby it was agreed that the plaintiff would install wireless equipment in a certain steamship in the possession of the defendant under a charter, and would provide and pay a competent operator, for which services defendant agreed to pay to plaintiff $100 per month, and the contract was to continue for one year. Under this contract the plaintiff installed wireless equipment on said vessel and furnished a competent operator, and defendant paid to plaintiff the sum of $100 per month up to March 31, 1914, when it discontinued such payments. On the 7th day of April, 1914, the charter under which the defendant held the vessel was canceled and the ship was taken over by the owner, whereupon the defendant sought to cancel the contract, but plaintiff refused to permit it to do so, and after the period covered by the contract had elapsed brought this action.

There is no dispute between the parties as to the measure of damages applicable to the case if the plaintiff is entitled to any damages at all. If we understand the contentions of the parties the damages recoverable by the plaintiff consist of the profit which would have resulted to it if it had been permitted to carry out its contract, plus any costs and expenses incurred as a consequence of the breach. McConnell v. Corona, 149 Cal. 60, 65, 85 Pac. 929, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1171; Civ. Code, § 1512; Ahlers v. Smiley, 163 Cal. 200, 205, 124 Pac. 827; 13 Cyc. 156. The question upon which counsel disagree is as to where lies the burden of proof, plaintiff's contention in that behalf being that the payments required by the contract furnish prima facie the measure of damages, and that the burden of proof was on the defendant to show, if it could, that such were not the actual damages. Applying this principle, it is pointed out by plaintiff that upon the submission of the case, it having shown the facts as above narrated, and the defendant having shown nothing in mitigation of damages, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for $900.

There is a class of cases in which if the obligor to the contract repudiates it before the obligee has had an opportunity to perform, the contract price is prima facie the measure of damages, and matters of mitigation and reduction must be shown by the obligor. Such are cases of contracts for personal services (Milage v. Woodward, 186 N. Y. 252, 78 N. E. 873, Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362, 371, 19 Am. Rep. 285), contracts to pay an attorney's fee (Reynolds v. Clark County, 162 Mo. 680, 63 S. W. 382), or an architect's commission (Walker v. Lundstrom, 132 Mo. App. 367, 112 S. W. 1), and the commissions of a real estate broker (Alderson v. Houston, 154 Cal. 1, 96 Pac. 884; Norman v. Vandenberg, 157 Mo. App. 488, 138 S. W. 47), or contracts for the publication of advertisements (Star Publishing Co. v. Knosher & Co., 62 Wash. 215, 113 Pac. 569, 34 L. R. A. [N. S.] 404, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 281; McDermott v. De Meridor Co., 80 N. J. Law, 67, 76 Atl. 331; Ware Bros. Co. v. Cortland Cart & C. Co., 192 N. Y. 439, 85 N. E. 666, 22 L. R. A. [N. S.] 272, 127 Am. St. Rep. 914).

In the last-mentioned case an advertiser desired to cancel its contract with a publisher under which the latter was to publish an advertisement once a month for 12 months for a certain sum to be paid when the contract was fully performed. The publisher refused to consent to the cancellation and continued the publication for the entire period, and upon the advertiser declining to pay therefor brought an action for the contract price. Upon the trial the plaintiff proved the contract and its performance, and rested. Thereupon the defendant produced evidence to the effect that it had canceled the contract, and rested. It was held that the contract was prima facie the measure of damages, and the rule applied that where a contract for future employment had been entered into and afterwards revoked by the employer, in an action for breach of contract the damages are prima facie the amount of wages for the full term, and the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show facts in mitigation of damages. Commenting upon the conclusion arrived at in that case the court said:

> "In reaching the result above indicated, we wish it understood that it is not our purpose to extend the rule beyond the facts found in this case. Nor is it our purpose to limit or impair the rule that, in the breach of an ordinary contract for the manufacture of an article or the supplying of goods or merchandise, including that which is known as ordinary job printing, the damage is the difference between the contract price and the cost of the goods, merchandise, or manufactured article, in which the burden of showing the damages rests on the plaintiff. The distinguishing feature in this case, as we regard it, is that the publishing of an advertisement in a periodical is the same as the publishing in a daily or weekly newspaper, which involves the investment of no additional capital or the use of any material other than the ink used and the paper upon which it is printed, and these articles are of such trivial value as not in our judgment to change the character of the contract from one for services to be rendered."

[1] While the present case in some of its features is similar to the cases cited, it is more like an action for breach of contract for board or lodging (13 Cyc. 163), or for goods sold and delivered (Hellings v. Heydenfeldt, 107 Cal. 577, 585, 40 Pac. 1026; Winans v. S. L. Co., 66 Cal. 61, 4 Pac. 952), or to construct a tunnel (McConnell v. Corona City W. Co., 149 Cal. 60, 85 Pac. 929, 8 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1171), or a contract to furnish freight (Utter et al. v. Chapman, 43 Cal. 279), in which cases actual damages only are recoverable; and the burden of showing such damages rests on the plaintiff. Here the plaintiff was to install wireless equipment and keep it in repair, and to furnish and pay a competent operator. It is obvious that plaintiff would be put to more than trivial expense in performing its part of the contract, and that its profit would be substantially less than the contract price. Hence, we think it cannot be held that the mere introduction of the contract, and showing the breach thereof, made out a prima facie case of damages for the unpaid contract price. It may not be amiss to add that the fact that the proof of the profit which plaintiff would have made if the defendant had complied with its contract was chiefly, if not entirely, within the control of the former, furnishes a strong reason for placing that burden upon it. We think it follows that the trial court correctly concluded upon the showing made that the plaintiff was entitled to no more than nominal damages.

We will now consider defendant's appeal. In its answer it alleged, as it now contends, that the contracts here sued upon are void because the plaintiff failed to file with the Railroad Commission of this state a schedule of rates for the transmission of messages between points within and without the state under the provisions of section 18 of the Public Utilities Act. The trial court rejected this contention and rendered judgment for plaintiff to $1,620 under the second count, as before stated. From a stipulation of facts entered into by the parties it appears that the plaintiff is engaged in the business of fabricating, leasing, renting, and selling wireless equipment and also in the business of transmitting messages thereby; that it rents such equipment to shipowners under contracts similar to those here involved; that it has shore stations so equipped; that it transmits messages from and to ships equipped with its apparatus for hire for any one other than the shipowners; that such messages are transmitted without charge to the shipowner; and that no messages are transmitted from one station to another in California. It also appears from the stipulation of facts that the contract which is now being discussed, made July 1, 1913, like the first contract considered, provided that the plaintiff was to install on certain steamships in the possession of the defendant wireless equipment, and to furnish and pay competent operators, for which service it was to receive a specified sum per month for a certain length of time, and that there became due to plaintiff under such contract the sum of $1,620.

The Legislature of this state declared (Stats. 1911, p. 18 et seq., § 18, p. 30) that upon the Public Utilities Act becoming effective every telegraph, including wireless, corporation (section 2) should print and file with the Railroad Commission a schedule showing the charges for the transmission of messages between all points within this state and all points without the state upon its route, and between all points within the state and all points without the state upon every route operated or controlled by it (section 18); and the Legislature further declared that every telegraph, including wireless, corporation which should violate or fail to comply with any provision of the act should be subject to a penalty for each offense (section 76), and that every officer of such corporation who should violate or fail to comply with any provision of the act should be guilty of a misdemeanor (section 77).

Assuming, without deciding, that the plaintiff is within the category of section 18 of this act, and that the company would be subject to the penalties therein provided, and its officers guilty of misdemeanors, for noncompliance with the provisions of the act, still we think this contract is not void, as contended by the defendant, so as to prevent recovery upon it. Section 18 of the act does not undertake to make unlawful the transaction of business if the required schedule of rates shall not have been filed. Nor is this a case where a member of the public desiring to send a message is without the benefit that the filing of the company's rates would give him. It is a case of a contract for a special service at an agreed price, arrived at by negotiation between the parties. The contract provides, among other things, that the plaintiff will send from and receive on board the defendant's ships through its coast stations in the United States, or between any ships equipped with plaintiff's system, messages unlimited in number relating to the defendant's business, for which the defendant pays a fixed sum, and furnishes certain accommodation for the operators and the equipment, nor would the fact that the plaintiff exacts the same price from other shipowners for similar service bring this contract within the purview of the act in question. We think this case comes within the principle applied in Luchini v. Roux et al., 29 Cal. App. 755, 157 Pac. 554, in which the plaintiff sought to recover from the defendants the agreed price of a quantity of milk sold and delivered to them. The defense set up was that the contract was void because the plaintiff, a dairyman, had failed to comply with sections 6 and 16 of the so-called Dairy Act, requiring those engaged in the dairy business to register as provided by the act. This court held that while the act imposed a penalty upon a dairyman who neglected to comply with its provisions as to registration, such failure did not render unlawful a contract made for the sale of milk produced in his dairy.

[2, 3] So here, even if section 18 of the Public Utilities Act in its requirement for the filing of schedules of rates included the kind of service involved in this case—and we do not think it does—it does not render unlawful or void a contract for such service. The penalty imposed by section 76 of said act is aimed directly at the failure to file the schedule of rates, and not at the act of transmitting business without having filed such schedule; nor is there anywhere in the act any inhibition against transacting business before compliance with such requirement. The situation here is entirely dissimilar from that where a license is required for the conducting of business and its prohibition in the absence of such license. There the sanction of the statute is directed to the act of doing business, while in the case a bar the penalty relates to a matter that is merely incidental and collateral to the business operations of the plaintiff corporation.

It results from what we have said that as to each appeal the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

HOPKINS v. FRESNO COUNTY ABSTRACT CO. (Civ. 2291.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. April 6, 1918. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court June 3, 1918.)

1. Abstracts of Title ⟹3—Liability for Improper Delivery of Check.

Where a person willing to make a loan on certain property gives an abstract company a check for amount of loan to be given to payee in return for a mortgage and note "when title vested in" payee, abstract company agreed to hold check until title vested absolutely in payee, and not merely until he became owner of record.

2. Pleading ⟹120(1)—Answer—Denials.

An abstract company sued for wrongful delivery of check, deposited to be delivered to payee when title to certain property vested in payee, does not deny plaintiff's allegation that title never vested in payee by alleging that it did not deliver check until title was "vested of record" in payee, and that payee had "apparent record title."

3. Abstracts of Title ⟹3—Wrongful Delivery of Check.

Where a check was deposited with an abstract company for delivery to payee, in return for a note and mortgage, when title to the property vested in payee, the company, by delivering the check before title vested in payee, is liable to maker of check for amount thereof, although prior to delivery company had filed, without ascertaining if genuine, two forged deeds given it by payee, and naming him as grantee, the filing of which made him apparent owner of record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by E. L. Hopkins against the Fresno County Abstract Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Cory, of Fresno, for appellant. Geo. Cosgrave and L. B. Hayhurst, both of Fresno, for respondent.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. This is an action in which plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendant for $1,980 as damages for the breach of a contract. The defendant, as its name indicates, is engaged in the business of abstracting and certifying the titles of real property. On the 18th of November, 1915, the plaintiff with one Gustav Weber visited the defendant's office in Fresno, and Weber delivered to the defendant a certificate of title covering the north half of lots 16 and 17 of the Riverside Colony theretofore issued by defendant, showing one John Bartsch to be the owner of the property. Weber also delivered to the defendant two deeds which, if they were genuine, would have made title in Weber himself, and also a note for $2,000 and a mortgage on the property to secure the payment of the same, and the plaintiff at this time delivered to defendant a check in favor of Weber drawn by plaintiff for the sum of $1,980. Thereupon the plaintiff told the defendant's agent with whom he was dealing that he wished to make a loan on the property for $2,000, and either Weber or the plaintiff indicated that they wished the defendant to attend to seeing that the title of Weber was good and to the closing of the deal. Thereupon defendant's said agent, Mr. Acuff, had the plaintiff sign an agreement the material portion of which is as follows:

"I hand you herewith $1,980 in check which you are to pay for a note and mortgage of $2,000 in favor of E. L. Hopkins to the following described property and to lots 16 and 17 of Riverside Colony when title is vested in Gustav Weber."

And then followed certain exceptions not material here.

The plaintiff's complaint stripped of matters not necessary to be considered here alleged that the respondent had agreed to loan Weber the sum of $2,000 upon the real property described in the complaint, and to take as security therefor a first mortgage upon the land when title to said real property was vested in said Weber. It then alleged the making of the agreement, and that the defendant delivered the check to Weber, and further that the title to the property never vested in Weber, and that he never had any interest in or to the property, that the check had been cashed, and that the plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $1,980 thereby.

The defendant filed an answer to this complaint in two counts. In the first count it denied that it had failed or neglected to perform the contract, and denied that "it ever delivered to said Gustav Weber the check of the plaintiff before the title to the real property therein described was vested of record in said Gustav Weber, but alleged in that behalf that before said check was delivered to said Gustav Weber the apparent record title to the property therein described was vested in said Weber.

As a second defense the defendant averred that the two deeds delivered by Weber to it on the occasion of the making of the contract were forgeries, but that they were properly acknowledged and certified before one Percy Wills, who it is alleged purported to be a notary public of Fresno county; that his notarial seal was affixed, and in effect that they had depended upon these deeds as genuine, had recorded them, and in reliance upon them as passing title to Weber had delivered the check to him.

The course taken by the trial of this case was interesting. The defendant in the second count of its answer, as has been seen, alleged that the deeds delivered to it by Weber were forgeries. On the trial the plaintiff relying evidently upon this allegation as an admission of the fact, proved the making of the contract, the circumstances surrounding the same, and the delivery of the check to Weber, and rested. The defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to establish the allegations of the complaint, suggesting that the court could take the motion under advisement, as he had further evidence to offer on the defendant's side of the case. Thereupon he called Mr. Acuff and placed in evidence certain papers not material to be described in the view we take of this case, and the deeds and other papers delivered by Weber and Hopkins at the time the contract was made; showed that these deeds had been recorded, and rested its case.

This is all the evidence in the case necessary to understand the points made on this appeal.

The defendant's counsel at the trial, after plaintiff had rested, stated that he did not stand upon the second count of its answer, namely, the count alleging that the deeds were forgeries; and now contends that on the face of the record as made the title to the lots appeared to have vested in Weber, and that the deeds must be taken at their face value, there being no evidence in the record that they were forgeries.

[1, 2] In the view we take of the case it was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove that these deeds were forgeries. Even if it be conceded that the direct allegations that they were forgeries in the second count of the defendant's answer are to be disregarded, the first count of the defendant's answer on which it rested its case fails to deny the allegation of the complaint that the title to this property never vested in Weber. The defendant's contract, which its agent prepared, provided that it should not deliver this check to Weber until the title to this property vested in him. If it intended—as it now contends—to contract only that it would be responsible for the record title it should have made its contract so read. It contracted absolutely to hold this check until the title vested in Weber. The reply to the allegation of the complaint that the title never did so vest is that the defendant did not deliver the check until the title to this real property was vested of record in Gustav Weber. If this were a slip of the tongue or pen it might be considered a denial of the allegation referred to; but the denial was couched in these terms deliberately, as is apparent from the clause of the answer immediately following this denial, which reads that before the check was delivered to Weber the "apparent record title" to the property was vested in Weber. Taken together, these statements of the answer constitute no denial of the point blank allegation of the complaint that the title never vested in Weber.

There is little excuse for the failure of the defendant in this case to discover that these deeds were forgeries. The notarial certificate purported to be that of Percy Wills, who was described as a notary public in and for the county of Fresno; and had the abstract company taken the trouble to examine the records of the county clerk's office of Fresno county, it would have ascertained that Wills was not a notary, and this would have led to the disclosure that the instruments recorded were not authentic.

[3] The purpose of Hopkins in delivering these papers to the abstract company was to be assured that the title of Weber, who was to mortgage the property to him, was good. The abstract company contracted to see that it was a valid title. It failed to do this, and was therefore liable to the plaintiff for its breach of the contract.

The judgment is affirmed.

CRIMINAL LAW ⟹1130(4)—APPEAL—FAILURE TO APPEAR OR FILE BRIEF—DISPOSAL.

Where the transcripts were filed November 13th, and briefs have not been filed, nor time for filing extended, and the case was placed on the April calendar, at which time there was no appearance for accused, the Attorney General may have the case submitted on the record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Adolph Lyons was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Martin I. Welsh and Ralph H. Lewis, both of Sacramento, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Defendant appealed to this court from the judgment of the superior court of the county of Sacramento under which he was sentenced to serve a term in state's prison, having previously been convicted by a jury of the crime of grand larceny.

The clerk's transcript and the reporter's transcript were filed in this court on the 13th day of November, 1917. No briefs have been filed, and the time for the filing thereof has not been extended. The case was placed upon the April calendar of this court, at which time there was no appearance on behalf of appellant, and the Attorney General moved that it be submitted on the record. On the authority of People v. Wagner, 171 Pac. 699, and the cases therein cited, the judgment is affirmed.

A. B. FIELD & CO., Inc., et al. v. HAVEN.
(Civ. 2331.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. April 4, 1918.)

1. Contracts 🔑303(1)—Existence of Subject-Matter—Implied Condition.

When performance of a contract depends on the continued existence of a person or thing, a condition is implied that the impossibility arising from the perishing of the person or thing excuses performance.

2. Contracts 🔑215(2)—Contract to Pack Fruit—Destruction of Plant—Effect.

Where plaintiffs employed defendant to buy and pack prunes for them, the contract was essentially one for the performance of personal services by defendant, which might be performed as effectively in one place as another, so that destruction of his packing plant by fire did not terminate the contract, though the plant was specially mentioned in the contract.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑1001(1)—Review—Finding.

The finding of the lower court on ample evidence cannot be disturbed by the appellate court.

4. Appeal and Error 🔑1078(1)—Reservation of Question.

A point neither raised in the court below nor mentioned in the briefs, but presented for the first time on oral argument, the appellate court is not required to discuss or decide.

5. Damages 🔑78(6) — Provisions of Contract—Minimum Compensation—Liquidated Damages.

Where plaintiffs guaranteed to defendant the packing of 1,000 tons of prunes, and agreed to pay defendant $2.50 a ton for any shortage in the prune pack, the clause provided, not for liquidated damages, but for a minimum compensation to defendant for the services to be rendered by him in packing prunes during the year, for which he was employed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by A. B. Field & Co., Incorporated, a corporation, and the American Trading Company, a corporation, against Edward Haven, doing business as Haven & Co. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Samuel Knight and F. E. Boland, both of San Francisco, and C. C. Coolidge, of San Jose, for appellants. R. R. Syer and Owen D. Richardson, both of San Jose, for respondent.

ZOOK, Acting Presiding Judge pro tem. This case arises out of a contract by the terms of which plaintiffs employed defendant to buy for them and on their instructions dried fruits and to pack them in his packing house on Cinnobar street in San Jose, at specified charges for the different varieties of fruit. Plaintiffs guaranteed to defendant the packing of 1,000 tons of prunes, and agreed to pay defendant $2.50 a ton for any shortage in the prune pack. Defendant was to devote his packing house exclusively to the work provided for in the contract, and to pack the goods "as well as the regular packing of said party in the past." The term of the contract was from May 29, 1913, to April 30, 1914. There were other provisions in the contract not necessary to be considered on this appeal. The parties commenced operations under the contract and continued until the 19th day of October, 1913, when defendant's packing house was destroyed by fire. Within a few days after the fire defendant tendered to plaintiffs another plant, but objection was made thereto on the ground that the defendant could not have exclusive possession. Thereupon the defendant arranged for the exclusive use of a second plant, known as the "A & C Ham" packing house, and tendered it to plaintiffs, who again objected, but upon what ground the record is silent. Plaintiffs declined to order any more fruit bought, and no further work was done under the contract, except the packing of some two or three tons of fruit which had been purchased, but not delivered, prior to the fire. Insurance moneys were collected by defendant, and various disputes arose between the parties, culminating in the bringing of this action by plaintiffs to recover a balance claimed to be due them. Defendant in his answer set up, among other things, a counterclaim for $1,903.12, which he claimed to be due him under the contract as packing charges at the agreed rate of $2.50 per ton for 761.25 tons of the 1,000 tons guaranteed; only 238.75 tons having been purchased prior to the fire. The allowance of this counterclaim by the trial court is the only issue on this appeal.

[1, 2] Appellant's main contention is that the contract was terminated by the destruction by fire of respondent's packing plant. It is an undoubtedly sound principle of the law of contracts that, when the performance thereof depends on the continued existence of a given person or thing, a condition is implied that the impossibility arising from the perishing of the person or thing excuses performance, but we must confess that we are unable to follow counsel in their endeavor to apply the rule to this case. Neither in the evidence nor in the briefs is there anything to show that the place of packing fruit has any peculiar bearing upon the quality of the fruit packed, and in the absence of such showing we must take the common sense view of the contract adopted by the trial court, namely, that the contract is essentially one for the performance of personal service by the defendant, which might be performed as effectively in one place as in another, and that if defendant, after the fire, could pack fruit according to the standard set in the contract, he was entitled to tender another plant for the completion of the work contemplated therein. The fact that the packing house was specially mentioned in the contract was of no more moment than the mentioning of the residence of the parties, and the provision for the exclusive use of the plant was obviously inserted to secure the undivided attention of the respondent to the work contemplated. We are therefore of the opinion that the respondent was within his rights in tendering another plant for the performance of his contract.

[3] Appellants' second point is that the tender of the "A & C Ham" plant was not good for the reason that the "processor" for treating prunes in that plant was different from that in the one destroyed. The lower court found, however, on ample evidence from prominent experts familiar with both houses, that the "A & C Ham" plant was in every way as suited to the doing of the work contemplated by the contract as was the original plant, and this finding we cannot disturb on appeal.

[4, 5] The last contention made by appellants in that the guaranty clause in the contract was void as providing for liquidated damages. As this point was neither raised in the court below nor mentioned in the briefs, but was presented for the first time upon the oral argument, we are not required to discuss or decide it. We may state, however, that in our opinion the clause referred to provides not for liquidated damages, but for a minimum compensation to defendant for the services to be rendered by him during the year for which he was employed.

CHRISTIN et al. v. CLARK et al. (Civ. 2371.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. April 8, 1918.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE 🔑49(2)—AGREEMENT TO WILL PROPERTY—INADEQUACY OF CONSIDERATION.

An agreement to will an estate worth $100,000 to a girl, in return for her companionship in Europe for six months, will not be specifically enforced; the value of the service being inadequate.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE 🔑86—AGREEMENT TO WILL PROPERTY—ADEQUATE REMEDY AT LAW.

An agreement to will "jewelry and personal effects" will not be specifically enforced, where it does not appear that they were of such a rare nature that they could not be duplicated, or had a sentimental value.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by Estelle Porter Christin and husband against Edward H. Clark, individually and as executor of the last will and testament of Estelle Electa Caswell, deceased, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

H. F. Chadbourne and Alan C. Van Fleet, both of San Francisco (C. A. Christin, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. Charles S. Wheeler and John F. Bowie, both of San Francisco (Nathan Moran, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

ZOOK, Acting Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment for defendants on demurrer to a complaint for specific performance of a contract to leave property by will, which contract is alleged to have been made in 1906 between plaintiff, Estelle P. Christin, then Estelle Porter, and one Estelle Caswell, whose executor and legatees are the defendants in the case.

The facts of the case are as follows: When the contract was made, Estelle Porter, then 18 years old, was living with her family in San Fernando, Cal.; her family relations were affectionate, and her social circle pleasant and agreeable; she had finished her high school course and was about to enter Stanford University; Mrs. Caswell invited her to spend six months with her in Paris, and promised plaintiff and her mother that in the event that plaintiff accepted the offer she (Mrs. Caswell) would leave to her by will "all of her jewelry, personal effects, and a large part of her personal property," or "all of her jewelry and personal effects." (The promise is stated in the complaint in both ways.) Plaintiff accepted the offer, and spent "large sums," not stated in the complaint, in traveling to and from France and on trips with Mrs. Caswell in Europe; while with Mrs. Caswell plaintiff rendered services to her as a traveling companion and "personal services," the nature of which does not appear. Plaintiff returned home at the end of the six months. Mrs. Caswell died in 1914, leaving a will which omitted to make any provision whatsoever for plaintiff. Her estate consisted of a number of items of jewelry and furniture and railroad and industrial stocks of a total value of upwards of $100,000. The prayer of the complaint asks that the whole estate be decreed to be held in trust for plaintiff.

[1] The complaint wholly fails to state a case for equitable relief. While equity will in a proper case enforce a contract to leave property by will, it will only do so when the contract is fair, its terms definite and certain, the consideration substantial, and the plaintiff without an adequate remedy at law. Conceding the promise to be certain in the case at bar, the consideration therefor is hopelessly inadequate. In every California case where such a contract has been enforced, there was a complete change in the course of the plaintiff's life resulting from his performance of the contract. Here we have a temporary interruption only of plaintiff's relations with her family and friends and a short postponement of her college course, and while the complaint is eloquent, not to say verbose, in its recital of the detriment suffered by plaintiff, it is apparent that the only real loss suffered by her was the death of her father in her absence, an occurrence which certainly was not within the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made. The advantages plaintiff received in being afforded an opportunity to travel in Europe would, in the mind of any normal young woman, be more than sufficient compensation for her temporary absence from home and friends, and there could be no more fitting preliminary to a college course than a trip to Europe. The services rendered by plaintiff as a traveling companion for such a short period were slight, and absolutely disproportionate to the value of the estate claimed.

[2] Upon the oral argument counsel, evidently recognizing the weakness of their claim to the whole estate, urged that the contract should be enforced as to the "jewelry and personal effects" set forth in the schedule, but in the absence of any allegation that these articles were of such a rare nature that they could not be duplicated, or were possessed of a peculiar sentimental value, or pretium affectionis, the complaint is insufficient in equity. An award in an action at law of damages to the amount of the intrinsic value of the jewelry and personal effects would have adequately compensated plaintiff for the breach of the contract.

Judgment affirmed.

SCATTERGOOD v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (Civ. 2472.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 8, 1918. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court June 6, 1918.)

1. INJUNCTION 🔑223(1)—VIOLATION—ACTS CONSTITUTING—MAINTENANCE OF ELECTRIC WIRES.

That defendant maintains an electric wire within 8½ inches of the primary wires maintained by plaintiff does not constitute contempt in violating an order enjoining defendants from conveying electric power through city lines until such time as such wires are removed from the wires of plaintiff to the distance prescribed by the Railroad Commission; the only inhibition of the order being against transmitting power.

2. INJUNCTION 🔑230(2)—VIOLATION—PROCEEDINGS FOR CONTEMPT.

A charge that defendant was maintaining electric wires within a stated distance from plaintiff's wires, in violation of an order enjoining defendant from trespassing upon poles or wires of plaintiff, and from constructing lines within such distance therefrom, does not constitute a charge of contempt, since the wires may have been so placed prior to the promulgation of the order.

3. CONTEMPT 🔑54(4) — CHARGE — SUFFICIENCY.

An affidavit charging a contempt out of the presence of the court must show on its face a case of contempt.

Original application by E. F. Scattergood against Superior Court of State of California in and for Los Angeles County for a writ of review of an order adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt of court. Order annulled.

Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., W. B. Mathews, Wm. B. Himrod, and Lewis E. Whitehead, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner. H. C. Beach, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. The petitioner is chief electrical engineer of the bureau of power and light of the city of Los Angeles. He and certain other officers of the city, and the city itself, were defendants in an action commenced by the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation for the purpose of procuring an injunction. The action was tried and a judgment was entered granting the injunction. Its terms may be stated, both briefly and comprehensively, as follows:

(1) The defendants were enjoined from trespassing upon, interfering with, moving, or displacing poles or wires owned and controlled by the plaintiff.

(2) The defendants were enjoined from erecting or placing any pole, cross-arm or other electrical appliance or equipment or attaching any wire or cable to or upon any pole, cross-arm, wire, or other electrical appliance or equipment in a fixed position within the distance from any pole, cross-arm, wire, or other electrical appliance or equipment owned or controlled by the plaintiff, as prescribed by law and by the rules and regulations of the Railroad Commission.

(3) The defendants were enjoined from conveying, running, or transmitting electric power or energy through the lines and wires of the city, located on York boulevard, until such time as those lines and wires are removed from the wires, poles, and equipment of the plaintiff to such distance as is prescribed by law and by the rules and regulations of the Railroad Commission.

Upon affidavits charging the petitioner with a violation of the terms of the injunction and after a hearing upon the charges, the respondent adjudged the petitioner guilty of a contempt of court and imposed a fine of $200 upon him as a penalty for the offense. This proceeding was instituted for the purpose of annulling the order declaring the petitioner guilty and imposing the fine.

The petitioner contends that the affidavits upon which the charge against him was based do not state facts sufficient to constitute a charge of contempt. In the affidavits there are several specifications of particulars in which it was claimed that the petitioner had been guilty of an infringement of the terms of the injunction. All but one of these were eliminated at the hearing in the contempt proceeding, and the petitioner was found guilty of contempt in the matter of that one alone. That alleged offense was stated in the affidavits in the following manner:

> "That at or about the intersection of Avenue 53 and York boulevard on pole No. 18601G, which is a pole jointly owned, operated and maintained by plaintiff and Southern California Edison Company and Los Angeles Railway Company, the primary arc wires of the city of Los Angeles are within 8½ inches of the primary wires owned and operated and maintained by plaintiff."

It was admitted at the hearing that the distance specified was less than was required in such a case by the rules and regulations of the Railroad Commission.

The only charge made in the single specification upon which the judgment of contempt was predicated is that certain wires of the city "are within" a certain stated distance from wires of the plaintiff in the action. It is to be noted, however, that the wires mentioned in the specification are apparently in York boulevard. If they are in fact in that thoroughfare, the question whether the charge in it amounts to a charge of contempt must be measured by the terms of that part of the judgment stated in the paragraph numbered 3 in the earlier portion of this opinion, as that part of the judgment refers to wires in York boulevard. It may be remarked, in passing, that the portions of the judgment set forth in the paragraphs of this opinion numbered 1 and 2 do not relate to any locality whatever. As to them, the judgment itself is as general and far-flung, as to locality, as are the statements of the two paragraphs.

[1] Judged, then, by the standard set down in paragraph 3, the charge does not constitute a charge of contempt; for there is nothing in that paragraph forbidding a maintenance of the city's wires at any distance whatever from the wires of the plaintiff in the action. The only inhibition of the language of that part of the judgment repeated in the paragraph is against "conveying, running or transmitting" power or energy through the city's wires until they are removed to a certain distance from the wires of the plaintiff, which removal is not required by the judgment.

[2] If we attempt to measure the terms of the charge by paragraphs 1 and 2, and concede that the fact that the city's wires "are within" the stated distance from the plaintiff's wires amounts to "trespassing upon or interfering with" the wires or poles of the plaintiff, as the quoted terms are used in paragraph 1, then we are met by this condition: The charge does not show that the city's wires were placed at the prescribed distance from the plaintiff's wires after the rendition of the judgment. They may have been so placed before its rendition. In fact, some of the remarks of counsel for the petitioner, made at the hearing of the contempt proceeding, indicate that the city's wires were actually in place before judgment and affidavits used at the hearing show the same thing. If they were in place that early—and, under the authorities cited below, the possibility of such a condition must have been negatived by the affidavit charging the contempt—they were entitled so to remain, for there is nothing in the judgment to require their removal.

[3] It is manifest to us that the charge is not sufficient to constitute a charge of contempt of court, and the contempt proceeding must fail, for it is settled, upon abundant authority, that an affidavit charging a contempt out of the presence of a court must show upon its face a case of contempt. Hutton v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 156, 159, 81 Pac. 409; In re McCarty, 154 Cal. 534, 539, 98 Pac. 540.

The point of which most is made in the briefs has been omitted from discussion purposely by us. That point is that the affidavits charging a contempt fail to show that the petitioner personally committed or participated in the alleged contempt, and that they are insufficient for that reason. A consideration of the question is rendered unnecessary by what we have said above.

The order is annulled.

HACKETT et al. v. LEWIS et al. (Civ. 1982.)

1. Appeal and Error ⚷1010(1)—Review—Findings.

Where there is substantial evidence to support findings of trial court, they will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Sales ⚷262—Warranties.

Repeated assertions by seller that a motor truck would carry three tons were warranties, where buyer, although familiar with automobiles, had no opportunity of testing its carrying capacity and believed and relied upon seller's statements, and would not have purchased truck except for such representations.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by E. M. Hackett and others against M. E. Lewis and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. R. Holton, of Whittier, for appellants. F. J. Castelhun, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. The plaintiffs brought suit to foreclose a chattel mortgage given by the defendants to the plaintiffs to secure the payment of 13 promissory notes of $100 each, the purchase price of a motor truck sold by the plaintiffs to the defendants. The defendants in their answer set up a breach of a warranty of the truck made by the plaintiffs, and in a cross-complaint demanded cancellation of the notes and mortgage, and damages alleged to have been sustained by them by reason of the breach.

[1] The decision of the case in the trial court turned on the point as to whether or not the plaintiffs had expressly warranted the carrying capacity of the motor truck, and that court found in favor of the defendants upon this question. While there is much force in the argument made by the plaintiffs, still, as there is substantial evidence in the record supporting the findings attacked, it follows, under the familiar rule in the decision of appeals, that the judgment will not be disturbed because a contrary conclusion could have been drawn from the evidence.

It appears by the testimony introduced by the defendants that defendant R. E. Lewis, in the month of August, 1915, desiring to engage in the motor truck business, called at the salesroom of the plaintiffs in San Francisco, and informed their representative that he was in the market for a three-ton truck; that the plaintiffs represented to him expressly and repeatedly that the truck for which the notes in suit were given in payment would carry that weight, and that a trailer might be attached thereto upon which another load of a couple of tons could be carried; that the truck was or would be put in good condition before delivery; that upon these assurances, and these assurances alone, the defendant R. E. Lewis on September 2, 1915, purchased the truck, giving in payment therefor his notes secured by chattel mortgage; the notes and the mortgage being executed by him and his codefendant, M. E. Lewis. There is an abundance of evidence in the record that the truck would not carry three tons; that it was almost continuously out of repair, and was practically useless to the purchaser. On October 19, 1915, Lewis, after many complaints to the plaintiffs, and after giving them many opportunities to effectually repair the truck, and being finally satisfied that the truck could not carry three tons, offered to return it, and demanded the surrender of the notes and the cancellation of the mortgage. This was refused; whereupon the present action followed.

[2] Any distinct assertion or affirmation as to the quality or character of the thing sold, made by the seller during the negotiations for the sale, which it may be reasonably supposed was intended to induce the purchase and was relied upon, will be treated as a warranty. In Luitweiler Pump Co. v. Ukiah Water Co., 16 Cal. App. 198, the court, at page 206, 116 Pac. 707, at page 710, said:

> "The rule, indeed, seems to be well settled that 'any distinct assertion or affirmation as to the quality or character of the thing to be sold, made by the seller during the negotiations for the sale, which it may reasonably be supposed was intended to induce the purchase, and was relied on by the purchaser, will be regarded as a warranty unless accompanied by an express statement that it is not intended as such' (30 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 136), and it seems that the general tendency of the later authorities is to construe liberally in favor of the buyer language used by the seller in making affirmations respecting the quality of his goods, and to treat such affirmations as warranties when such an inference is at all reasonable."

In Pepper v. Vedova, 26 Cal. App. 406, 147 Pac. 105, the court held that, if the false representations as to the quality of the property go to the essence of its value and render it useless, and hence valueless, to its purchaser, it necessarily follows that the warranty was an essential condition of the sale, and, upon discovery of the breach, the purchaser has the right to rescind, and in such a case whether the defendant knew or did not know the representations to be false, or did not intend to commit a fraud in making them, is immaterial.

It is true that the purchaser in the case at bar was more or less familiar with automobiles, having driven such vehicles for three or four years; that before purchasing this truck he inspected it and helped to make some of the repairs thereto; that he was present at a 13-minute demonstration of the car, when it was operated without a load, but he was afforded no opportunity to learn the carrying capacity of the truck, as to which phase of the transaction he relied on the explicit representation of the plaintiffs, without which, he testified, he would not have purchased the truck.

The judgment is affirmed.

SHERMAN v. AMERICAN SURETY CO. OF NEW YORK. (L. A. 4167.)

1. Municipal Corporations 🔑347(1)—Contractors' Bonds — "Materials" or "Supplies."

Tubing at the end of which was attached a knife, used solely as an appliance in perforating the casing of a well, which the contractor retained unimpaired save for wear and tear, was not, but rental and transportation of tools used were, "materials" or "supplies" within St. 1897, p. 201, relating to contractors' bonds on public improvements, and requiring a bond to pay for material and supplies furnished "for the performance of the work."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Material; Supply.]

2. Principal and Surety 🔑89—Contractor's Bond—Discharge of Surety.

Where materialman on a city contract, before filing any claim against the city for labor or material, gave the city written notice that it released the city from all claims and authorized payment to the contractor, such notice was of no effect, there being no enforceable claims to release until claims were filed; and hence the notice did not affect the liability to the materialman of the surety on the contractor's bond.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by W. H. A. Sherman against the American Surety Company of New York, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff both parties appeal. That part of the judgment in favor of plaintiff modified and affirmed, and that in favor of defendant reversed and rendered.

Stutsman & Stutsman, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Bicksler & Smith, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. Plaintiff, as assignee of certain materialmen and laborers, brought this action against the defendant as surety upon a bond given by S. F. Loftus, a contractor, to the city of Long Beach, to recover payment of certain amounts alleged to be due to such materialmen and laborers from the contractor for work performed and material furnished in the construction of two wells for said city. At the time of entering into the contract, on July 22, 1912, Loftus, pursuant to the provisions of an act of the Legislature, designated as chapter 140, Stats. 1897, gave a bond in the penal sum of $4,000, duly executed by defendant, as surety, the condition of which was that in case Loftus failed "to pay for any materials furnished for the work of improvement described in said contract, or for any work or labor done thereon," the surety would, to the amount of $4,000, pay the same. Upon completion of the work Loftus, as alleged, was indebted in the sum of several thousand dollars for materials furnished and labor done in the performance of the work and for which the claimants, as required by the act, duly filed with the board of public works their verified claims, with a notice requiring said board to withhold payment of any sums due to Loftus and apply the same in liquidation of said claim. Upon trial the court made its findings, upon which judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for claims, the total amount of which was $897, and gave judgment in favor of the defendant upon two claims, that of Los Angeles Manufacturing Company for materials furnished, and Long Bros. for labor furnished, the aggregate of which was $5,873. From the judgment so entered both parties appeal upon the same record.

Of the $897 for which judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, the court, in effect, found that $99 thereof was for materials furnished by Mills Ironworks; that $214 was for materials furnished by Fairbanks, Morse & Co., and that the remainder thereof, viz. $584, was for rental of tools and freight paid by the claimants for the transportation of the same.

[1] Defendant, as appellant, contends that the finding that Fairbanks, Morse & Co. furnished materials in the sum of $214 is without support, for the reason that it conclusively appears from the evidence that said amount includes the sum of $160, conceded to be the value of 1,000 feet of two-inch tubing purchased from said company by Loftus and used solely as an appliance on the end of which a knife was attached for use in perforating the casing of the well, which operation was necessary in completing the wells so that water would flow into the same. After such use of the tubing, the contractor, as purchaser thereof, retained the same unimpaired save and except the wear and tear incidental to such use. The condition of the bond, as required by the act, is that the surety will pay for materials or supplies furnished "for the performance of the work." This provision cannot be construed to cover and include the tools or plant purchased by the contractor, the use of which is required in doing the work, and which, barring wear and tear incident to such use, survive for such repeated and other use. The vendor of a boiler and engine sold to the contractor for use in providing the necessary power in drilling the well, or the seller of a kit of tools to a carpenter, might with equal propriety insist that the value thereof or price agreed to be paid therefor was secured by the bond. Indebtedness incurred by a contractor in the purchase of his plant or any part thereof, the use of which is required in doing the work, is not within the provisions of the act, nor included in the terms of the bond. Hence the finding that Fairbanks, Morse & Co. furnished materials of the value of $214, in so far as it relates to the $160 found to be the value of the pipe so purchased by the contractor for use as stated, is not supported by the evidence.

Defendant likewise insists that the court erred in including in the judgment so rendered for plaintiff the sum of $584, found by the court to be due from the contractor for the rental of tools used in drilling the wells and cost for transporting them to the place where used. This contention is based upon the claim that the words "materials or supplies," as used in the statute, should be construed as referring only to those things which enter into and become component parts of the completed structure. In support of the proposition defendant cites a number of authorities construing mechanics' lien statutes which, if applicable, lend force to its claims. See Wood v. El Dorado Library Co., 153 Cal. 231, 94 Pac. 877, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 585, 126 Am. St. Rep. 80; Hall v. Cowen, 51 Wash. 295, 98 Pac. 670; Troy Public Works Co. v. City of Yonkers, 207 N. Y. 81, 100 N. E. 700, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 311. While such statutes in principle bear some analogy to the act under which the bond in question was given, they are distinguishable therefrom. French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 Pac. 92; Associated Oil Co. v. Commary-Peterson Co., 32 Cal. App. 582, 163 Pac. 702. It would be inequitable to subject an owner of property to a lien for that which did not enter into and become a part of such property. Hence, in construing mechanics' lien statutes, they are generally held to cover only what has been incorporated into the substance of and added to the value of the property against which the lien is asserted. Section 6923 of the Compiled Statutes of the United States 1916, provides that contractors doing public work for the government shall execute a bond conditioned that they will promptly pay all persons supplying such contractor with labor and materials "in the prosecution of the work provided in such contract." In American Surety Co. v. Lawrenceville Cement Co. (C. C.) 110 Fed. 717, the court, in construing a bond given pursuant to the provisions of the section, said:

> "The underlying equity of the lien statutes relates to a direct addition to the substance of the subject-matter, * * * building, or other thing to which the lien attaches, while the statute in question concerns every approximate relation of the contractor to that which he has contracted to do. Plainly, the act of Congress and the bond in the case at bar are susceptible of a more liberal construction than the lien statutes referred to, and they should receive it."

The learned judge, in discussing the subject, laid stress upon the words "in the prosecution of the work," contained in section 6923, as differentiating the act requiring the giving of such bonds from statutes providing for mechanics' liens. What is said is equally pertinent to our statute requiring a bond for materials or supplies used "in the performance of the work." Indeed, it may be said that in this respect there is no difference in the phraseology of the two acts. As to the bond required under section 6923, United States Compiled Statutes 1916 the Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly refused to restrict its application in the manner contended for by defendant. As illustrative of these views a few cases may be cited. Thus, in Title Guaranty & Trust Co. v. Crane Co., 219 U. S. 24, 31 Sup. Ct. 140, 55 L. Ed. 72, recovery was allowed under the bond for cartage and towage of materials. In U. S. Fidelity Co. v. Bartlett, 231 U. S. 237, 34 Sup. Ct. 88, 58 L. Ed. 200, where the work contracted for was completing a breakwater, recovery was allowed for all the labor at a quarry opened 50 miles away, including that of carpenters and blacksmiths who repaired the cars in which the stone was carried to the quarry dock for shipment, and wages of stablemen who fed and drove the horses which moved the cars. In Illinois Surety Co. v. John Davis Co., 244 U. S. 376, 37 Sup. Ct. 614, 61 L. Ed. 1206, recovery was allowed, not only for the rental of cars and other equipment used by the contractor in doing the work, but the expenses of loading the equipment and freight charges paid in transporting the same to the place where it was used. Indeed, upon the theory that the act and the bonds given under it must be construed liberally in order to effect the purpose intended, the Supreme Court, in a very recent case, that of Brogan v. National Surety Co., 38 Sup. Ct. 250, 246 U. S. 257, 62 L. Ed. ——, sustained the right to recover upon such bond for provisions used by a contractor in feeding his employés where the location of the work rendered the furnishing of such board necessary. The principle to be deduced from these and other like decisions is that in so construing the bond no hardship is imposed upon the surety since in entering into the contract it is deemed chargeable with notice, not only of the financial ability and integrity of the contractor, but with notice as to whether he possesses the plant, equipment, and tools required in doing the particular work, or will be compelled to rent and hire the same or some part thereof, all of which matters are factors to be considered in determining the risk and upon which the surety fixes the premium exacted for executing the bond.

[2] With regard to the appeal prosecuted by plaintiff from the judgment rendered in favor of defendant upon the claim of Los Angeles Manufacturing Company, and that of Long Bros., the court found that the Los Angeles Manufacturing Company furnished to the contractor in the performance of the work materials of the value of $2,476.55, and that Long Bros. supplied labor thereon of the value of $2,855 claims for which were, in accordance with the act, filed in the proper office on July 23, 1913. The court further found that prior to the filing of said claims, to wit, on December 10, 1912, and July 6, 1913, Long Bros. caused to be delivered to the board of public works of the city of Long Beach documents as follows:

> "Long Beach, 12/10/12.
> "To Board of Public Works, Long Beach—Dear Sir: We, the undersigned, authorize and give permission to Stanly F. Loftus to collect amount due for labor on well just completed.
> "Respt. yours, [Signed] Long Bros."
> "Long Beach, 7/6/13.
> "To Board of Public Works: We, the undersigned, authorize Mr. Stanley F. Loftus to collect for labor on well just finished.
> "[Signed] Long Bros."

It also appears that the Los Angeles Manufacturing Company, under dates of December 12, 1912, and July 7, 1913, caused to be addressed and delivered to the board of public works of Long Beach two documents in words as follows:

> "Gentlemen: We hereby release you from any claim we may have against you for materials furnished to Mr. S. F. Loftus used in sinking your wells"

—following which the court found that on December 20, 1912, the city of Long Beach, out of the funds appropriated for the payment of the sum due to Loftus under his contract, paid him the sum of $3,036.80, and on July 8, 1913, it paid to him the further sum of $2,836.88, both of which sums were paid in accordance with the terms and provisions of its said written contract as provided therein after the wells had been completed and accepted by said city, but that said Loftus after receiving payment of said sums, failed to pay the same, or any part thereof, to Long Bros. or the Los Angeles Manufacturing Company, and that in receiving said moneys Loftus was the agent of said Long Bros. and Los Angeles Manufacturing Company. The latter part of said finding, to wit, that Loftus was the agent of the manufacturing company and Long Bros. must be deemed a conclusion of law rather than a finding of fact, and in reaching this conclusion the court, in our opinion, erred.

As found by the court the money was due Loftus upon his contract, he having completed the wells. At the time of the making of the payments neither Long Bros. nor the manufacturing company had in pursuance of law filed any claims, the effect of which would be to impound the money due to Loftus and which it was the duty of the city of Long Beach to pay to him in accordance with its contract. Neither the manufacturing company nor Long Bros. had any claims upon these funds which could be the subject of the so-called releases. The service thereof, in the absence of any claim at the time having been filed by such parties the effect of which would be to impound the moneys due to Loftus, was, since unnecessary in enabling him to collect that which was due to him, ineffectual and inoperative for any purpose; hence, the case as presented to our minds is exactly the same as though these so-called releases had never been executed. It may be, as contended by the surety company, that if they had been executed after the filing of the claims for material and labor they would constitute a release thereof, advantage of which could be taken by the surety company. Such question, however, is not before us. Upon completion of the wells and in the absence of the filing of any claims it was the duty of the city to pay Loftus in accordance with the terms of the contract. Long Bros. and the Los Angeles Manufacturing Company were strangers to this contract, and, having filed no claims for labor and materials furnished in performing the contract, had no interest in or claim upon the fund to be released or in regard to which an agency could be created. The fact that the city prior to the filing of the claims of Long Bros. and Los Angeles Manufacturing Company paid Loftus nearly $6,000 on account of the work done which was in accordance with the terms of the contract could not impair their right under the statute and the bond given in pursuance therewith to file their claims within the 90 days and look to the surety on the bond for payment, limited, of course, by the amount specified in the bond for which the surety was liable. What is said sufficiently disposes of all points made which merit discussion.

It is ordered that the judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $897.05 be modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $160, and, as thus modified, it is affirmed; and that the judgment in favor of the defendant appellant as to the claims of Los Angeles Manufacturing Company and Long Bros. be reversed, and that judgment in favor of plaintiff for the amount of said claims as filed be entered upon the findings, recovery thereof to be restricted to the penal amount of the bond and interest thereon.

It is further ordered that plaintiff recover its costs on this appeal.

THAXTER v. FINN, Sheriff. (S. F. 8223.)

Rehearing Denied June 10, 1918.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑417(4½)—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT — WRONGFUL AWARD—RELIEF.

Notwithstanding award of compensation would have been annulled on proper review proceeding, the employer can have relief only where a proceeding for judicial review is instituted in the proper time and court, failing which, the award is not open to other attack in view of Workmen's Compensation Act, § 27,[1] limiting review to courts specified in sections 84, 85, and section 84, providing for review, in 30 days, in Supreme or District Court of Appeal, and stating that no court of the state (except the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal to the extent therein specified) shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct, or annul any order, decision, or award of the commission, or to suspend or delay the operation or execution thereof, and section 73, making award conclusive in the absence of proper review proceeding.

2. Master and Servant 🔑367—Workmen's Compensation Acts — Right to Award — Subcontractors.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 30, the Industrial Accident Commission cannot enforce claims of an employé of a subcontractor against the principal contractor.

3. Master and Servant 🔑347—Workmen's Compensation Acts—Powers of Legislature.

In view of Const. art. 20, § 21, empowering Legislature to provide for settlement of workmen's compensation disputes, anything in this Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding, the Legislature has power to limit review of awards of compensation, and to make them conclusive, as provided in Workmen's Compensation Act, §§ 27, 73, 84, 85.

4. Master and Servant 🔑416—Workmen's Compensation Act — Wrongful Award — Relief.

In view of Workmen's Compensation Act, §§ 27, 73, 84, 85, making commission's award conclusive in the absence of proper review proceeding, conceding that its acting without its jurisdiction, as, for instance in action for damages by libel, would be subject to collateral attack, its acts in any compensation proceeding, though beyond its jurisdiction in rendering an award against one not the employer, are not so without jurisdiction of the subject-matter as to be subject to collateral attack.

5. Master and Servant 🔑416—Workmen's Compensation Act — Wrongful Award — Relief.

Conceding an award of compensation against one not the employer was beyond the power of the commission, it became conclusive when such person and his insurer failed to ask rehearing before the commission, or review in Supreme Court or District Court of Appeal, under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 84.

Shaw, Sloss, and Melvin, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Original proceeding in mandamus by William H. Thaxter against Thomas F. Finn, as sheriff. Writ granted.

P. L. Benjamin and Chris. M. Bradley, both of San Francisco, for petitioner. John T. Williams, John D. Harloe, and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for defendant.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a proceeding instituted in this court to obtain a writ of mandate directed to defendant, requiring him to enforce against property of A. A. Janssen and the Ætna Life Insurance Company an execution issued by the clerk of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco upon a judgment entered in said court upon an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of petitioner. The award of the commission was made in a proceeding regularly instituted and prosecuted by petitioner against one F. W. Thaxter, and also said Janssen and said insurance company, for compensation for injuries arising out of and happening in the course of his employment by F. W. Thaxter. All of these parties appeared in the proceeding before the commission. The work on which petitioner was engaged at the time of the accident was the erection of a building; said Janssen being the general contractor for such erection, the insurance company being the insurance carrier for Janssen, and F. W. Thaxter, for whom petitioner was working, being a subcontractor of said general contractor. Said F. W. Thaxter had not taken out any compensation insurance. The award was made by the commission on June 30, 1914, against all three of the defendants F. W. Thaxter, A. A. Janssen, and the insurance company, being based in so far as Janssen and the insurance company are concerned on the provisions of section 30 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, which purported to authorize exactly what was done. No complaint was made by any of said defendants as to this award, either by petition for rehearing to the commission, or by application for a writ of review to any court. The award was for the sum of $270.53 to be paid at once, and for an additional sum weekly thereafter during plaintiff's disability. The sum of $270.53 was paid, as well as the weekly stipends to June 20, 1916. Further payment was refused, whereupon a certified copy of the findings and award were filed with the clerk of the superior court as provided by section 26 of said act, and the judgment was entered by the clerk as required thereby. The execution issued to the sheriff was based on this judgment. The facts as we have stated are set forth in the findings of the commission, the certified copy of which and of the award, together with a copy of the judgment, constitute the judgment roll (section 26 [b] Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act).

The refusal of Janssen and the insurance carrier, in June, 1916, to further comply with the terms of the award was doubtless due to the fact that on May 22, 1916, this court decided in Sturdivant v. Pillsbury et al., 172 Cal. 581, 158 Pac. 222, and Carstens v. Pillsbury et al., 172 Cal. 572, 158 Pac. 218 (both being proceedings in certiorari to review awards of the commission, instituted within the time allowed by the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act for the inauguration of such proceedings), that under the Constitution the Legislature was not empowered to confer judicial authority upon the commission to inquire into, determine, and enforce liabilities under section 30 of the act, in favor of the employé against persons other than his immediate employer.

[1, 2] In passing, it may be said that this view has been adhered to in later review proceedings instituted within the specified time. Donlon v. Ind. Acc. Com., 173 Cal. 252, 159 Pac. 715; Connolly v. Ind. Acc. Com., 173 Cal. 407, 160 Pac. 239; First Christian Church v. Ind. Acc. Com., 173 Cal. 552, 160 Pac. 675. In view of these decisions it is true, of course, that if an application for a writ of review had been made by Janssen and the insurance company to a District Court of appeal or to this court within the time allowed by said act, the award would have been annulled as to them. But, as we have said, no such proceeding was ever instituted. And it is now thoroughly settled that the sole judicial review contemplated by the act can be had only where a proceeding therefor is instituted in the proper court within the time specified in the act. On this ground we have denied applications for writs where it was claimed that the award was in excess of the jurisdiction of the commission, and in at least one case have refused a rehearing in this court when the District Court of Appeal denied a writ on this ground. See North Pacific S. S. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com. (no opinion) S. F. No. 8571, Dec. 15, 1917. In North Pacific S. S. Co. v. Industrial Accident Com., 168 Pac. 30, this point was discussed and decided by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District.

Notwithstanding this impossibility of review in any judicial proceeding, it is urged that upon the face of the record the award and the judgment based thereon as to Janssen and the insurance carrier are absolutely void and open to collateral attack, for want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter in the commission to make such an award, with the result that the writ of execution issued on the judgment is a mere nullity, affording no justification to the sheriff to make a levy. This claim is based upon authorities relative to collateral attacks upon judgments, and declaring certain well-settled principles as to which we are in entire accord. But in our judgment those authorities are not in point here.

It seems to us that there can be no question as to the clear intent of the Legislature to render awards by the commission of compensation to employés on account of injuries alleged to have been received in the course of their employment free from review or attack of any kind except as prescribed in the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act. We do not see how this intent could have been made clearer. As said by learned counsel for the commission:

> "It is as plain and clear as anything can be made that the statutory specifications for attack upon the awards of the commission were intended to provide the only method of attack, and to preclude any collateral attack which would, or could, be directed to defeating the award itself, so far as the rights of the immediate parties to the controversy are concerned. The prime purpose of the provisions by their very terms, and by reference to the policy of all compensation statutes, is to effectuate simplicity, facility, and expedition in reaching an end to the controversy and finally settling the rights of the parties to it."

It is provided in section 27 of the act that:

> "The orders, findings, decisions or awards of the commission made and entered under sections twelve to thirty-five, inclusive, of this act may be reviewed by the courts specified in sections eighty-four and eighty-five hereof and within the time and in the manner therein specified and not otherwise."

Section 84 provides for the only review in the courts of such an award, a proceeding in the Supreme Court or a District Court of Appeal, inaugurated within 30 days after the proceeding is terminated before the commission "for the purpose of having the lawfulness of the original order, decision or award or the order, decision or award on rehearing inquired into and determined," and in which the question whether "the commission acted without or in excess of its powers" is one of the questions to be determined, as well as the question whether or not the findings of fact "support the order, decision or award under review." In this section is to be found this provision:

> "No court of this state (except the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal to the extent herein specified) shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct or annul any order, decision or award of the commission or to suspend or delay the operation or execution thereof."

In section 73 it is provided that all orders, rules, and regulations, findings, decisions, and awards "shall be conclusively presumed to be reasonable and lawful, until and unless they are modified or set aside by the commission or upon a review by the courts in this act specified and within the time and in the manner herein specified." This necessarily means that whenever or wherever an award of the commission is shown it is to be conclusively presumed as against any kind of attack, collateral or otherwise (except, of course, the review proceeding authorized by the act itself), to be lawful and binding, in the absence of a showing that it has been modified or set aside by the commission or by the Supreme Court or a District Court of Appeal in the review proceeding provided by the act.

[3] Manifestly, the provisions quoted were intended to preclude any attack, direct or collateral, upon an award by the commission of compensation to an employé on account of injuries alleged to have been received in the course of his employment, other than the review provided by the act. It cannot be seriously questioned, in view of the constitutional provision relative thereto (section 21, art. 20), that the Legislature has full authority to thus limit the review of such awards and to make them conclusive except on a review by the courts specified by the act and within the time and in the manner specified therein. Its power "to provide for the settlement of any disputes arising under the legislation contemplated by this section, * * * anything in this Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding," sufficiently implies this authority. The provisions, moreover, appear to be an entirely reasonable exercise of authority on the part of the Legislature in this behalf, with a view to making the final settlement in such cases as expeditious as possible. Ample opportunity is given to any aggrieved party to obtain the authorized review by the proper court, and it is entirely reasonable to provide that in no other way can he resist the award.

[4] As we have stated, the claim here is that the award in this matter is void on its face for want of jurisdiction by the commission of the subject-matter (we say jurisdiction of the subject-matter, for, of course, in view of the record, there can be no question as to jurisdiction of the person), and that therefore, in accord with the well-settled rule ordinarily applicable to judgments that a judgment pronounced by a tribunal having no jurisdiction of the subject-matter is necessarily and incurably void, and may be shown to be so in any collateral or other proceeding in which it is drawn in question, it must be treated as a nullity. We may concede that in accord with the principles applicable to collateral attacks on ordinary judgments, notwithstanding the provisions of the act that we have set forth, absolute lack of jurisdiction of the subject-matter, when apparent on the face of the judgment roll, may be urged on a collateral attack on an award of the commission, in the highly inconceivable event of the commission assuming jurisdiction of an action for damages for libel or slander, or one for money due for goods sold and delivered, or one for damages for negligence, or indeed any proceeding other than one under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act looking to the fixing and enforcement of compensation to an employé or to his dependents in the event of his death on account of injuries received by him in the course of his employment. All of this may freely be conceded, but it cannot affect the determination of this proceeding. We have no such case here. There was in this case no such lack of jurisdiction of the subject-matter on the part of the commission. The proceeding here was one by an employé to obtain an award by the commission of the compensation provided by the terms of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act for injuries accidentally received by him in the course of his employment. In character it was certainly of the class of proceedings confided by our law to the exclusive jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission. It was a proceeding strictly within the purview of the act and of the constitutional provision upon which the act is based, and one as to which it was clearly intended that any award of compensation made was to be "conclusively presumed to be reasonable and lawful" whenever and wherever attacked, unless modified or set aside in the manner provided by the act. It seems to us that in no proceeding by an employé before the commission to obtain an award for the compensation provided by the act can there be, in view of the provisions of the act, a lack of jurisdiction in the sense in which the term is used in the authorities relative to collateral attacks on judgments, either of the subject-matter, or of the person of any party against whom the relief is sought, and who is given such notice of the proceeding against him as the law requires.

It is true that upon the facts disclosed by the findings the commission in this case did in one sense of the word exceed its jurisdiction; acted "without or in excess of its powers" in making the award, not only against the immediate employer, but also against Janssen and his insurance carrier. There was here an acting in excess of jurisdiction in the same way only that we hold on the review allowed by the act there is an acting in excess of jurisdiction in making an award when there is no evidence to support a conclusion that the person against whom the award was made was the employer of the injured party, or that the accident happened in the course of the employment, or that it arose out of the employment, or that the injury was not due to the willful misconduct of the employer. But clearly it was the manifest intent of the act that no such acting in excess of jurisdiction or "without or in excess of its powers" by the commission shall be available to any party to the proceeding as a ground of attack, collateral or otherwise, upon the award, except in the proceedings authorized by the act. In passing it may properly be said that under the general rule as to lack of jurisdiction of the subject-matter it is thoroughly settled in this state that neither the failure of the complaint to sufficiently state a cause of action, nor the insufficiency of the findings to support a judgment, subjects the judgment to collateral attack as being void on its face. In substance all we have here is a lack of any sufficient evidence on which to sustain an award against Janssen and the insurance company—a lack confessed by the very findings on which the award is based—with the result that the findings do not sufficiently support the judgment or award against them.

As we have already said, we see no good reason to doubt the authority of the Legislature to preclude to the extent stated, in so far as the courts of this state are concerned, any attack, direct or collateral, upon an award by the commission of compensation in any proceeding instituted by a person claiming compensation under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, provided, always, of course, that jurisdiction of the person of the party against whom the award runs is not wanting. The language used in our constitutional provision sufficiently implies the authority to make any reasonable regulation as to the time within and manner in which any award for compensation made in a proceeding before the commission may be attacked in any way, directly or collaterally; to enact, as it were, a statute of limitations creating an absolute bar to any such attack made after the prescribed time. It is an incident of their acknowledged power to, "by appropriate legislation, create and enforce a liability on the part of all employers to compensate their employés," etc., and to "provide for the settlement of any disputes arising under the legislation contemplated" by the constitutional provision, and reasonably appropriate to that end. We have already discussed this matter and the question of the purpose and reasonableness of the provisions precluding any attack on an award other than such attacks as are provided in the act.

[5] The situation here presented does not render the award and judgment attackable collaterally. It could be considered by a court in a review proceeding instituted in the manner and within the time specified in the act (section 84), and, we are satisfied, not otherwise. The award became absolutely final and conclusive against Janssen and his insurance carrier when they failed to ask for any rehearing before the commission, and failed to ask for any review by this court or a District Court of Appeal within the time allowed by the act.

It follows that petitioner is entitled to the relief sought. Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed.

We concur: WILBUR, J.; RICHARDS, Judge pro tem.; VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem.

SHAW, J. I dissent.

In my opinion none of the propositions on which the majority opinion is based is logically tenable. It is an elemental principle of law that a judgment of any tribunal upon a subject-matter of which it has no jurisdiction is absolutely void; not merely voidable at the election of the losing party thereto if he chooses to avail himself of some procedure authorized by law, for the purpose of annulling or vacating it, but totally void whether he submits to it or not, and wholly and always incapable of enforcement against his will. The reason is simple. The power of any tribunal to adjudge a matter is given to it by the people. It can come from no other source. The judgment, when made, is, in effect, the judgment of the people. The power is always limited by the terms of the gift. Beyond that the power does not exist. A decision upon a matter to which the power does not extend is not a decision of the people, and hence is of no force.

The Industrial Accident Commission is authorized to decide disputes of one kind only; that is to say, disputes between an employer and an employé in regard to a claim by the employé against the employer for the compensation allowed to him by the Workmen's Compensation Act for an injury arising out of and happening in the course of his employment. It has no power to decide upon a claim by such employé for such compensation against a person who is the general contractor upon a building upon which his employer is a subcontractor, or against the owner of the building, or against one who is not his employer. A decision purporting to allow such compensation against either or all of such persons, and which shows that fact upon the face of the record thereof, is a decision which the commission has no power to make. By the principle above stated it is of necessity void in the extreme sense, or as Mr. Freeman expresses it:

> "It is to be regarded as mere waste paper—a mere brutum fulmen;" "necessarily and incurably void, and may be shown to be so in any collateral or other proceeding in which it is drawn in question." Freeman on Judgments, §§ 116, 120.

See, also, Pioneer Land Co. v. Maddux, 109 Cal. 642, 42 Pac. 295, 50 Am. St. Rep. 67; Winrod v. Wolters, 141 Cal. 403, 74 Pac. 1037; Kreiss v. Hotaling, 96 Cal. 617, 31 Pac. 740; Sullivan v. Gage, 145 Cal. 771, 79 Pac. 537.

The decision which the plaintiff in this proceeding seeks to have enforced in his favor against Janssen and the Ætna Life Insurance Company, his insurance carrier, is a decision that Janssen, who is not the employer, nor claimed to be the employer, of the plaintiff, and who had no connection with him whatever, except that he contracted to erect a building and let a subcontract for a part of the work thereon to another person by whom plaintiff was employed and for whom he was at work when injured, shall pay the compensation for which the employer solely is liable. It was a decision upon a matter upon which the commission had no jurisdiction to act at all, as this court has repeatedly decided. Sturdivant v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 581, 158 Pac. 222; Carstens v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 572, 158 Pac. 218; Donlon v. Ind. Acc. Com., 173 Cal. 252, 159 Pac. 715; Connolly v. Ind. Acc. Com., 173 Cal. 407, 160 Pac. 239; First Christian Church v. Ind. Acc. Com., 173 Cal. 552, 160 Pac. 675.

All this is admitted in the majority opinion. The decisions in the cases last cited, although they were all cases in which the awards of the commission were attacked by a direct proceeding in this court, as provided in the Workmen's Compensation Act, were necessarily based upon the proposition that such an award was upon a subject-matter that was beyond the jurisdiction of the commission, and they fully establish that proposition. This, also, is admitted, or, at all events, not disputed, in the majority opinion.

The principle I have stated applies to all courts, the highest as well as the lowest. There is no exception, not even in the case of the Supreme Court itself. This court has no jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from a money judgment of a justice of the peace; that is a subject-matter to which its powers do not extend. If it should, nevertheless, go through the form of entertaining such an appeal, and should thereupon enter its judgment reversing the judgment of the justice of the peace, the latter judgment would not be thereby reversed, but would remain in full force notwithstanding the purported reversal by this court. The justice of the peace could lawfully proceed to issue an execution thereon, and the execution could be enforced, paying no attention to the reversal.

The majority meet this condition by the assertion that the Industrial Accident Commission is an exception. The exception exists, they say, because of the peculiar provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. They point to the provision of section 84 that "no court of this state (except the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal to the extent herein specified) shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct or annul any order, decision or award of the commission, or to suspend or delay the operation or execution thereof," and to provisions of section 27 of similar import and of section 73, declaring that awards of the commission made "in conformity with law" shall be conclusively presumed to be reasonable and lawful until set aside upon a review as provided in section 84. And these provisions, they say, forbid all question, in any other court, concerning the validity of any award of the commission, no matter how obviously and palpably void it may be on the face of the record thereof. The claim is that the invalidity, though patent, cannot be taken advantage of in any collateral proceeding in any court, or at all.

The phrase "collateral attack" is relied on to justify this proposition. The act says that such award shall not be "reviewed, reversed, corrected or annulled" in any other than the prescribed manner. This, it is claimed, precludes all other "attacks." The words bear no such significance. They each have a well-known and somewhat limited meaning, and they all refer to some sort of direct proceeding in which the rulings and the award may be examined with a view to determining whether or not they were regular or sanctioned by law and with the object of vacating the award if on such examination sufficient cause therefor is found. A judgment is "reviewed" when the proceedings leading up to it are examined by some other tribunal with power to vacate, reverse, annul, or correct it after such examination. It is "reversed" or "annulled" when the higher tribunal on such review, upon finding it erroneous or void, so adjudges. It is "corrected" when on such review it is found erroneous or void in part only, and the offensive part is eliminated.

These provisions of the act limiting the power of review of awards of the Industrial Accident Commission and forbidding such review by any court other than those specified introduce no new feature into our law. A judgment of the superior court cannot be "reviewed, reversed, corrected or annulled," except by the courts specially empowered to do so and in the manner specially provided for that purpose. There may be more methods of procedure for review provided, but the principle is the same, and, of course, the greater variety of methods has no bearing on the question at issue. The same is true of judgments of justices of the peace. A judgment or order of a superior court may be reversed or corrected on appeal by the Supreme Court or by a District Court of Appeal. It may be annulled on certiorari, for want of jurisdiction, by the same courts. And it may be annulled or set aside for fraud or mistake by an action in equity for that purpose by the superior court itself. These are all expressly provided by law and are all of the class known as direct attacks. And none other is provided or permitted. The provisions of the act aforesaid, therefore, do no more than to place the Industrial Accident Commission, which is a tribunal of special and limited jurisdiction, upon the same plane, with respect to presumptions in its favor, and in respect that its awards can be directly attacked only by the specified courts, as that on which the law had already placed courts of general jurisdiction. The reasonable and obvious conclusion and interpretation of the act would be that this was all that was intended by the language used, since that is all that its natural and ordinary meaning imports. Yet, notwithstanding these limitations upon the power and manner of reviewing judgments of the superior courts, fully as drastic as those applying to the commission, it has never been supposed or contended that such judgments, if shown by the record thereof to be upon a subject-matter not within its jurisdiction, were not ineffectual and void, subject to collateral attack, so called, at any time or place, or that they could not be safely ignored and disregarded by the parties thereto as well as by others. It is universally conceded that such is the case.

Why should there be a discrimination between these tribunals whereby such limitations, when applied to superior courts, should leave their judgments open to impeachment or question collaterally for obvious want of jurisdiction, but when applied to the Industrial Accident Commission places its award beyond reach or question collaterally, although obviously and openly upon a matter over which the commission is given no power or jurisdiction whatever? The majority do not attempt to answer this question, or to give any reason for the discrimination. It does not appear that they have even perceived that there is such discrimination. In my opinion no answer is possible and no reason for the discrimination exists.

Nor can I perceive any reason in justice for enlarging the accepted meaning of the words of the act, as, in my opinion, the majority has done. The view advanced by me could not materially affect the proceedings of the commission. The invalidity of its awards can be taken advantage of, under the principles above stated, only when the excess of jurisdiction appears on the face of the record. This means that it can be done only when the record itself shows that the commission has committed, or attempted to commit, an injustice; when it has awarded compensation from a person whom the law does not make liable therefor, or has assumed to adjudge a matter wholly foreign to its functions, such, for example, as to give judgment for the recovery of money due on contract, or for damages for conversion of property. It must be admitted that if an award purports to impose a liability upon some one upon whom the law does not cast the burden, reason, fair dealing, and justice alike would require that such award should have the stamp of invalidity so impressed upon it that it could be made available at any time and under any circumstances. Surely, the commission itself can have no wish to have its mistakes of that character cause such hardship and injustice; it being itself powerless to correct the mistake after the lapse of 30 days from the making thereof. Such straining of the ordinary meaning of words would seem to have no possible result other than to perpetuate injustice and wrong in cases where from any cause, such as inadvertence, ignorance, sickness, or other disability, the party so mulcted has failed to take the direct proceeding authorized by the act. To allow such collateral objection to prevail does not tend to destroy or hamper the facility with which employés may obtain the compensation to which they are entitled from the person whom the law makes liable, as the majority seem to fear; for it is only when he has obtained an award to which he is not entitled and from a person who is not liable and could not be made liable, and when this appears by the record of the award itself, that the principle can be invoked against him, and in such case it cannot be said to hamper him in the pursuit of any just claim.

The majority admit that "in the highly inconceivable event of the commission assuming jurisdiction of an action for damages for libel or slander, or one for money due for goods sold and delivered, or one for damages for negligence, or indeed, any proceeding other than one under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, looking to the fixing and enforcement of compensation to an employé or to his dependents in the event of his death on account of injuries received by him in the course of his employment," the objection of lack of jurisdiction of the subject-matter may be urged collaterally. They also admit, as before stated, that a proceeding against the original contractor by an employé of a subcontractor, to obtain compensation for an injury received in the course of that employment, is not a lawful proceeding under said act, nor a proceeding authorized thereby. They therefore admit the error of their conclusion. The argument is comparable to the defense of the wet nurse in Marryatt's story of Mr. Midshipman Easy, who, when taxed by the austere and highly moral father of little Jack with being the mother of an illegitimate child and therefore unfit to suckle the child of such a father, answered by way of confession and avoidance, "But it was such a little one." Here, the award being for compensation to plaintiff for injuries received in the course of his employment, and the only departure from the authority of the commission being that it has avowedly charged such compensation to one who was not legally liable and could not lawfully or justly be made liable therefor, it is too small to be taken advantage of collaterally, although wholly unauthorized, as completely without authority of law as would have been an award of damages for libel.

As if perceiving that the above-mentioned admission is a little awkward in its logical results, the majority opinion proceeds to endeavor to show that there was some semblance of jurisdiction in the commission when it made the award here in question. There was jurisdiction, they say, because the proceeding was "by an employé to obtain an award by the commission of the compensation provided" by the act for injuries accidentally received by the employé in the course of his employment. From this small premise it is argued that the commission is thereby given jurisdiction to make an award against any person from whom the employé sees fit to ask it, whether such person is the employer or not. Of course if this argument were good, this court could never, in any direct proceeding to review such award, have power to annul it; for, jurisdiction of the person being admitted, there would be jurisdiction of the subject-matter also, and, no other cause being set up, it would be only for lack of such jurisdiction that this court could, under the act, set aside an award. But the argument states only half the case. It is as if one of our superior courts should give judgment foreclosing a mortgage on land lying wholly outside of the state, and when the objection of want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter is made the plaintiff should answer that the superior court has jurisdiction of actions to foreclose mortgages on land. The obvious reply would be that the fact that land shall lie in this state is essential to the jurisdiction and that it is necessary to be included in any complete description of such jurisdiction. The application of the illustration is obvious.

There is no question here of the failure of the complaint before the commission to state a valid claim under the act. It is not disputed that the claim was made against Janssen solely on the ground that he was the original contractor, and upon the theory, now known to be erroneous, that the act cast upon him in that character a liability to compensate the employé of a subcontractor under him. The record plainly shows on its face that this is the fact of the matter. Nor was it a mere lack of evidence to show that Janssen was the employer of the plaintiff. There never was a claim that he was such employer.

Running through the majority opinion there is apparent an erroneous idea as to the nature of what is denominated a "collateral attack"—the idea that it is some sort of proceeding to review the decision so attacked or objected to in the collateral suit. This is not in any sense true. When a judgment appears on its face to have been made by a tribunal having no power to act at all on the subject-matter thereof, it is, as Mr. Freeman says, "in legal effect, no judgment." "It neither binds nor bars any one." Freeman on Judgments, § 117. The objection may be raised at any time or place, in court or out of court. And when raised and sustained, no direct action upon the void judgment ensues in the sense that it is vacated, annulled, or reversed. It is merely excluded from consideration if the objection is made in court in a collateral action, or disregarded entirely if the objection is made by a party interested in the course of a business transaction out of court. In a trial in a justice's court an objection of this character can be made to a judgment of the superior court, over whose judgments a justice's court can have no reviewing power whatever. The justice, nevertheless, has power to sustain the objection and exclude proof of the void judgment. And his ruling can itself be reviewed only on appeal to the superior court.

Finally, it is said that section 21, article 20, of the Constitution, gives the Legislature power to provide this immunity of awards of the commission from question collaterally, even when they are upon matters not committed to the commission either by the Legislature or by the Constitution itself. The statement in that section that "the Legislature may provide for the settlement of any disputes arising under the legislation contemplated by this section," refers only to the preceding sentence wherein power is given to the Legislature to "create and enforce a liability on the part of employers to compensate their employés" for injuries arising out of and happening in the course of their employment. This section, therefore, does not contemplate any legislation allowing a liability for compensation to be created against persons not employers, nor legislation providing that compensation awarded against persons not employers shall be immune from collateral attack, and that, though invalid for want of power if directly attacked, they immediately become valid and enforceable if such direct attack, for any reason, is not made within the short time allowed. Hence, whatever power the Legislature may have over such matters, it does not derive that power from this section, but obtains it from the general grant of legislative power found in article 4. But in my opinion it is entirely clear that the Legislature has made no attempt to exercise such power by any provision of the act under consideration.

For these reasons I am of the opinion that the writ of mandate applied for should have been refused.

In re BAILARD. (Sac. 2568.)

1. Husband and Wife 🔑247—Statute—Conveyance—Rights of Wife.

Where land was conveyed to a married woman by a deed of grant, bargain, and sale, executed before the amendment of 1889 to Civil Code, § 164, providing that a conveyance in writing to a married woman raises presumption that title is vested as her separate property, the land so conveyed became community property.

2. Homestead 🔑86—Community Property—Selection by Wife.

Where an undivided one half of property is community property, and the other half wife's separate property, a wife's homestead declaration impressing her separate property as homestead has effect of impressing homestead characteristics on other half as a homestead selected by wife from community property, in the absence of selection by husband.

3. Homestead 🔑140—Rights of Surviving Husband—Statutory Provisions.

Where an undivided one half of property selected by wife as homestead was community property, and the other half was wife's separate property, the property vested in husband upon wife's death under Code Civ. Proc. § 1474, providing that community property selected by wife for homestead vests absolutely in husband upon wife's death, and further providing that her separate property selected as homestead likewise vests absolutely in husband upon her death.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

In the matter of the termination of the homestead interest of Sarah S. Bailard, sometimes also known as Sarah Baylard, deceased. From an order setting apart homestead to Frank Bailard, Gilbert Bailard and others appeal. Affirmed.

Paul C. Harlan, of Fairfield, for appellants. Raines & Devlin, of Fairfield, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is a proceeding brought under the provisions of section 1723 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by the surviving husband, to be declared the owner of a homestead vesting in him by reason of his wife's death, by virtue of the provisions of section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The property was ordered set apart to petitioner by the lower court, and the children of petitioner and his deceased wife appeal to this court from that order.

[1] After the marriage of the petitioner and decedent an undivided one-half interest in the property in question was conveyed to him, and thereafter the same grantor conveyed the other undivided one-half interest to the decedent. It is correctly claimed by appellants that, inasmuch as the deed to the wife was made before the amendment of 1889 to section 164 of the Civil Code, and was in form a deed of grant, bargain, and sale, the title to the half so conveyed to her became community property. Thereafter certain conveyances were made between the husband and wife of undivided half interests therein, by which the appellants claim the wife at the time the homestead declaration was filed by her thereon, was vested with an undivided one-half interest as her separate estate and the husband a one-half interest as community property; while the respondent claims that the entire title was thereby vested in the wife as her separate estate, and that, for that reason, upon her death the property vested in him as surviving husband, under the provisions of section 1474, Code of Civil Procedure. It is unnecessary to determine which of these two contentions is correct.

[2] If we take appellants' view, namely, that the wife owned an undivided one half of the property as her separate property, and that the other half was vested in the community, the homestead declaration by her impressed the undivided half interest in the property held by her as her separate property with the characteristics of a homestead selected by the wife from her separate property, and also impressed the other half of the property owned by the community with the characteristics of a homestead selected by the wife from the community property, in the absence of any selection by her husband. Swan v. Walden, 156 Cal. 195, 103 Pac. 931, 134 Am. St. Rep. 118, 20 Ann. Cas. 194; Estate of Davidson, 159 Cal. 98, 115 Pac. 49.

[3] The undivided half of the property which was community property, therefore, vested in the petitioner upon his wife's death, under the following clause of section 1474, Code of Civil Procedure:

> "If the homestead selected by the husband and wife, or either of them, during their coverture, and recorded while both are living, was selected from the community property, * * * it vests, on the death of the * * * wife, absolutely in the survivor."

The undivided half which was the separate property of the wife vested in the husband upon her death under the following clause of the same section:

> "If the homestead selected by the * * * wife * * * was selected * * * from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same, it vests, on the death of the * * * wife, absolutely in the survivor."

The same result follows from the same provision if the property was all her separate property, as contended by respondent.

There is no merit in the contention that the description in the homestead is insufficient.

The order is affirmed.

SHERWOOD & SHERWOOD v. GILL & LUTZ et al. (Civ. 2091.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 8, 1918.)

1. Limitation of Actions 🔑46(12)—Agreement to Pay Debt of Another.

The agreement of defendant with F., on buying F.'s business, to assume and pay all indebtedness of F. contracted in and about the business, rather than the original debt of F. to plaintiff and his assignor, contracted in said business, constitutes the gist of plaintiff's cause of action, as regards limitation of action.

2. Contracts 🔑187(3) — Parties — "Contract Made Expressly for Benefit of Third Person."

Within Civ. Code, § 1559, providing a contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person may be enforced by him, contract of defendant with F., on buying F.'s business, to assume and pay all indebtedness of F. in and about said business is for the benefit of creditors of F. in such business, though they are not named and the indebtedness to them is not at the time known to defendant.

3. Contracts 🔑346(2) — Benefit of Third Person—Pleading and Evidence.

Though the complaint in action on agreement of defendant, in purchase of business of F., to pay all indebtedness of F. contracted in the business, alleges that at the time of the purchase F. was indebted to plaintiff on an open book account, proof of an open book account is unnecessary; this being but an allegation of an evidentiary fact, and it being enough that there was an unpaid indebtedness of F. coming within the description of defendant's contract with him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Sherwood & Sherwood, a corporation, against Gill & Lutz, a copartnership, and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

T. F. Allen, of Bakersfield, for appellant.
T. N. Harvey, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. On the 23d day of August, 1910, J. C. Fuller sold and transferred to defendants the personal property and improvements and good will of a saloon business theretofore conducted by him on certain premises in San Luis Obispo county. The written contract of sale provided that the purchasers "hereby agree to assume and pay all indebtedness of the said J. C. Fuller contracted in or about the said business." In this action the plaintiff seeks to recover on that contract as one made for its benefit and for the benefit of its assignor as creditors of Fuller on account of indebtedness contracted by him in and about the business described in said contract. The original complaint by which this action was commenced was filed on February 4, 1913; the case went to trial upon the second amended complaint and the answer thereto. Our further references to the complaint should be understood as meaning the second amended complaint. The first count alleged that on August 23, 1910, Fuller was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $258.59 upon an open book account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by plaintiff to Fuller in the months of May and June, 1910. The second count alleged that on the 23d day of August, 1910, Fuller was indebted to H. Jevne Company in the sum of $292.20 upon an open book account for merchandise sold by that company to him in the months of April and June, 1910, which said account was on December 30, 1912, assigned by H. Jevne Company to plaintiff. Judgment was entered in favor of defendant Lutz; defendant Gill having suffered default. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment entered in favor of Lutz.

1. It was found by the court to be true, as alleged by defendant Lutz, that as to each of the causes of action in plaintiff's complaint it was barred by subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. If, as contended by respondent, this is an action to recover a sum due upon an open book account, or if, as contended by appellant, the action rests upon a contract liability founded upon an instrument in writing executed by the defendants within this state the period of limitation is four years, as provided by section 337, Code of Civil Procedure. The action is not, upon either theory, governed by the two-year limitation described by section 339, Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] Appellant relies upon the written contract made by defendants with Fuller, and upon section 1559, Civil Code, which reads as follows:

> "A contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it."

Appellant contends that the gist of his action is the enforcement of a contract agreeing to pay a debt to a third person; that he is suing upon that contract, and not directly upon the obligation of indebtedness which had been incurred by Fuller. Appellant's theory is that the agreement of defendants to pay the debts of Fuller is a new contract for which the property transferred by Fuller to defendants constituted the consideration. Respondent, on the other hand, contends that the only causes of action stated by the complaint are founded upon the alleged indebtedness of Fuller to the plaintiff "upon an open book account," and upon a similar indebtedness of Fuller to plaintiff's assignor, also "upon an open book account"; that the only indebtedness proved to have been incurred by Fuller was not proved as upon any open book account, but was only an ordinary indebtedness upon oral agreement for goods sold; that the action was therefore barred by the statute of limitations (subdivision 1, § 339, Code Civ. Proc.) because it was not commenced within two years after the indebtedness incurred by Fuller became due.

In support of his claim that the action is in substance founded only upon the original "open book account" indebtedness said to have been created by Fuller, respondent refers to the case of Roberts v. Fitzallen, 120 Cal. 482, 52 Pac. 818. That action was instituted for the foreclosure of a mortgage which, at the time of the transfer of the mortgaged property to him, Fitzallen had assumed and agreed to pay. At that time the mortgage debt was not yet due. The action was commenced within less than four years after the note by its terms became due, but more than four years after the deed to Fitzallen. Fitzallen claimed that the four-year period of limitation began to run at the date of his deed, and that the action against him was upon the liability created by the terms of the deed as accepted by him. In response the court said:

> "The liability of the grantee in such a case is the indebtedness secured to be paid by the mortgage. But it must be enforced by foreclosure; and a deficiency judgment may be entered against him only upon the security, the mortgaged premises, becoming exhausted (citing cases). It necessarily results that the statute of limitations must run against the mortgage obligation, for that is the grantee's liability, and not against the promise to pay the mortgage as a new and independent agreement."

In Daniels v. Johnson, 129 Cal. 415, 61 Pac. 1107, 79 Am. St. Rep. 123, the Supreme Court defined the effect of an agreement assuming and agreeing to pay a mortgage. The court said:

> "The effect of the deed from Wilson to Howe, executed as it was while the note was a subsisting obligation, or, in other words, before it was barred by the statute of limitations, was to waive so much of the period of limitations as had run in favor of Wilson, the mortgagor, and establish a continuing contract and not a new contract. There was no merger of the old debt in the new, but merely a continuation of the original liability for a longer term. There was no renewal of the lien, and no occasion for its renewal; it was not extended, nor was it extinguished, but continued for the period during which the note, as continued, had to run" (citing Southern Pacific Co. v. Prosser, 122 Cal.

413, 52 Pac. 836, 55 Pac. 145; Roberts v. Fitzallen, 120 Cal. 482, 52 Pac. 818).

Discussing the foregoing decisions, appellant accounts for them, and in our opinion correctly accounts for them, by the fact that they involved promises to pay mortgage indebtedness, under a law which defines and limits the mortgagee's right of action, the promise to pay in those cases being, under the statute, not enforceable personally for anything more than the portion of the debt which may remain unpaid after a sale made under decree of foreclosure; the action not being, as in the case at bar, solely upon the promise to pay as a new and independent agreement. We think that the difference between an agreement thus affecting the rights of parties to a foreclosure suit and a contract enforceable only at law upon a personal agreement made for the benefit of a third person is very clear. In Washer v. Independent Mining & Development Co., 142 Cal. 702, 76 Pac. 654, which was an action at law to recover upon a promise made by the defendant to certain persons to pay money which they owed to the plaintiff, the plaintiff's right to recover was based directly upon the promise thus made. At page 708 of the decision last cited the court quoted from Brewer v. Dyer, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 337, as clearly stating the doctrine in the following terms:

> "Upon the principle of law, long recognized and clearly established, that where one person for a valuable consideration engages with another to do some act for the benefit of a third, the latter, who would enjoy the benefit of the act, may maintain an action for the breach of such engagement; * * * that it does not rest upon the ground of any actual or supposed relationship between the parties, as some of the earlier cases seem to indicate, but upon the broad and more satisfactory basis that the law, operating upon the acts of the parties, creates the duty, establishes a privity, and implies the promise and obligation on which the action is founded."

In Malone v. Crescent City Mail & Transportation Co., 77 Cal. 38, 18 Pac. 858, it was said that where A. owes B., and B. owes C., and A. and B., without consulting C., agree that A. shall pay to C. the amount which A. owes B., an action may be maintained by C. against A. "Such a promise, although the party for whose benefit it was made was not cognizant of it when made, is, if adopted by him, deemed to have been made to him, and he may sue upon the promise thus made without a consideration passing from him to the promisor."

In the case at bar, it is true that each of the contracts, in its turn, must have been made, before the defendants can be held as bound to pay to the plaintiff. But primarily it is the contract made by the defendants which makes them liable at all. There being no mortgage, the remedy is not complicated by any rule which prevents a direct action at law for the collection of the debt. Our conclusion, therefore, is that if by their agreement with Fuller the defendants agreed to pay the indebtedness of Fuller then owing to the plaintiff and to the plaintiff's assignor for the merchandise which had been sold to Fuller as stated in the complaint, the cause of action of the plaintiff arises directly out of the agreement thus made by the defendants, and this agreement, rather than the original indebtedness, constitutes the gist of the plaintiff's cause of action. It follows that the action was not barred by the statute of limitations.

[2] 2. The trial court found that at the time the defendants entered into the agreement with Fuller for the purchase of his business they had no knowledge of any indebtedness existing between Fuller and the plaintiff, or between Fuller and the plaintiff's assignor, and that said agreement was not made expressly or at all for the benefit of either the plaintiff or its assignor. The latter part of this finding cannot be sustained unless it is justified by the fact that at the time of making such agreement the defendants had no knowledge of the existence of such indebtedness owing by Fuller. To show that the entire finding is thus justified respondent cites the case of Wilson v. Shea, 29 Cal. App. 788, 157 Pac. 543, quoted as follows:

> "The rule of the decisions is clear to the point that in order to sustain such an action there must have been an intent clearly manifested on the part of the contracting parties to make the obligations inure to the benefit of the third party."

But we do not think that decision sustains respondent's contention. The court held that the writing upon which the plaintiff in that case relied did not show an intent to assume responsibility to the plaintiff's assignor on account of a certain contract. That being so, of course the plaintiff, or his assignor, could not be the person for whose benefit the contract was made, and could not recover thereon. In the case at bar, although Sherwood & Sherwood and the Jevne Company were not named in the contract made by the defendants, yet if at that time Fuller was indebted to those corporations by reason of obligations contracted in and about the business which Fuller sold to the defendants, then those corporations belonged to a class of creditors of Fuller, which class was expressly designated in the contract. "It is not necessary that the parties for whose benefit the contract has been made should be named in the contract. It must appear, however, by the direct terms of the contract, that it was made for the benefit of such parties." Chung Kee v. Davidson, 73 Cal. 522, 15 Pac. 100. It appears, therefore, that plaintiff is entitled to maintain this action if it can establish by sufficient proof that Fuller was indebted as alleged in the complaint.

[3] 3. The court found "that J. C. Fuller was not indebted either to H. Jevne Company or Sherwood & Sherwood in any sum upon an open book account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered either by H. Jevne Company or by Sherwood & Sherwood to said Fuller." In view of our definition of the nature of the plaintiff's cause of action, it is not necessary that the indebtedness owing by Fuller should have been "upon an open book account," if even without such open book account the evidence proves that the indebtedness existed, contracted by Fuller in and about his saloon business, and that it was for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered to Fuller as alleged in the complaint. Proceeding upon this theory of the case, we will now examine the evidence.

Counsel for the respective parties agree that the evidence shows the following facts: With reference to the Sherwood & Sherwood account, that in May, 1910, Fuller ordered a bill of goods consisting of liquor, and in the following July another stock of liquors, and made a partial payment on the first order. The plaintiff sent to Fuller itemized statements of account which he never denied, and the sum of $258.59 remained due upon the account from Fuller to the plaintiff. With reference to the other account, the evidence shows that H. Jevne Company sold a general bill of goods to Fuller in April and June, 1910, on open account for $292.20, when Fuller was opening the business described in the complaint, and that the merchandise was used in connection with the said business; that Fuller promised and agreed to pay the Jevne Company for the merchandise, including $9.02 freight, or a total of $292.20, and that the same has not been paid. A sheet of paper, being customer's ledger sheet, was introduced in evidence, and testified to be a true statement of the account of H. Jevne Company against Fuller, including all charges for merchandise sold and delivered to Fuller by H. Jevne Company, and the prepaid freight charges. And it was testified that the same was a true statement of the account and original records. A letter was introduced in evidence, dated August 12, 1910, signed by Fuller, addressed to H. Jevne Company, in which he acknowledged the indebtedness and promised to pay the bill on September 1st.

In his argument upon the facts shown, counsel for respondent contends that the plaintiff failed to show in either cause of action an open book account existing between the plaintiff or the plaintiff's assignor and Fuller. He does not contend that an indebtedness did not exist which was contracted in and about the business of Fuller, and does not contend that such indebtedness was not paid. The finding of fact made by the court is marked by the same limitations.

If we agreed with respondent that plaintiff's cause of action was upon the original indebtedness, we would also agree that the plaintiff could not prevail without establishing the open book account. This result would be compelled under the rule that a plaintiff must prove the facts material and essential to his cause of action. But since we have held herein that the plaintiff's cause of action is based upon the contract made by the defendants with Fuller, it is sufficient for the plaintiff that it is the owner of an unpaid indebtedness owing by Fuller and coming within the description stated in the contract. The fact that there was an open book account, although alleged in the complaint, was only an evidentiary fact, and was not the only means by which the principal facts might be proved.

MAYER v. ANDERSON et al. (Civ. 2392.)

1. Trial 🔑165—Nonsuit—Evidence—Inferences.

In deciding a motion for a nonsuit, every favorable inference fairly deducible from the evidence produced must be considered in favor of plaintiff.

2. Municipal Corporations 🔑705(10)—Use of Streets—Collision—Contributory Negligence.

A pedestrian who crosses a crowded street at 5 o'clock in the afternoon when traffic is heavy, looking straight ahead without glancing to either side, and is struck by an automobile of which he is oblivious until the moment of the collision, is guilty of contributory negligence; it being his duty to be alert and watchful, and to look up and down the street to know whether approaching vehicles are likely to intercept his line of travel.

3. Municipal Corporations 🔑705(10)—Use of Streets—Crossing Accidents—"Last Clear Chance."

In pedestrian's action for injury while crossing a public street, due to collision with defendant's automobile, where there was evidence that the chauffeur did not discover plaintiff's peril in time to avoid the accident, and the chauffeur's negligence, if any, being not subsequent to and independent of the plaintiff's continuing negligence, but contemporaneous with it, the doctrine of last clear chance is not applicable.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Samuel D. Mayer against Sterling Anderson and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McCutchen, Olney & Willard, of San Francisco, for appellant. Wm. M. Abbott and Wm. M. Cannon, both of San Francisco (Kingsley Cannon, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the defendants' negligence. The court at the conclusion of the plaintiff's case denied a motion for nonsuit, but the motion being renewed when the defendants had concluded the introduction of their testimony, it was thereupon granted. The propriety of the court's action in this regard is the sole question presented for review.

[1] In considering this same question the court, in the case of Lassen v. Southern Pacific Company, 173 Cal. 71, 74, 159 Pac. 143, 144, stated the rule to be applied as follows:

> "In deciding a motion for a nonsuit, 'every favorable inference fairly deducible * * * from the evidence produced must be considered as facts proved' in favor of the plaintiff. If there is any substantial evidence tending to prove all the facts in issue constituting the plaintiff's case, he is entitled to have the case go to the jury for a verdict on the merits."

Reverting for a moment to the facts of the case, the evidence showed that the plaintiff at about 5 o'clock on the afternoon of June 26, 1914, was crossing on the northerly side of Market street in San Francisco, and was proceeding westward on the crossing between the northeast corner of the intersection of Market and Kearny streets to the northwest corner of the same intersection, which is also the easterly point of the gore formed by the intersection of Market and Geary streets. He passed Lotta's fountain, a monument standing on the line of crossing about half way between the corners above referred to, and had in his progress reached a point on the crossing about midway between the fountain and the northwest corner, when an automobile belonging to the defendants, proceeding southward on Kearny street towards Market street, and having crossed the line of Geary street in its progress, and being about to turn into Market street, collided with the plaintiff. As a result of this collision the plaintiff fell to the pavement, the fall resulting in very severe injury to him.

It is not claimed that the defendants were operating the car in violation of any speed law. The car was not moving rapidly, the testimony being that upon hitting the plaintiff it was stopped at once. According to the principal witness for the plaintiff, it was going no faster at the time of and just prior to the impact than the plaintiff was walking. But assuming that the evidence introduced by the plaintiff tends to support the claim that the defendants were guilty of negligence, still we think the court committed no error in granting the nonsuit, for the reason that the injuries to the plaintiff were, we think, proximately caused by his own negligence, and for the further reason that the evidence introduced by the plaintiff does not warrant the application of the doctrine of "last clear chance."

[2] According to the undisputed evidence of all his witnesses, the plaintiff, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, when traffic upon the intersection above described was heavy, walked out upon the crossing looking straight ahead, without glancing to either side, and was absolutely oblivious to the proximity of the automobile right up to the moment of the impact, at which time he had traversed about three-quarters of the distance across the street. Plaintiff was bound to do more than to ascertain whether or not there was any obstruction in his immediate path. He was required to be alert and watchful, and to look up and down the street in order to know whether approaching vehicles were likely to intercept his line of travel. It has been repeatedly stated as the settled rule that the duty cast upon both pedestrian and driver of a vehicle in their use of the public streets is reciprocal and equal, and that neither of them has a right of way superior to the other; yet, in the present case, as stated by counsel for the defendants, we find the plaintiff urging that defendants' chauffeur was bound to maintain "a sharp lookout" at this busy intersection, when he himself personally, as shown by the testimony of his witnesses, neglected to do so. In Niosi v. Empire Steam Laundry Co., 117 Cal. 257, 49 Pac. 185, the court, after stating the rule just referred to, quoted with approval from a New York case as follows:

> "To enter upon a street crossing in a city where the moving vehicles are numerous, and a collision with them likely to produce serious injury, without looking in both directions along the street to ascertain whether any are approaching, and, if so, their rate of speed, and how far from the crossing, would not only be the omission of reasonable care for one's own safety, but an act of rashness. * * * Neither footmen nor teams have any right of way superior to the other. They each have the right in common and equally with the other, and in its exercise are bound to exercise reasonable care for their own safety, and to avoid doing injury to any others who may be in the exercise of the equal right of way with them."

As before indicated, the place where the accident occurred is at the time it happened one of the most heavily traveled points in San Francisco, yet the plaintiff, in attempting to cross the street, neglected to take the most ordinary precaution to avoid being injured. His hearing and eyesight were good, and it is clear that if he had looked he would have seen the approaching automobile and could have avoided the collision. It would appear that the accident occurred, as stated by one of the plaintiff's witnessses, by the plaintiff walking into the front left-hand end of the car. However that may be, it is plain that the negligence of the plaintiff directly contributed to and was the proximate cause of the injury. In Hamlin v. Pac. El. Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 776, 782, 89 Pac. 1109, 1111, the plaintiff rode along the street car track on his bicycle for a distance of a block and a half when a car of the defendant approached from the rear and struck him. The court said:

> "All the evidence in the case, the plaintiff's as well as that introduced by the defendant, shows that plaintiff was not aware of the approaching car until it was practically upon him. His health and hearing were good. Under these circumstances it is perfectly plain that his failure to see or hear the car must have been the result of absolute inattention to his situation and surroundings, and that he exercised no care whatever. To this phase of the case the decision in Everett v. L. A. Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 105 [43 Pac. 207, 46 Pac. 889, 34 L. R. A. 350], is applicable, and it is as true here, as it was there, that as matter of law the appellant was guilty of contributory negligence."

[3] It follows that the plaintiff, having himself been guilty of contributory negligence which contributed proximately and directly to his injury, was not entitled to have the case go to the jury, even if negligence on the part of the defendants were present, unless it can be said that the plaintiff had established a prima facie case upon the doctrine of "last clear chance." We do not understand that he seriously makes any such claim. True, a discredited witness, who was hostile to the defendants, testified that the chauffeur in charge of the automobile was looking at the plaintiff as the latter traversed the crossing, but how far apart they were at the time, or to what precise moment his testimony refers does not appear. Even if the chauffeur was looking at the plaintiff and saw him just before the accident, there is nothing in the record to indicate that he was bound to know that the plaintiff would place himself in a position of danger. From the evidence it is clear that the chauffeur did not discover that the plaintiff was or would be in a perilous position in time to avoid the accident, and the negligence of the driver, if any, was not subsequent to and independent of the continuing negligence of the plaintiff, but was contemporaneous with it. The doctrine of "last clear chance" has no application to the facts of this case. Bennichsen v. Market St. Ry. Co., 149 Cal. 18, 20, 84 Pac. 420; Sauer v. Eagle Brewing Co., 3 Cal. J. M. OVERELL FURNITURE CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (Civ. 2548.)

1. RECEIVERS 🔑67—PROPERTY VESTING—SEIZURE OF PROPERTY LEASED.

Appointment of receiver in an action by the vendor against purchaser to recover on ground of fraud the apartment house sold would not give receiver any rights to furniture therein leased to vendor, and that the lease was assigned to purchaser would not cut off any remedy of lessor to recover the furniture.

2. RECEIVERS 🔑67—PROPERTY VESTING—AGREEMENT TO PAY RENT FROM PARTICULAR FUNDS.

In such case, that receiver was to collect the house rentals and assignee had agreed to pay rental of furniture out of house rentals would not deprive lessor of his right to enforce payment of rentals due.

3. PROHIBITION 🔑15—NATURE AND SCOPE OF REMEDY.

Where receiver, appointed to take charge of apartment house in suit between vendor and purchaser, was in possession of personalty therein leased to vendor, lease being assigned to purchaser, merely because the same was in the house, lessor of such personalty would have no beneficial interest in proceedings to restrain the carrying out of the order appointing a receiver.

Original application for a writ of prohibition by the J. M. Overell Furniture Company against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and another to restrain respondents from carrying out an order appointing a receiver in a suit wherein Ethel K. Patterson was plaintiff and Clarence H. Patterson and another defendants. Alternative writ set aside, and peremptory writ denied.

Frank G. Tyrrell, Douglas L. Edmonds, Claude B. Morton, and A. L. Abrahams, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner. R. P. Jennings and Geo. L. Greer, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. Ethel K. Patterson commenced an action in the superior court against Clarence H. Patterson and Monnie Blackburn for the purpose of recovering certain real property which Patterson had conveyed to Mrs. Blackburn. The recovery was sought on the ground of fraud. The property consisted, in part, of an apartment house, the furniture and some other equipment of which were the property of the J. M. Overell Furniture Company, the petitioner in this proceeding. This personal property had been under lease from the petitioner to Patterson; the lease containing provision for a transfer of title by the petitioner upon the completion, by Patterson, of the payment of a certain total sum in rents. Patterson had assigned the lease to Mrs. Blackburn and the petitioner had consented to the assignment; Mrs. Blackburn agreeing to make the payments of rental called for by the lease. A receiver was appointed in the action commenced by Mrs. Patterson; the order of appointment requiring the officer to take possession of the real property which was the subject of the action, "to collect the rents thereof, * * * to pay out of said rents and income any and all expenses connected with the said real property or the improvements thereon, including interest or incumbrances, or liens, insurance, and other necessary expenses and to preserve any balance of said rents and income remaining in the hands of the receiver pending the further determination and decision of this court." The receiver qualified and took possession of the real property; the personal property of petitioner still remaining and yet being on the premises.

By its petition in this proceeding the petitioner seeks to restrain the respondents from enforcing or carrying out the order appointing the receiver on the ground that it is void, but the petitioner concedes in its brief that it is not entitled to the broad relief prayed for. The petitioner's theory is that the order requiring the collection and retention of rents, taken in connection with the fact that the receiver is in possession of the personal property, amounts to an infringement of its rights under the contract between it and Mrs. Blackburn. It is alleged in the petition that Mrs. Blackburn, upon taking the assignment of the lease, agreed with petitioner that she would thereafter pay the monthly rentals on the personal property out of the rents from the apartment house as they came in, and the allegation is not denied by the respondents. The petitioner also had the right, under the terms of the lease itself to take possession of its property at any time, without notice, upon default in the payment of rent. The petitioner insists that both of its remedies are cut off by the order appointing the receiver; that it cannot seize the property for the reason that it is in the custody of the court, and that payment of the amounts due it out of the rents collected from the apartment house cannot be made, because they are directed by the court's order to be devoted to other purposes.

[1] There are several answers to the petitioner's proposition that it cannot avail itself of the provision of the contract to the effect that it may seize its property upon default in the payment of rent. In the first place, the respondent court and the respondent receiver have filed separate answers to the petition, and it is alleged in each answer that the receiver is in possession of the personal property solely because it was on the premises when he took possession of the real property; that his possession of it is incidental to his possession of the realty; and that he neither claims nor has any right to the possession of the personalty as receiver. Further, the order appointing the receiver does not direct him to take possession of the personal property of the petitioner. It is manifest, then, that if the petitioner desires to take advantage of its right to seize the property it may do so at will and without trouble.

[2, 3] The petitioner's right to enforce payment of the rentals due under the lease appears to be equally untrammeled. The agreement of Mrs. Blackburn to pay the rental charges out of a particular fund does not relieve her of her general liability under the terms of the lease, and the petitioner may at any time enforce a collection from her of amounts due it; or it may pursue Patterson, if he yet remains liable under the lease, a point which we do not decide. It therefore appears that the petitioner has no beneficial interest in this proceeding.

The alternative writ of prohibition is set aside and the application for a peremptory writ is denied.

HALLAWELL et al. v. UNION OIL CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 1767.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑137(1) — DEATH OF SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF MASTER.

It was negligence on the part of the master mechanic of an oil company engaged in the distillation of asphalt in an attempt to repair a gas still to discharge its highly inflammable fluid in a way to come in contact with furnace fires and to spread to the immediate vicinity of an open trap, the surface of which carried more or less oil and inflammable material.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑276(2) — DEATH OF SERVANT—PROXIMATE CAUSE—NECESSITY OF PROOF.

In an action for death by fire of servants of an oil company engaged in the distillation of asphalt, plaintiffs were not required to show with absolute certainty that the fire which originated at asphalt stills through the oil company's negligence was communicated to the asphalt shed and was the proximate cause of the death of the deceased employé and another.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑278(3) — SAFE PLACE TO WORK — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In such action, evidence held to show that the deceased servant was not furnished a safe place in which to work.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑281(9)—DEATH OF SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Contributory negligence cannot be imputed to the deceased servant of an oil company burned to death in a sudden fire; that he was caught while fleeing from the danger being shown by the discovery of his remains some distance from where he was when first warned.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑276(2) — DEATH OF SERVANT — FIRE — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against an oil company engaged in the distillation of asphalt for death of its servant in a fire, evidence held sufficient to support finding that oil in a fire trap was ignited by the burning oil surrounding it, and thence ran down an 8-inch pipe to the asphalt shed.

6. EVIDENCE 🔑553(1) — EXPERT OPINION — HYPOTHETICAL QUESTION.

A hypothetical question to an expert witness must be based on evidence, but the basis may consist of any condition of facts the evidence of which tends to establish the facts assumed, or which the jury may reasonably find to be proven.

7. EVIDENCE ⚷553(4)—HYPOTHETICAL QUESTIONS—DISCRETION OF COURT.

As to hypothetical questions to experts, the trial court is charged with much discretion, and may properly allow a question under counsel's claim that the facts stated have been proven, rather than take the risk of passing on a question of fact by denying the offer on the ground there is no evidence of facts or a particular fact embodied in the question.

8. TRIAL ⚷208—HYPOTHETICAL QUESTION—INSTRUCTION.

Counsel objecting to a hypothetical question on the ground it assumes facts not proved may have the instruction of the court to the jury to disregard the testimony of the expert unless satisfied that all the facts on which the question is based are true.

9. EVIDENCE ⚷553(4) — EXPERT OPINION — HYPOTHETICAL QUESTIONS.

In an action for death of its servant by fire against an oil company engaged in the distillation of asphalt, the trial court properly allowed an expert witness to testify, in answer to hypothetical questions, as to the effect of burning oil at the intake of a 6-inch pipe when only a small quantity of water was passing into the pipe, though there was testimony that when asphalt stills were in full operation, as at the time of the fire, a trench usually carried water from condensers sufficient to fill half the pipe at its intake.

10. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷1050(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

In such action, if the hypothetical questions to the witness were improperly allowed, the oil company was not seriously prejudiced, where the fire could be accounted for by disregarding all evidence as to the pipe's having conveyed it, and especially where, disregarding the origin of the fire, finding was justified that the employé lost his life because not given a safe place to work.

11. EVIDENCE ⚷150—EXPERIMENT.

A bystander to an experiment, though not assisting in any way to make it, may testify as to its result, if he had knowledge of all the conditions of the experiment, and it was one involving no special technical knowledge, or was such that its result could be seen and understood by a person of ordinary judgment.

12. EVIDENCE ⚷150—FACT NOT IN DISPUTE—EXPERIMENT.

The trial court's ruling denying defendant the right to show what the bystander of an experiment had observed was not error, where the tendency of the experiment was to prove a fact not disputed.

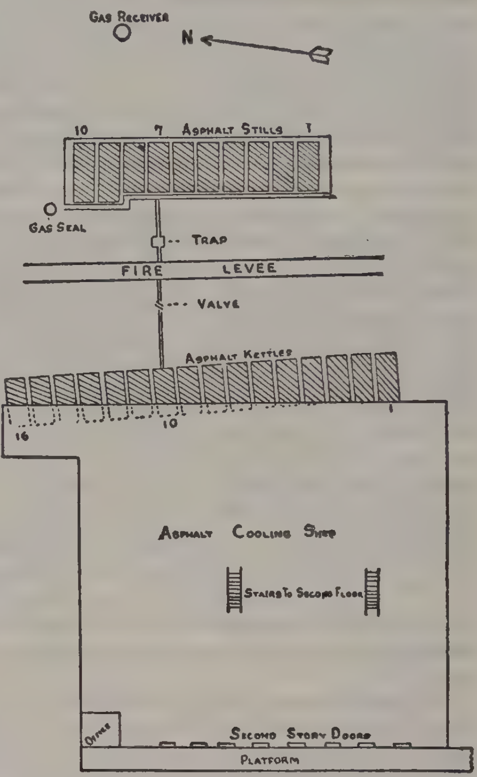
Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer and A. B. McKenzie, Judges.

Action by Addie Hallawell and others against the Union Oil Company of California, a corporation. From judgment for plaintiffs, and order denying its motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chickering & Gregory, Evan Williams, Frank H. Gould, and B. V. Sargent, all of San Francisco, and J. E. Rodgers, of Martinez, for appellant. Stetson & Koford and A. T. Shine, all of Oakland, Elmer E. Nichols, of Berkeley, and T. D. Johnston, of Richmond, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiffs bring the action as heirs at law of Charles Hallawell, deceased, who, it is alleged, lost his life on December 9, 1913, at Oleum, Contra Costa county, through the alleged negligence of defendant. The cause was tried before a jury, and plaintiffs had the verdict. Judgment was entered thereon, from which, and from the order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

We have prepared the following rough diagram taken from data furnished by two exhibits found in the record:



This seemed necessary to a fair comprehension of the evidence in the case. The main object of defendant's plant was to produce commercial asphaltum from crude petroleum, and incidentally to preserve such oils as might be condensed from gases in the process. The battery of asphaltum stills consisted of 10 separate stills, to each of which was attached a condenser. A furnace commencing at still No. 10 at the north end of the battery ran under all the stills to still No. 1. Still 10 was connected with still 9 and still 9 with still 8, and so on to still 1. East of the stills some distance was the gas receiver, noted on the diagram, into which gases that did not condense were carried from the condensers, and thence by a pipe these gases were conveyed to the gas seal situated near the northwest corner of the stills, and the inflammable gas was taken by a pipe from the gas seal to the furnace under the stills and burned. A ditch ran along on the west side of the stills into which the waste water from the condensers ran and was brought to a point near still No. 7, where this overflow was taken up by a 6-inch pipe and carried about 18 feet at a grade of .32 in that distance to the open trap noted on the diagram. At the lower or west side of this trap, which latter was flush with the surface of the ground and was about 18 inches square, was an 8-inch pipe so set in the trap as to carry away the contents of the trap, but leaving the discharge of the 6-inch pipe slightly below the surface of the water. About 4 or 5 feet west of the trap this 8-inch pipe made a right angle down about 6 feet, and resumed its course west for about 60 feet and at about the same grade as the 6-inch pipe, where it discharged in a wooden ditch in front, on the east side of the group of 16 asphalt kettles. Between the trap and the drop in the 8-inch pipe was a valve intended to shut off the flow through that pipe. Immediately west of this row of asphalt kettles and connected with them was a two-story wooden building of dimensions 130 feet by 150 feet. The asphalt, after cooling, was here drawn into barrels through long spouts leading from the kettles and stored on the first-story floor of this building, and was shipped from the platform on the west side of the building. This lower story was entirely open on all sides; the upper story, 10 feet above, being supported by the necessary timbers. The upper story consisted of a workshop of one large room, and was used for cooperage purposes and storing barrels and barrel materials. At the points indicated about 100 feet from the west side, two narrow stairways led to the lower story. The supporting timbers and the sides of the upper story and the roof were covered with corrugated iron. The east side of this upper floor was entirely occupied from floor to roof with barrels. There were no openings on the north or south side, but on the west side there was a number of windows with a 10-foot drop to the platform below. The upper floor was filled with barrels, work benches, and materials of various kinds, with narrow passageways at intervals leading to the west side which were at times more or less obstructed by loose materials. There was a fire levee, noted on the diagram, to check the contents of any of the stills, should one explode, from running down to the kettles.

When the plant was in operation, crude oil was placed in still 10, the heat increasing in intensity as the asphaltum residuum passed from still to still until at still 1 it was as high as 700 degrees Fahrenheit; the asphaltum residuum in the process of refinement becoming of greater viscosity as it passed through the stills until the condensation of the gases in the condensers had reached its maximum. The surplus or remaining noncondensable gases passed from the various condensers to the gas receiver and thence as shown to the gas seal, more or less impregnated with oil which had not been condensed. The finished product was drawn from still 1 to the asphaltum kettles to cool, preparatory to being drawn into barrels and stored or shipped. It was found necessary in the last operation to heat the cooled asphaltum in order to draw it off into the barrels, and this was done by using plates of iron on which was burning crude oil and asphaltum placed under the spouts leading from the kettles, and these portable heating appliances were wheeled on iron barrows from place to place and fuel dipped from containers to feed the fires, which latter flamed up at times several feet. The effect of these fires was to give off a dense smoke, which settled on all parts of the building more or less and particularly on the timbers supporting the upper story and upon the sides and parts of the building immediately exposed to the smoke arising from these fires. This soot was inflammable, and burned with rapidity when exposed to sufficient heat to start it burning. The floor of the shed was wooden, and was usually kept covered with sand. When the sand had become too much impregnated with asphalt in wheeling leaky barrels over the floor it would be removed and fresh sand put on the floor. It appeared also that in wheeling the containers of the oil used as fuel to heat the spouts oil was spilled on the ground around the asphalt stills. Prior to the burning of the cooling shed, defendant had commenced to install an improved method of heating the spouts of the asphaltum kettles by substituting steam pipes, thus avoiding the accumulation of soot on the building, but it had not progressed beyond about one-third or one-half of the building. On the day of the fire there had been no heating of these spouts; and there was no fire burning at or near these kettles. The ground in front of the stills was nearly level, but sloped slightly to the open trap from the gas seal, which latter contained a quantity of oil in the nature of gasoline condensed from the gases coming from the gas reservoir. This seal was of about 50 or 60 gallons' capacity.

We come now to inquire into the cause of the accident. The eyewitnesses who testified were in defendant's employment at the time and were so employed at the trial. Decedent Hallawell was burned to death on the second floor of the asphalt shed in the early afternoon of December 9, 1913, and at the time was working with one Graves, another carpenter, who also perished in the fire and with one Hanford, the carpenter foreman, who survived. It appeared that master mechanic Lightbody was called to repair a leak in the gas seal. Without knowing or inquiring into the contents of the seal, and assuming that it was water, he caused to be turned down a stand pipe parallel with the ground which came from the bottom of the seal upwards along its side, thus causing the entire contents to run over the ground around and near the trap and into the trench at the furnaces. He turned away, but soon discovered that the oil and gases coming from the seal had taken fire from the furnaces and the fire was communicated to the oil spread over the ground and was burning briskly over an area of 20 feet square, and within 3 or 4 feet of the trap. A strong wind was blowing from the southeast towards the asphalt shed and across the trap. The burning material was noticed close to the intake of the 6-inch pipe. Fire extinguishers were procured, and the fire burning in front of the stills and around the trap was put out. Witness Conley testified that to prevent the fire from passing through the 8-inch pipe to the asphaltum shed he went to the gauge and turned it off and while doing this he said the smoke was rising and fire blazing up at the asphaltum shed at about the point where the 8-inch pipe discharged at the shed. He testified:

"I couldn't say how long after I first saw the fire at the asphalt stills before the whole building was ablaze or aflame, about three or four minutes or so."

An effort was made to extinguish this fire, but it spread so rapidly that in a very short time the entire building was enveloped in flames and a dense smoke from the burning soot which had accumulated on the building. The flames were seen to run rapidly up the timbers supporting the second story and spread along the sides of the building. Of the situation in the second story, witness Hanford, under whom decedent and Graves were working, testified:

"We were bolting a barrel machine to a sort of frame while Mr. Hallawell was sawing some boards for the upper part of the crate when I noticed the smoke. I first thought it was the engine outside, lots of times the smoke will come up between the first and second floors. Shortly some one hollered 'Fire' and we started for the stairs, that is one of the stairs we came up. We all three of us started for the stairs. Mr. Hallawell, being nearest to the stairs, started out ahead and Mr. Graves, and I was on one side of the machine and he was on the other and he started right after Mr. Hallawell, and I had to run around the machine and was behind them, and I saw the smoke belching up through the stairs and I knew it was impossible for us to get down the stairs. I said, 'Run for your life, boys,' and I turned and ran in the opposite direction, and I supposed that they followed, but that is the last I ever saw of them. * * * I had some trouble with smoke as I was running to the front door, that is the west end of the building, the building was filling with smoke so fast that it was lowering, and I had to get down on my knees to get to the door, in order to see my way out. There were several coopers making barrels that were working on that floor at the time. They were working at those different benches. These other two men were working right with me. We were all three working on the same machinery. A minute or two, something like that, elapsed from the time I heard the cry of 'Fire' until I told the men to run for their lives. I just started for the stairs and I saw we couldn't get down. I must have gone I should judge 10 or 15 feet towards the stairway. * * * I do not know of my own knowledge where that fire came from. I know the direction it came from. The first I saw of it was the smoke coming up through the building, from the east side; that is the side away from the bay. That place is right on the edge of the bay. The bay is on the west side and also on the north side of it; that portion of the works of the Union Oil Company is on sloping land towards the bay."

The charred remains of Hallawell and Graves were later found in the ruins not far from the northwest corner of the building, in which direction they probably attempted to escape. Witness Lightbody testified:

"When I saw the fire down below, when my attention was called to it as I was leaving there (near the fire at the stills), a great deal of smoke was breaking out, the building was not entirely enveloped, the rear end of it (at the kettles) was almost entirely so that you could not see it hardly. It was completely enveloped in flames so quickly that I could not hardly tell you. It was not more than two or three minutes and the flames had made some headway by that time."

Witness Curran testified that:

After putting out the fire at the stills "we turned around and noticed that the shed was burning below us. * * * The flame traveled very fast. * * * It was just instantly after I succeeded in putting the fire out there (at the stills) that I observed the fire in front of kettle No. 7; it was just a moment. * * * I don't know if it was soot, it was some black substance on the posts; they were covered with sheet iron. * * * Q. Did you see the fire go up that? A. I saw it travel along it; yes, sir. Q. And how fast did it travel along there? A. I do not know; I am not sure; it traveled pretty fast. * * * I should judge it was four or five minutes, three minutes maybe, after I first saw the fire, the part in front of the kettles, before the whole building was in flames. It wasn't very long; it burned fast."

Witness Del Monte testified that after putting down his extinguisher with which he had been fighting the fire around the trap, he noticed that the shed was on fire; "after I saw the fire it was a minute or a couple of minutes, probably a minute and a half, before the whole building was in flames."

[1] There was no material conflict in the testimony as to the cause of the fire in front of the stills and around the open trap. To effect the repair of the gas seal it was not necessary, but was, we think, negligence, to discharge its highly inflammable fluid, as was done, in a way to come in contact with the intense furnace fires and in a way to spread, as it did quickly, to the immediate vicinity of the open trap, the surface of which carried more or less oil and inflammable material. From the evidence in the case the plaintiffs advanced the theory that the burning fluid was carried through the 6-inch pipe to the open trap and thence by the 8-inch pipe to the asphalt shed; or the oil on the surface of the water in the trap was ignited by the heat from the fluid burning on the ground near by, or by the flames being wafted or carried directly to the trap by the high wind and thence passed down the 8-inch pipe, before the valve was shut off, thus igniting the inflammable material at the asphalt shed. The expert testimony was that fire would travel with great rapidity in passing over the surface of the water—like a train of powder. Defendant offered no explanation, but contented itself with combating the theory of plaintiffs. Expert testimony was admitted which showed that, notwithstanding the outlet of the 6-inch pipe in the trap was slightly below the surface of the water in the trap, the burning fluid passing through the pipe would cause an explosion which would force the fire to the surface at the trap, ignite the oil in the trap, and pass on down the 8-inch pipe. It was shown that ordinarily, when the stills were in operation, the overflow coming from the condensers and passing along the trench to this 6-inch pipe would fill the pipe about half full at the intake and, its grade considered, the pipe would be full for a distance of about 7 feet back from the outlet at the trap, and in the opinion of the witness, an explosion would not force the burning fluid through this obstruction. It was also shown that this ditch did not always carry the water freely, but at times was more or less clogged. In the confusion of the moment no witness was able to say just what the condition was at the time, nor did any one testify that he saw the fluid burning at the intake. It was seen, however, quite near to it. No one testified that he saw the fluid burning in the trap or enter the 8-inch pipe in a burning condition, or escape at the asphaltum shed in that condition. There was no fire at the shed and had not been on that day, and no cause is suggested for the fire which consumed the shed other than the fire which started at the gas seal. About the time the fire around the trap was extinguished, which was the work of but a short time, one of the men, as we have seen, went immediately to the valve and turned it off, but the fire had in some way already reached the shed, as described by the witnesses, and was flaming up.

[2] We do not think plaintiffs were required to show with absolute certainty that the fire which originated at the stills through what we regard as an act of negligence on defendant's part (The Santa Rita, 176 Fed. 890, 100 C. C. A. 360, 30 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1210) was communicated to the asphalt shed and was the proximate cause of the death of these two men. The evidence that this fire ran through the 6-inch pipe to the open trap may not be conclusive. The evidence, however, that the burning oil was in close proximity to the trap; that its smoke and flame noticeably rose two or three feet from the ground; that this smoke, as was shown, would naturally contain more or less inflammable gases which might readily be communicated to the gases rising from the trap or the oil on it by the eddying currents of the strong wind then blowing; that the fire burst forth almost simultaneously at the shed where there had been no fire from any other source and before the valve on the 8-inch pipe was turned off—these circumstances constituted a reasonable hypothesis for the explanation that the oil on the surface at the trap took fire and was carried down the 8-inch pipe at the foot of which it was first seen at the shed by witnesses in the shed and at the stills.

Respondents contend that having shown the circumstances surrounding the fire sufficient appears to justify the invocation of the res ipsa loquitur doctrine, and that in the absence of explanation by the defendant the circumstances afford reasonable evidence that the accident arose from want of care. Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 Pac. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146; O'Connor v. Mennie, 169 Cal. 217, 146 Pac. 674; Van Horn v. Pac. Refining Co., 27 Cal. App. 105, 148 Pac. 951, and other cases cited. We think this doctrine may be urged with more than plausibility. Everything in the present case which in any way contributed to the accident was under the management of the defendant; the thing which caused the injury was shown to have been under the management of defendant, and that in the ordinary course of things the accident would not have happened if those having the management had used proper care. We do not, however, find it necessary to resort to this doctrine to find support of the verdict.

[3, 4] We are satisfied from the evidence that the deceased was not furnished a safe place in which to work. Whatever the cause of the fire at the shed, whether it originated at the gas seal or by some unknown cause at the shed itself, deceased lost his life through conditions which defendant allowed to exist and which by ordinary care could have been avoided. It is beyond dispute that the rapidity with which the fire spread over the building was caused by the oil-impregnated soot which had been allowed to accumulate on the timbers and sides of the building, which with ordinary care could have been kept free from this danger. Considering the purposes for which the upper story was used, and its crowded condition with barrels and materials of all kinds, and the meager means of escape afforded, deceased and his companion were in a veritable trap when the flames and smoke burst upon them almost at the first cry of fire. Contributory negligence cannot be imputed to deceased, for the instinct of self-preservation would have impelled him to seek safety with all possible promptness, and that he was caught while fleeing from the danger is shown by the discovery of his remains some distance from where he was when Hanford cried out, "Run, boys, for your life."

Error is assigned in permitting plaintiff's expert witness Cooper to answer certain hypothetical questions. Appellant assumes it to be conclusively shown that the only way the fire in front of the stills could have been communicated to the asphalt shed was through the trap; that the possibility of the fire having reached the trap along the surface of the ground was by the testimony eliminated. Hence, if the fire reached the trap at all, it was through the 6-inch pipe. Attention is then called to the testimony that when the stills were in full operation, as they were at the time of the fire, the trench usually carried water from the condensers sufficient to half fill the 6-inch pipe at its intake; that the grade of this pipe was .32 of a foot in 18 feet, and that the top of this pipe at the trap was 1¾ inches under the surface of the water in the trap; that expert Cooper had testified that under these conditions the pipe would be full for 6 or 7 feet back from the trap; and that it was improbable that the fire would penetrate this obstruction and set fire to the oil in the trap. As already noted, there was evidence that the trench in front of the stills was occasionally clogged by sticks and débris, thus obstructing the flow of water to the 6-inch pipe intake and diminishing or wholly shutting off the water for the moment. Expert Cooper was asked the following question:

> "Now, answer my question, what would be the condition that prevailed there if there was less water flowing into the intake pipe, of everything shown on that—that is, less than the usual flow of water?"

Having in mind that the oil which ran out of the seal into the ditch and over the ground around the trap was carried on top of the water in the ditch where it was quickly ignited by the fire from the furnaces and was seen in this condition passing still No. 8 and in the immediate vicinity of the intake of the 6-inch pipe, witness Cooper testified:

> "Suppose there is a small quantity in the ditch or enough water only to carry the oil down, the water would carry the oil down in front of the stills. That wasn't the question. The oil was spilled on the water and then became lit. In the first place the water would carry the oil down to the mouth of the 6-inch pipe, and then, of course, when it got to the mouth of the 6-inch pipe, it would run into the 6-inch pipe. Now, then, if the oil were ignited at any time between the mouth of the 6-inch pipe and where it was spilled, the flame would travel down the oil, as it does when inflamed oil is put on water, and it would also travel down this pipe, through this opening and through the trap and down the 8-inch pipe and down to the end, it would carry it like a shot out of a gun."

He then explained how an explosion would follow when a match is touched to a mixture of gasoline and air or inflammable gas and air, and why an explosion would follow if the oil was ignited after some of the oil had floated into the 6-inch pipe; "there would be a mixture of the vapor of oil and of air in the 6-inch pipe and if the oil was ignited, if the ignited oil flowed down to the mouth of the 6-inch pipe, it might possibly cause an explosion of the gases contained in this pipe; I would say, it will cause an explosion of the gases contained in the pipe," the effect of which he explained would be to force the flame to "shoot out into the trap," although at the outlet the water might be over the top of the pipe—how much over he could not say. He stated, however, that:

> "When the pipe is full of water up to this point (indicating on the diagram) the burning oil flowing on the ditch will just collect on top of the water above the pipe, and, as burning oil cannot sink under the surface of the water, will stay in the ditch and nothing would happen. The fire would be confined in the ditch in front of the stills, providing this pipe is full of water."

He explained further what would happen should the liquid in the ditch—

> "which has had the flame on it in the ditch run through the 6-inch pipe, but the flame is extinguished, the water will run through the trap as usual, but in addition to that the oil from which the flame came, but which has not been extinguished, will pass along through the water and will pass out under the top end of the 6-inch pipe and will follow from the trap. The material that floats on top is the oil which has been put out. Of course, it is inflammable when it is there. It would exhale inflammable gases for this reason, that when oil is burning on the top of water, especially a large quantity of oil, enough to make a flame, that if that flame has been on it, that flame will make water very, very hot, in some cases will make the surface of the water boil, therefore the water in this trap will be very much hotter if there has been extensive fire in this ditch than before, and if the water is hot in the trap it will tend to volatilize the oil in this trap, so this trap, in addition to the oil on it, should have some inflammable vapors over the surface of the oil also."

This condition of things would, he testified, cause inflammable vapors to come off the top of the water in the trap.

[5-8] Appellant is not justified in its assumption that the testimony eliminated the possibility of the oil in the fire trap having taken fire from the burning oil around it that came from the gas seal, and that if the fire at the kettles came from the fire in the trench it must have got there by passing through the 6-inch pipe. There was sufficient evidence to support a finding by the jury that the oil in the fire trap was ignited by the burning oil surrounding it and thence ran down the 8-inch pipe. This fire trap was open at the top and was flush with the surface of the surrounding ground. The oil on its surface and the vapor arising from it were thus exposed to the fire. Witness Conley testified that when the fire started he blew the whistle and immediately turned off the water from the condensers, which, of course, stopped the flow into the trench and would diminish the quantity running into the 6-inch pipe. The rule undoubtedly is that a hypothetical question must be based upon evidence, but the basis may consist of any condition of facts the evidence of which tends to establish the facts assumed, or which the jury may reasonably find to be proven. In practice the trial court is charged with much discretion, and the court may properly allow the question under the claim of counsel that the facts stated have been proven, rather than taking the risk of passing upon a question of fact by denying the offer on the ground that there is no evidence of the facts or a particular fact embodied in the question. Counsel objecting may have the instruction of the court to the jury to disregard the testimony of the expert, unless satisfied that all the facts upon which the question is based are true. Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 227, 252, 86 Pac. 695, 9 Ann. Cas. 795.

[9, 10] We think, however, that under all the facts and circumstances the court properly allowed the witness to testify as to the effect of the burning oil at the intake of the 6-inch pipe when only a small quantity of water was passing into the pipe. But if we are mistaken in this view we cannot see that defendant was seriously prejudiced thereby when we consider that the fire at the kettle shed can be accounted for by disregarding all evidence as to the 6-inch pipe conveying the fire, and especially where, disregarding the origin of the fire, the jury were justified in finding that Hallawell lost his life because not given a safe place in which to work.

[11, 12] It appeared that Mr. Nichols, one of plaintiff's attorneys, made an experiment by passing a bag over the intake of the 6-inch pipe, but he did not testify in the case. Witness Conley was called by defendant to prove that he was present and saw what Mr. Nichols did.

> "Q. Did you or did you not see anybody day before yesterday do anything to that portion of the 6-inch pipe, shown upon the map No. 2, which connects with the ditch in front of the stills?"

Objection by plaintiffs was made to the question. Some argument ensued as to the admissibility of the question, in the course of which the court said:

> "He can testify of his own knowledge what was done there himself; he needn't refer to Mr. Nichols at all; he can testify as to the water he saw in the pipe, that the water was stopped, and that he knew it was stopped, and that he knew all the conditions, if he is prepared to testify to the facts, let him testify himself."

The question above shown was then asked.

> "The Court: This witness can testify as to any fact within his own knowledge as to conditions that existed there."

The question was not objectionable, but an answer to it would have proved nothing more than that he saw somebody do something to the 6-inch pipe. Defendant did not follow it up by endeavoring to elicit from the witness what he himself observed. We think a bystander to an experiment being made, though he is not assisting in any way to make the experiment, may testify as to the result if he had knowledge of all the conditions entering into the experiment, and it was such a one as involved no special technical knowledge, and was such an experiment as that the result could be seen and understood by a person of ordinary judgment. Defendant, however, seems not to have asked any question which fairly shows that the court refused defendant the privilege of proving the result of Mr. Nichols' experiment. Furthermore, as we understand defendant's purpose, it was to show that when no water was flowing into the 6-inch pipe the top of the pipe at its outlet was still under water. This fact, as we read the evidence, was not disputed. Hence no error was committed, even if the ruling of the court had the effect to deny defendant's right to show by Conley what he observed.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

CITY OF WATTS et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2670.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 6, 1918.)

1. Prohibition 🔑28 — Sufficiency of Counts—Question for Trial Court.

The appellate court, on petition for writ of prohibition, cannot review decision of the superior court as to whether the complaint is sufficient to state a cause of action.

2. Intoxicating Liquors 🔑32(2) — Local Option—Petition—Examination by Clerk—Finality of Decision.

As to all matters comprehended within the proper scope of the examination of a local option election petition committed to the city clerk by Deering's Gen. Laws 1915, Act 1696, providing for the regulation of the traffic in alcoholic liquors by establishing local option, section 4, the decision of the clerk is final.

3. Intoxicating Liquors 🔑32(2) — Local Option Election—Injunction Suit—Jurisdiction.

If certain signatures to a local option petition, filed with the clerk of a city pursuant to Deering's Gen. Laws 1915, Act 1696, were not made by the persons who purported to have signed, or unauthorized forged additions have been made to the names as signed, or if addresses have been set opposite signatures which were not affixed thereto by the signers, and if the facts can be shown to have affected the number of signatures to the petition sufficiently to reduce it below the required number, such fraudulent acts constitute an appropriate subject-matter for the consideration of the superior court as a court of equity in suit to enjoin the election, not being matters which could become apparent to the clerk in the course of his inspection of the petition, or in examination of the great register of voters, and not being included in the matters passed on by him in the determination made by him concerning the sufficiency of the petition.

Petition for writ of prohibition by the City of Watts, a municipal corporation, and others, against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles, and Dana R. Weller, Judge thereof. Peremptory writ directed to issue.

S. W. Odell and Neighbours, Hoag & Burke, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners. Paul W. Schenck and Richard Kittrelle, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. This is a proceeding whereby the plaintiffs ask that the defendant superior court be prohibited from proceeding further in the trial of an action entitled Van Zandt v. City of Watts et al., and from entering any decree or order of injunction therein. An alternative writ of prohibition was issued by this court. The defendant has responded thereto by a motion to quash the alternative writ, by a demurrer to the petition, and by an answer. The defendants in the injunction case are the city of Watts and its board of trustees and the members thereof. The city of Watts is a municipal corporation of the sixth class.

On or about the 20th day of September, 1917, there was filed with Virgil R. Franklin, city clerk of the city of Watts, a petition which by its terms requested that the board of trustees of that city cause to be submitted in the manner provided by law to the voters of the city the proposition, "Shall the sale of intoxicating liquors be licensed in this city?" This petition purported to be signed by residents and qualified electors of the city of Watts. On October 9, 1917, the said city clerk filed with the board of trustees the said petition, with his certificate attached thereto, whereby he certified "that I have examined the foregoing petition and have compared the names thereon with the great register on file in the office of the registrar of voters of Los Angeles county, and find the said petition sufficient." Thereafter, on or about the 12th day of March, 1918, the board of trustees of the city of Watts adopted and passed an ordinance relating to the general election to be held in that city on the 8th day of April, 1918, and further providing that the question of licensing or not licensing the sale of alcoholic liquors in that city be submitted to the electors thereof on the ballots to be used at the election to be held on said 8th day of April.

The several proceedings whereby it is proposed to submit this question to be voted upon at the election of April 8, 1918, have been conducted under the claim that they are in accordance with the provisions of a certain act to provide for the regulation of the traffic in alcoholic liquors by establishing local option, which act was approved on the 4th day of April, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 599; Act No. 1696 in Deering's General Laws). Besides the facts above stated, the complaint in the injunction case alleges that the total number of purported signatures on said initiative petition with street and number address and date, purporting to have been affixed by said purported signers, was 553; that 59 names were rejected by the said city clerk for one reason or another; that the total number of purported signatures remaining was and is 494; that the total number of votes for all candidates for Governor in said city at the last general election was 960; that 25 per cent. of said number is the required number of names on said petition; that the number of names required thereon is 240. Paragraph 18 of the first count of the complaint in the injunction case reads as follows:

> "That the certificate of said Virgil R. Franklin, city clerk as aforesaid, is false, fraudulent, and untrue, and that said petition is false, fraudulent, fictitious, altered, changed, mutilated, and void; that plaintiff is informed and believes, and upon that ground alleges the fact to be, that the said certificate is false, fraudulent, and untrue, and said petition false, fraudulent, fictitious, altered, changed, mutilated, and void in the following particulars and for the following reasons, to wit: (1) That 8 names, together with the street and number address, appear twice on the said petition; (2) that 3 names appearing on said petition are not the names of registered voters in said defendant city; (3) that 3 names appearing thereon are the names of persons not registered in the precinct shown by the address affixed opposite their said names; (4) that 346 purported signers did not affix thereto opposite their purported signatures, or at all, the date of such signing, and that said 346 dates were affixed thereto by some person or persons other than the purported signers; (5) that 13 addresses set opposite 13 purported signatures were not affixed thereto by the purported signer thereof, but were affixed by some person or persons other than the said purported signer; (6) that 58 names thereon do not correspond or conform to 58 similar names appearing upon affidavits of registration, in the registrar's office, pertaining to said city; (7) that 5 names appearing thereon have additions made thereto by some person other than the purported signers of such names, and which before such addition do not correspond to or conform with similar names appearing on the affidavits of registration in the registrar's office pertaining to said defendant city; (8) that one purported signer thereto appears by the affidavit of registration pertaining to him to be a person unable to write; (9) that 3 purported signatures thereon were not made by the person purported to have signed the same; (10) that 15 names appearing thereon have no date affixed thereto; (11) that 3 names appearing thereon have no street number affixed thereto; (12) that 42 names appearing thereon have no intelligible indication of the date of the purported signature opposite thereto."

In Baines v. Zemansky, 168 Pac. 565, the Supreme Court of California had under consideration certain questions relating to the power of the superior court to restrain the registrar of voters of the city and county of San Francisco from further action upon certain recall petitions which were then in his hands. In its decision the court said:

> "Under well-established principles of law it cannot be denied that, if the superior court has jurisdiction, upon any possible state of facts, to prohibit or enjoin the registrar of voters from proceeding with such recall petitions in the manner prescribed in the charter, the sufficiency of the petition or complaint upon which that court acts, so far as the facts stated therein are concerned, cannot be inquired into by this court in this collateral proceeding, but that, on the contrary, its writs and orders must be upheld so far as this case is concerned, and can only be questioned when presented by way of appeal after the final judgment of said court in the cause. If that court has jurisdiction, it may decide the wrong as well as the right in the matter, and its decision is binding on all other persons, officers, and courts, save upon an appeal to the court having appellate jurisdiction of the cause. The sole question for our consideration, therefore, is whether or not the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of said proceeding in prohibition and of said action for an injunction. For the solution of this question we must look to the provisions of the city charter, the allegations upon which the writs and orders were issued, and the general principles of law applicable to the subject."

So here, the sole question for our consideration is whether or not the superior court is exceeding its jurisdiction in proceeding with the trial of said action for an injuncton. And for the solution of this question we must look to the provisions of the statute, the allegations of the complaint in that action, and the acts of the superior court with respect thereto.

[1] The matters really at issue in this proceeding are raised by allegations contained in paragraph 18, which we have quoted, of the first count of the Van Zandt complaint. The second and third counts of that complaint allege certain other facts, pleaded as furnishing a different basis of right to the demanded injunction. These counts 2 and 3 present questions, within the jurisdiction of the superior court, for its determination. It is for that court to say whether either of those counts is sufficient to state a cause of action, and we cannot in this proceeding review its decision.

Section 3 of the act in question (Act No. 1696), contains, among other things, the following:

> "Each petitioner shall, in addition to signing his name to such petition, write opposite his name thereon his place of residence, giving street and number, if any, and such signing, to be valid, must have been done not more than sixty days before the filing of said petition."

Section 4 of the act defines the duties of the clerk as follows:

> "Upon the filing of said petition the clerk of the body to which it is addressed shall forthwith examine it, and from the great register ascertain whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified electors of the territory described therein, and, if necessary, he shall be allowed extra help for that purpose, and within ten days from the date of filing such petition he shall certify in writing the result of such examination and shall file his certificate with the petition. If the clerk finds the number of qualified signers to be insufficient he shall immediately send a written notice to the person who filed the petition, stating the number of qualified signers he has found thereon, and that they are not sufficient; and the petition may be amended within ten days from the date of such notice by the filing of a supplementary petition. The clerk shall within ten days after such amendment make like examination and certification of the amended petition. If it is still found insufficient he shall notify the person who filed the petition of that fact, without prejudice, however, to the filing of a new petition to the same effect. If the petition shall be certified as sufficient, the legislative or governing body having jurisdiction over the territory described therein shall, within the time prescribed herein, call an election to be held in such territory to vote upon the question whether the sale of alcoholic liquors shall be licensed therein."

[2] The superior court has not before it in the injunction case any charge of fraud or willful misconduct upon the part of the city clerk of the city of Watts. The statute imposed upon him the duty and vested in him the authority to examine the petition which was filed with him, "and from the great register ascertain whether or not such petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified electors of the territory described therein." As to all matters comprehended within the proper scope of the examination thus committed to the clerk, his decision thereon is final. This is illustrated by the matters set forth in subdivisions 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 11, and 12 of paragraph 18 of the first count in the complaint which is above quoted. The matters referred to in those subdivisions are all ascertainable by examination of the petition and of the affidavits attached thereto, either alone or by comparison with the great register or records of registration containing the affidavits of registration as made by the voters.

[3] The remaining specifications of fraud in the said petition present themselves in a somewhat different light. These are contained in subdivisions 5, 7, and 9 of said paragraph 18 of the first count of the complaint. If it be true as therein alleged that certain signatures were not made by the persons who purported to have signed the same; or that additions have been made to the names as signed, such additions having been made by unauthorized persons and in a manner amounting to forgery; or if addresses have been set opposite certain signatures, which addresses were not affixed thereto by the purported signer thereof, but were affixed by some person other than the purported signer; and if these facts can be shown to have affected the number of signatures to the petition sufficiently to reduce the petition below the required number, we are of the opinion that such fraudulent acts constitute appropriate subject-matter for the consideration of the superior court as a court of equity. They are not matters which could become apparent to the clerk in the course of his inspection of the petition or his examination of the great register, and would not be included in the matters passed upon by him in the determination made by him concerning the sufficiency of the petition.

Let a peremptory writ issue, restraining the defendant superior court from proceeding further in the trial of said action entitled E. G. Van Zandt v. City of Watts et al., described in the petition filed herein, and from entering any decree or order of injunction therein, save and except that said respondent may proceed to determine the merits of said action with respect to so much thereof as relates to the subject-matter of the specifications of fraud mentioned in subdivisions 5, 7, and 9 of paragraph numbered 18 of the first cause of action set forth in the complaint in said action, and make its decision and judgment thereon; and provided, further, that said superior court may consider and determine the additional matters set forth in the second and third counts of said complaint, together with the subject-matter of said subdivisions 5, 7, and 9, and make its decision and judgment thereon.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 26, 1918.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Joe Jacinto was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

George E. Foote, of Sacramento, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. This case was submitted on the record by the Attorney General, no brief having been filed with or appearance otherwise made before this court to sustain the appeal from the judgment of conviction taken by the defendant.

We have, however, examined the record and have found no substantial ground for the appeal. The offense of which the defendant was convicted was that of an assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder. The evidence discloses that the assault was committed on the wife of the accused at their home in the town of Hood, in Sacramento county, in the month of July, 1917, the motive for the crime being that the wife—the victim of the assault—had threatened and was about to leave the defendant because of his alleged ill treatment of her and refused to heed his repeated demands that she remain with him. The evidence clearly shows the guilt of the accused. We have found no errors in the rulings admitting and excluding evidence, while the charge of the court is in clear language, pertinent to the issues and otherwise unobjectionable.

SCHOLZ v. GARTLAND. (Civ. 2450.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 17, 1918.)

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Arthur G. Scholz against P. J. Gartland. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William A. Kelly, of San Francisco, for appellant. A. J. Treat, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In this action for services rendered by plaintiff as an architect to the owner of certain property, who contemplated erecting a building thereon, plaintiff had judgment, from which defendant appeals upon two grounds: First, that the evidence on behalf of plaintiff was so inherently improbable as to amount to no evidence at all; and, second, that there were certain errors in the instructions given by the court to the jury.

We do not consider it necessary to review the facts of the case. We have carefully examined the transcript, and conclude that the verdict of the jury was amply warranted by the evidence. We are also satisfied that the instructions given by the court correctly stated the law applicable to the case, and that there was no error in the refusal of certain instructions and the modification of others requested by the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

In re LAND'S ESTATE.

LAND v. EVANS et al.

(Sac. 2749.)

Wills 🔑743—Bequests—Assignment—Conditions.

Where a city, a legatee under a will, to avoid litigation and delay in distribution of the estate, assigns an interest in its bequest to testator's relative threatening to contest will, upon condition that no person contests will, an unsuccessful contest by a third person for which neither of the parties to the contract was responsible defeated the assignment.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of William Land, deceased. From the decree of distribution Francis E. Land appeals adversely to Nettie E. Evans, executrix, and Chauncey H. Dunn, executor, of said estate, and the City of Sacramento, a legatee. Affirmed.

Elliott Johnson, of San Francisco, for appellant. Clyde H. Brand and Archibald Yell, City Atty., both of Sacramento, for respondants.

WILBUR, J. This is an appeal from a decree of final distribution. Francis E. Land claims, as assignee of a $15,000 interest in the bequest to the city of Sacramento, which bequest amounted to the sum of $250,000, but which upon distribution was decreased to $231,165.66, said sum being distributed to the city of Sacramento in trust for the purchase of a public park in the city of Sacramento, to be known and called the "William Land Park."

Appellant's claim to the distribution of the said amount of $15,000 is made under the provisions of section 1678 of the Code of Civil Procedure, authorizing and requiring distribution to the assignee of a legatee upon petition of such assignee. If we assume in favor of the appellant that all the papers and documents set up in his petition for distribution were placed in evidence before the court at the time of distribution, and that the order of court denying a distribution of the amount of $15,000 to the appellant is, as appellant contends, based upon a construction of such documents and the legal effect to be given thereto, we may consider whether or not the court was justified in holding that the appellant was not entitled to distribution under the contract in question. All the facts need not be stated. Suffice it to say that the appellant, a relative of the deceased, threatened to begin a contest of the will of the deceased, thus jeopardizing two large legacies in favor of the city of Sacramento, one a legacy for $200,000, the other a legacy for $250,000. Under these circumstances an agreement of compromise was entered into between the city of Sacramento and the appellant, wherein it was agreed, in consideration of his waiving his right to contest the said will, he should be paid from the legacy to the city of Sacramento at the time of distribution the sum of $15,000, and that said sum should be distributed by the court in its decree of distribution to the appellant.

Without considering the question as to whether or not the provisions of section 1678 of the Code of Civil Procedure apply to the assignee of a portion only of a legacy, we pass to the question of whether or not, under the contracts, agreements, and order of compromise, the appellant was entitled to have distributed to him the sum of $15,000. The resolution of the city commission authorizing such settlement contained the following:

> "* * * The court having jurisdiction of said estate at the time distribution thereof is ordered to deduct said sum of $15,000 from the distributive share of the said city of Sacramento arising under said twenty-eighth paragraph, and direct the same to be paid to the said Francis E. Land; provided and upon condition, however, that the said Francis E. Land, in writing, irrevocably waive, relinquish and abandon all right whatever to contest the validity of said last will and testament, or of any part or item thereof, and all right to seek to have the order admitting the same to probate in any wise changed, modified, canceled, or annulled, and upon the further condition that no person other than the said Francis E.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

Land shall, at any time pending the final distribution of said estate, file or attempt to file any contest of any kind of said will, or of any item or part thereof or seek in any way to have the order admitting the same to probate changed, modified, canceled or annulled, or object in any manner to the distribution to said city of the sums to it bequeathed by the said will. * * *"

Thereafter one Alexander Morrison filed a contest of the will of William Land, deceased. This contest was dismissed by the probate court, and the order of dismissal was affirmed by this court. Estate of Land, 166 Cal. 538, 137 Pac. 246. It is stipulated by the parties:

"That the only contest, or attempt to contest, said will of William Land, deceased, was made by Alexander Morrison, and that this contest is reported in 166 Cal. at page 538 [137 Pac. 246]."

This contest was tried by the court without a jury, and was decided against the contestant on the ground that he had no interest in contesting the last will for the reason that he received the same legacy as under a prior will, and therefore is not a person interested in the question as to which of these two wills was probated. Appellant, therefore, claims that he cannot be held to have contracted with reference to the possibility of persons who had no interest in the matter filing a contest which would thus cause him to lose the very substantial amount agreed to be paid to him. In considering that question, however, we are bound to consider the purpose of the parties to the agreement as stated in their contract. The resolution in question recites that:

Notwithstanding the fact that the amount bequeathed for park purposes is $250,000, "said will further providing that in the event the said bequest for park purposes, together with other bequests for charitable purposes made by said testator in said will, should exceed one-third of his estate, said bequest for park purposes should be cut down so that it, together with the remaining charitable bequests, should just equal one-third of his said estate; and further provided that in the event said bequest for park purposes, together with said other charitable bequests, should be less than one-third of his said estate, then the bequest for park purposes, is to be increased so that it, with said other charitable bequests, shall just equal one-third of the estate of said testator; and, whereas, it has become manifest since the death of said testator that said bequests for park purposes, together with said other charitable bequests, is less than one-third of the value of the estate of said decedent, and that said bequest for park purposes will be materially increased, to wit, in the probable sum of $20,000 and upwards, by reason of such fact; * * * whereas, in the judgment and opinion of the city commission such contest, if instituted, would, regardless of all questions of merit, be expensive and prolonged and disastrous to said estate and to all persons beneficially interested therein, and would result in a direct loss to the city of Sacramento in a sum greater than that hereinafter named as the amount to be abated by the city in order to effect such settlement, compromise and adjustment of such threatened and impending contest, and for the purpose of avoiding the same; and, whereas, for several years last past values of lands situate in the vicinity of the city of Sacramento suitable for park purposes have been and are now rapidly increasing, it is the judgment and opinion of the city commission that the indirect loss arising and occasioned to the city by reason of the delay in the distribution of said estate consequent upon such threatened litigation will equal or exceed the direct loss occasioned by the costs and expenses of such litigation: * * * Be it further resolved, that the president of the city commission and the city attorney be, and they are hereby directed to appear in behalf of the city of Sacramento upon the return day fixed in said citation, then and there to file in said court, in behalf of the city, its written consent to the making of said compromise, and the written relinquishment of said city of the said sum of $15,000," etc.

This resolution was passed during the pendency of a petition filed by the executors for leave to compromise with the appellant. In the petition for such leave to compromise it was alleged by the petitioners, the executors, respondents herein:

"That your petitioners allege to this court that in their judgment there is no foundation whatever for a successful contest of the probate of the last will and testament of said deceased by the said F. E. Land, either upon the ground of the alleged undue influence, or upon the ground of the alleged insanity or upon any other ground, and that said contemplated contest is wholly without merit, and that if said contest is filed, in the judgment of your petitioners, the same can be wholly defeated, and the said probate of the last will and testament of said deceased be upheld and confirmed, but that such contest would, in all probability, delay the settlement of the said estate for at least one year, and possibly a second or third year, and would cost the estate a considerable amount of money, to wit, from $20,000 to $30,000, or thereabouts, for the actual cost of the contest, and that distribution of said estate would be delayed for a long time, thereby entailing a loss to the distributees of the use of their said bequests for the length of time that said contest would extend the administration of said estate; that under the last will and testament of said deceased, the city of Sacramento is given a bequest of $200,000 in trust, nevertheless, to be invested to the best advantage by said city, and the interest accruing thereon to be paid out from time to time to the destitute men, women, and children of Sacramento City, said trust fund to be known as the 'Ann Land Memorial Fund,' and that the city would lose the interest on said $200,000 during the pendency of said contest."

With reference to the payment of the $250,000 legacy for the purchase of a park, the executors call attention to the provision of the will by which such bequest may be either augumented or decreased, and state as follows:

"That in all probability if no contest is filed within the next few months the said $250,000 will be increased by the amount of $15,000 or $20,000, as your petitioners believe. That by the filing of said contest, and the delay in the settlement of said estate, the said city of Sacramento will, in all probability, be a large loser by delaying the payment of said bequest for said purpose from one to three years, by reason of the fact that land in the vicinity of Sacramento City which is suitable for such park purpose is rapidly advancing in value, and in two years from now, in all probability land suitable for such park will cost in the neighborhood of $50,000 more than the same can be purchased for at the present time."

In the order granting leave to compromise it is recited:

> "That if said contest is instituted and prosecuted to final judgment it will interrupt and delay the settlement of said estate for one and possibly a second or third year, and will entail great additional expense upon the estate, as well as upon the said legatees cited to appear herein, and that the said city of Sacramento will suffer the greatest loss by contest of said last will and testament, and will be at a considerable expense to defend its share under said last will and testament, and will be injured far in excess of the amount it has agreed to give toward said compromise in the loss of interest upon said bequests, together with the appreciation of the value of lands situate in the vicinity of said city of Sacramento and suitable for park purposes as is directed in said will, and that it will be to the advantage of all persons beneficially interested in said last will and testament that said threatened litigation be averted."

Authority was therefore given to compromise the same. This order was made January 18, 1913. The decree of distribution herein appealed from was dated June 14, 1917. It will be observed that the delay in securing the distribution was more than anticipated in the contract in the event of a contest. It is evident that one of the primary reasons for settling the proposed contest was the damage which would result to the city of Sacramento from delay, this damage, as stated, consisting in loss of interest, in possible depreciation of the assets of the estate, thus decreasing the $250,000 legacy, and in the appreciation of the values of park lands which were to be purchased by the city with the fund so bequeathed to it. That the prediction of the city and of the executors with reference to the depreciation of the assets of the estate was well founded seems to be shown by the fact that the amount distributed to the city under the twenty-eighth clause of the will, instead of being $270,000 as anticipated, was $231,165.66. Suffice it to say that it is apparent from the whole proceeding that one of the important considerations moving the city was the avoidance of the expense of litigation and the delay involved in a will contest. By reason of the contest filed by Alexander Morrison they have suffered both a delay and the expense of litigation. It was because of this possibility, no doubt that the payment of the $15,000 was made contingent upon "the condition that no person other than Francis E. Land shall at any time pending the final distribution of such estate, file or attempt to file any contest of any kind of said will, or of any item thereof, or seek in any way to have the order setting the same for probate changed, modified, canceled or annulled."

Under the plain language of the contract between the parties there should be no payment to the appellant, and we see no reason why the contract should not be so construed, and many reasons why it should be so construed. Plaintiff surrendered a right to inaugurate a contest against the will of the decedent. In consideration therefor he received a conditional promise to pay him the sum of $15,000. By reason of the act of third parties, for which neither party to this contract was responsible, respondents were deprived of some of the substantial benefits contemplated by such compromise, and the appellant, under the plain terms of his own agreement, cannot receive his anticipated benefit.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by E. J. Alison against F. F. Chapman. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. F. Fitzpatrick and A. Kincaid, both of Redwood City, for appellant. Kirkbride & Gordon, of San Mateo, for respondent.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. Plaintiff brought this action upon an assigned claim of one Irving against defendant for a commission in a real estate transaction. There are two questions in the case; one perhaps vital, and the other certainly so. The first is whether Adolph Uhl at the time of the transaction in question was able to pay $21,500 for the property involved therein; and the other question is whether the words "when the sale is consummated," as used in the contract of sale, are to be construed as meaning when the deed was passed and the deal closed.

The controversy arose in this way: The defendant in writing authorized Irving to sell certain real property for him at a price of $22,000, and agreed to pay a commission of 5 per cent. if the property should be sold within the time mentioned in the contract. Irving found a purchaser in Adolph Uhl at $21,500, and entered into an agreement of sale and purchase with him at that price, taking a $500 deposit on the property. The defendant Chapman accepted this $500 payment and agreed to the sale of the property under this contract, but with the proviso that Irving's commission should be a flat $1,000, to be paid, as stated in the contract, "when the sale is consummated." The trial court found that Uhl was unable to pay the purchase price or carry out the contract. The deal was never closed.

[1] It may be conceded that, generally speaking, a broker has earned his commission when he has brought an acceptable purchaser to the vendor—one who is ready, able, and wiling to buy the property upon the terms on which the agent is authorized to sell; or when a written contract acceptable to the seller has been entered into with a purchaser brought to the vendor by the agent. But there are special features in this case which indicate a different intention of the parties. This was not strictly a case of a broker employed to go out and find a purchaser on certain terms. The broker had found the purchaser and brought him to the vendor. A contract was thereupon entered into by which the purchaser became bound to the vendor to buy the property upon terms satisfactory to the vendor. The question of the ability of the vendee to carry out his contract to purchase the property may have been the very reason why the vendor agreed to this contract only upon condition that the commission should be paid when the deal was finally closed. The words "when the sale is consummated" could hardly have referred to the time when the written contract of sale was made because that was already completed simultaneously with this agreement as to the time of payment of the commission. Those words must have referred to some future event and not to the time of signing the contract of sale.

[2-4] It is argued that it was the duty of Chapman to enforce the specific performance of this contract, and that if he failed to take steps to do this he must be held liable for this commission; in other words, that it was his duty to secure the closing of the deal. But it cannot be so held for two reasons: First, Irving, in the contract of sale, provided that he should have the right to demand the delivery of a deed from Chapman thus retaining in his own control the power to secure this deed and demand performance of Uhl. No other reason has been suggested for this provision of the contract. Again, the court found (and although the evidence sustaining the finding is meager we think it sufficient) that Uhl was not able to perform his contract. The evidence upon this point is conflicting. A single question asked of Uhl would have settled the point absolutely, but it was not asked. Such lapses give rise to many of the appeals that come to this court. Mr. Uhl testified that he could have carried out this contract, but he also testified that it would have been inconvenient for him to do so, and that to do so he would have been compelled to borrow money at high rates of interest upon certain securities, which seem to have been of questionable value. There is no real evidence as to Uhl's financial ability or property, nothing but hearsay. Uhl was on the witness stand, and, while questioned generally as to his ability to carry out this contract, was not questioned at all as to what property he owned or its value.

The burden of proving his financial ability rested upon the plaintiff in this case, and it may well be that from the testimony in the case the court concluded that he was not financially able to pay for this property. Neither Chapman nor Uhl made any attempt to carry out this contract until the time for doing so had lapsed. Uhl thereupon endeavored to get Chapman to accept certain bonds in part payment of the contract price, and this Chapman refused to do, and Uhl thereupon said that his errand was finished and he would go home. Neither did Irving demand a deed from Chapman nor endeavor in any way to see the deal through.

Under the circumstances, we think the judgment must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

JORDAN v. COMBINED AMUSEMENTS CO. (Civ. 2328.)

CORPORATIONS ⟹79—AGENTS FOR SALE OF STOCK—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action by the assignee of a subagent for his commission on the sale of corporate stock against the corporation on an alleged agreement to make direct payment to subagent, evidence held insufficient to sustain findings for plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by John A. Jordan against the Combined Amusements Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Walter R. Bacon, of San Francisco, for appellant. Ross & Ross, of San Mateo, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action against the defendant corporation for commissions on sales of its capital stock. We think the judgment must be reversed on the ground that the evidence does not sustain the findings made in plaintiff's favor.

The facts of the case as disclosed by the record may be stated briefly as follows: F. W. Swanton had entered into a written contract with the defendant whereby he undertook the sale of a certain number of shares of its capital stock, for which he was to receive 25 per cent. of the receipts from such sales as a commission. He in turn entered into a written agreement with W. G. Loomis, plaintiff's assignor, wherein it was provided that Loomis would co-operate and assist Swanton in the sale of the stock, for which service Swanton would pay him one-half of his commissions. Under this last agreement sales of stock were made by Loomis, and Swanton had made one payment of commission to him, when they, being both officials of the company, Swanton being president and Loomis secretary, directed the bookkeeper of the defendant to keep the account of their sales and commissions in the books of the corporation. This was done, and accordingly, when sales were made by either Swanton or Loomis, they would each be credited with 12½ per cent. of the proceeds of the sales, and would be charged with the expenses incurred by them and with commissions paid by the corporation to subagents, and the balance due each when settled was paid by the defendant's check.

It is not shown, so far as the evidence discloses, that it was the understanding of any of the parties to the transaction that the corporation was to assume the obligation of Swanton to pay Loomis the commission due him on sales of stock, or that its obligation to Swanton under the contract first mentioned was modified. The course it pursued in making payments to Loomis was apparently with the consent of Swanton, and a natural consequence of the assumption by the corporation of the task of entering upon its books the sales of stock made under its contract with Swanton so as to show the state of the account between Swanton and Loomis. The latter on the witness stand admitted that the corporation undertook the matter of bookkeeping merely as a convenience to Swanton and himself. It is true that the directors of the corporation knew that the commission accounts of Loomis and Swanton were being kept in the corporation's books, and it is true that Loomis testified that when he was pressing for payment of $11,000 due to him as commissions the directors promised payment as soon as the Panama-Pacific International Exposition opened, at which time the corporation, through the ownership of certain concessions in connection therewith, expected to be in daily receipt of sums of money. But this testimony is entirely consistent with the theory that the corporation was handling the bookkeeping, and making payments directly to Loomis on account of commissions earned by him under his contract with Swanton as a matter of accommodation and convenience. In other words, the corporation in effect admitted that it owed the amount claimed to Swanton, and that under its arrangement with him, and the latter's arrangement with Loomis, it would as soon as it was in possession of funds pay each the amount due. After Loomis had received about $18,000 in commissions and when he was pressing for payment of the balance due him, he accepted from Swanton an order drawn by the latter on the defendant, and which directed the defendant to pay to Loomis $2,000 and to charge the same to his personal account. This is a circumstance indicating that at that time the parties concerned regarded Swanton as the person primarily entitled to the commissions, and that he in turn was personally liable to Loomis for the proportion thereof to which he was entitled; and there is no evidence of any change in the relationship which Loomis bore to the corporation as regards this account, which would place his present claim on any different footing. Loomis also testified on cross-examination that the defendant employed an assistant bookkeeper at a salary of $150 per month, whose salary was charged in equal parts to the commission accounts of himself and Swanton. From this additional circumstance the inference is quite plain that the defendant consented to keeping the commission accounts between Swanton and Loomis merely as a matter of accommodation to them, and the course pursued by the corporation in this respect in no manner affected its original obligation to pay Swanton alone the commissions due upon sales of its capital stock.

Since the taking of the appeal the parties have settled their differences with respect to a part of the amount recovered, to wit, the amount of the draft hereinbefore referred to and which was the subject-matter of one of the counts of the complaint. Consequently as to that part of the judgment no action by this court is necessary. As to the remainder, for the reasons heretofore given, the judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. TAYLOR. (Cr. 416.)

CRIMINAL LAW ⟹1141(1) — APPEAL — PRESUMPTIONS.

Where no argument is made, and the court's attention is not called to any ground for interfering with the judgment, the presumptions are in favor of the regularity of the proceedings of the trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Earl Taylor was convicted of receiving stolen property, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Walter F. Lynch, of Stockton, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Defendant was convicted of receiving stolen property. His appeal was regularly taken, but it has not been prosecuted. No argument has been made in his behalf in this court, and therefore our attention has not been called to any ground for interfering with the judgment of the lower court. The presumptions are, of course, in favor of the regularity of the proceedings in the court below. Moreover, an examination of the record discloses sufficient evidence to justify the verdict without prejudicial error being shown therein. People v. Wagner, 171 Pac. 699.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

CITY OF VENICE et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2662.)

PROHIBITION 🔑24—MOOT QUESTIONS.

A proceeding to prohibit superior court from proceeding with trial of action to enjoin election has become moot, where the alternative writ was modified so as to permit defendants to make an amended return, but they have not done so, although the day of the election has passed and the alternative writ will be discharged, and the proceedings dismissed.

Petition for writ of prohibition by the City of Venice and others against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and Dana R. Weller, Judge thereof, to prohibit said court from proceeding further in the trial of a case, wherein Daniel W. Daniels is plaintiff, and the City of Venice and others defendants. Alternative writ discharged, and proceedings dismissed.

C. W. Lyon, City Atty., and S. W. Odell, both of Los Angeles, for petitioners. Paul W. Schenck and Richard Kittrelle, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding by which it was sought to prohibit the defendant superior court from proceeding further with the trial of an action entitled Daniel W. Daniels v. City of Venice et al., pending in that court. That action was one in which the plaintiff Daniels sought to obtain a decree of injunction to prevent the city of Venice and it officers from submitting to the electors of the city at the general election to be held therein on the 8th day of April, 1918, a question relating to the prohibition of the sale of alcoholic liquors in that city.

The defendants having filed their answer to the petition and made their return to the alternative writ theretofore issued, the matter was submitted for decision on the 29th day of March, 1918. Later, on that same day, the justices of this court, being of the opinion that the court did not have before it facts sufficient for an appropriate decision upon the merits, ordered that the restraining order theretofore issued in this case be modified to this effect: That the defendants be permitted to make findings of fact in the case of Daniels v. City of Venice et al., and to make an amended return showing the said findings of fact.

No amended return has been made, and the day of election in the city of Venice has passed. We may safely presume that there was no injunction against the submission of said question to the voters upon the subject above mentioned, and that the election has been held. Under these circumstances it is manifest that this has become a moot case, and that no useful purpose can be subserved by its further prosecution. For these reasons, it is ordered that the alternative writ be discharged, and this proceeding is hereby dismissed.

FARRELL v. CITY OF ONTARIO et al. (Civ. 2525.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑846—CHANGING LEVEL OF STREET—DRAINAGE OF SURFACE WATERS—INJUNCTION BY OWNER.

A property owner can enjoin the city from maintaining a paved street at such level and in such condition, different from its original state, that in time of rainfall or storm it will be a storm drain carrying off surface waters from other streets instead of a street for traffic, whereby the owner's land will be gullied and will have deposited upon it silt, sand, and other débris, although the work of changing the level of the street was completed before the owner sued for injunction.

2. INJUNCTION 🔑48—CONTINUING TRESPASS.

An injunction against a continuing trespass will not be denied merely because acts of trespass actually have been accomplished.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; H. T. Dewhirst, Judge.

Action by P. Farrell against the City of Ontario, a municipal corporation, E. R. Alter, as President of the Board of Trustees of the City, and George Chaffin, and others, Trustees of the City. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Joseph Scott, of Los Angeles, A. S. Maloney, of San Bernardino, and A. G. Ritter, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Archie D. Mitchell, of Ontario, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, which was entered after an order sustaining a general demurrer to the amended complaint, which complaint the plaintiff refused to amend.

[1] As shown by the complaint, the plaintiff is the owner of real property which lies immediately south of and adjacent to the city limits of the city of Ontario. For a number of years prior to the acts complained of in the complaint, there has been and now is in the city of Ontario a street known as San Antonio avenue, extending south from the northerly city limits and having its southerly terminous at the junction of plaintiff's property and the southerly limits of the city. The city of Ontario, on or about August 1, 1916, passed an ordinance and awarded a contract for the paving of San Antonio avenue south from a point about 1½ miles north of the junction of plaintiff's property with the southerly boundary of the city. Pursuant to these proceedings the defendants caused San Antonio avenue to be excavated below its former level and thereby brought that avenue to a lower level than the land through which the avenue runs. By so excavating the defendants increased the fall along the avenue from north to south to a considerable extent. By each and all of said acts the defendants have made of San Antonio avenue a water course and a drain which will inevitably collect and carry great volumes of surface water in time of storm and rainfall and pour said water in immense quantities upon the plaintiff's property in augmented and accelerated volume and will bring great quantities of said surface water upon plaintiff's land which would not have reached said land under natural conditions or if San Antonio avenue had been graded, paved, and curbed in a proper manner. The defendants have made no provisions of any kind for carrying off said surface water, which will be collected by and be diverted into said avenue through the acts of the defendants, and which by reason of said acts will flow down said avenue to and upon the plaintiff's real property to the great injury and damage thereof. There are various dirt roads and streets running east and west in the city of Ontario intersecting with San Antonio avenue. The defendants negligently have so arranged and diverted the surface drainage of the country through which said paved street passes as to cause the intersecting streets and the lands to the east and west of said avenue to pour their surface drainage into San Antonio avenue, and have so arranged San Antonio avenue that it will act as a principal canal, drain, and water conduit into which said intersecting streets and a great deal of the country surrounding said avenue will drain in time of rainfall or storm, so that thereby in time of rainfall or storm the avenue will be a storm drain instead of a street for traffic. The result will be that the avenue will collect all of the waters of the portion of the city through which it passes, contrary to the natural flow of said waters, and inevitably pour the same in great and increased volume upon the land of the plaintiff, to his great injury. The waters thus discharged upon the plaintiff's land will cause large portions of said land to be flooded in time of storm, will cause gullies to be made therein and will cause to be deposited upon said land large quantities of silt, sand, and various kinds of débris, whereby the said property will be damaged to a great and irremediable extent and will decrease materially in value.

The foregoing statement merely summarizes the facts, which are set forth in great detail in the complaint. Plaintiff's prayer is for an injunction to restrain the defendants from maintaining San Antonio avenue in the condition in which it now is or in any condition which will make the same a water course for the surface waters aforesaid, or that the defendants be required to provide suitable means to carry off from said avenue any storm waters which may pour down the avenue and effectually to prevent said waters from reaching or flooding or in any way damaging plaintiff's property.

We are satisfied that the complaint stated a cause of action. The facts alleged therein make fully as strong a case for the plaintiff as those shown in the recent case of Dick v. City of Los Angeles, 168 Pac. 703, where the city was held liable for damages caused to the plaintiff's real property by the grading of one of its streets adjacent thereto, whereby surface water, which theretofore had not flowed there, was caused to accumulate in unusual quantities and was turned upon the land of the plaintiff. See, also, Stanford v. San Francisco, 111 Cal. 198, 43 Pac. 605; Shaw v. Town of Sebastopol, 159 Cal. 623, 115 Pac. 213; Baker v. Town of Akron, 145 Iowa, 485, 122 N. W. 926, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 619; Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 1736.

[2] We find no merit in the suggestion made by respondents that the plaintiff is not entitled to an injunction because the work of which he complains had been completed before the commencement of this action. If it were important to do so, we might observe that according to the allegations of the complaint it does not appear that the flooding of his land has yet occurred. The charge is that such flooding inevitably will occur in times of rainfall or storm. Besides this, it is almost axiomatic to say that an injunction against a continuing trespass will not be denied merely because acts of trespass actually have been accomplished.

We concur: JAMES, J.; WORKS, Judge, pro tem.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Action by Thomas F. Watson and another against John Anderson. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Rinehart, of Oakland, for appellant. Hayes & Oliphant, of Oakland, for respondents.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. This is an action in which the plaintiffs recovered a judgment against the defendant for the failure of the latter to erect a building in a workmanlike manner in accordance with his contract so to do. Defendant appeals.

[1] The first point made by the appellant is that his demurrer should have been sustained, but, as the order made on demurrer does not appear in the transcript, the demurrer must be held to have been waived. Code Civ. Proc. § 670; Silcox v. Lang, 78 Cal. 118, 20 Pac. 297.

A number of findings made by the trial court are attacked on this appeal as unsupported by the evidence. It would serve no good purpose to particularize each of these findings here, and to specify and recite the evidence supporting them. It is sufficient to say that all of the material findings find support in the evidence.

[2] Certain rulings of the court made during the course of the trial to which appellant excepted will be considered. The first related to the admission by the court of certain specifications for the building which were not signed, and which it is therefore claimed could not form part of the contract in the case. These specifications were present when the contract was signed and corrected in some particulars on the night the contract was signed and before the signing of that instrument. They were not attached to the contract, nor were they actually and separately signed by the parties. The work, however, or most of it, was done in accordance with these specifications, and the defendant himself testified that, while no written specifications were ever signed, there were specifications covering the job, namely, these specifications to the admission of which exception was taken, and that he followed these specifications in doing the work as closely as he could; that he was supposed to follow these specifications in the mixing of the plaster, which was a vital matter, as will hereafter be seen. Some of this evidence was introduced as a part of defendant's case, and after the specifications had been admitted in evidence. If there was error originally in admitting these specifications, it was cured by this subsequent evidence.

[3] The second error occurring at the trial upon which the defendant relies related to the denial of a nonsuit. Briefly, the evidence as it stood at the time the nonsuit was denied showed that the plaintiffs had contracted with the defendant for the erection of the building; that by the contract the defendant had agreed to complete the building in a workmanlike manner and to superintend its construction; that the building after its erection leaked in all the rooms on its south and east sides; that the leakage was due to the defective construction of the fire walls, which were not constructed in a workmanlike manner. The motion for nonsuit was made specifically on the grounds that the plaintiffs had failed to prove that the defendant was in any way bound as guarantor or otherwise of the work performed by him in the construction of the building, and, second, that any damage resulting to plaintiffs from the construction of the building was due to the fault of plaintiffs equally with that of defendant.

As to the first ground it may be said that there was a provision in the contract to the effect that the contractor was to perform his agreement and complete the building in a workmanlike manner in accordance with the plans, drawings, and specifications for the same. While, as we have seen, no specifications were ever signed, the specifications above described and admitted in evidence did actually form a part of this contract, and were so considered by both parties while the building was being erected, although not actually attached to the contract. This showed an agreement on the part of the defendant to do his work in a workmanlike manner. There was no evidence at the time the nonsuit was denied to show that the plaintiffs were in any way responsible for the faulty construction complained of, and in view of this state of the record the motion for nonsuit was properly denied.

It may be noted here that this is not an action to foreclose a mechanics' lien, but for damages for failure on the part of the contractor to perform his contract.

[4] The defendant also specifies as grounds of reversal the irregular and unwarranted allowance by the court of evidence in rebuttal of the witness Melbourne. The court appears to have reopened the case for the purpose of permitting Melbourne to testify, and this was within its discretion.

The defendant's principal complaint against the decision of the court is that he was not responsible for the defects of the building, but upon this point the trial court found against him. These defects consisted of certain poor workmanship in the exterior walls of the building which permitted the rain to beat through and wet the inside thereof. The contract and specifications provided for three coats of plaster, and two coats of plaster only were used. The defendant contends that the whole trouble was caused by this omission of the third coat of plaster, and that he stated to the plaintiffs when the change was made that he would not be responsible for the resulting workmanship. However, there is much evidence in the record to the effect that it was not the thinness of the coating of plaster which caused the water to leak through the building, but rather the defective material of which it was composed and the manner in which the plastering was done. This plastering was done by one McTye, and defendant claims that McTye was employed by the plaintiffs to do this work; but the record discloses the fact that the trial court found that the plastering as executed was done by the defendant as a part of his contract, and the defendant himself testified that he was to make 10 per cent. on the total cost of the building, and the amount to be paid on the plastering was included in the amount to make the 10 per cent. There was other evidence showing that this work was part of his contract. The fact that a reduction of $228 was made upon the cost to the plaintiffs of doing this work because of an agreement subsequent to the execution of the contract to the effect that two coats of plaster should be used instead of three does not change the fact that the contractor was to do this work.

[5] Without going further into this matter, it may be said that, while there was a substantial conflict in the evidence upon several points, the court found on these points in favor of the plaintiffs, and the findings must therefore be permitted to stand.

LAMBERSON v. BASHORE. (Sac. 2599.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE ⚿150(1)—THEORY OF THE CASE BELOW—PLEADINGS.

Where plaintiff sued to recover wheat and defendant answered that the wheat was grown on his own land, and demanded that the case be certified from the justice's court to the superior court on the ground that title to real estate was involved, he could not thereafter be heard to claim that plaintiff's proof of ownership of the land at the time when the wheat was grown thereon did not suffice to establish plaintiff's ownership of the wheat.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚿1011(1)—SCOPE OF REVIEW—FINDINGS OF FACT.

The trial court's action in resolving a conflict of the evidence will not be reviewed upon appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by Charles G. Lamberson against John Bashore. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Thomas, of Oakland, for appellant. Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor. The action was originally brought in the justice's court to recover the possession of some wheat valued at $50. The defendant filed an answer, denying that the plaintiff was the owner of the wheat, or "that this defendant wrongfully came into the possession thereof, but alleges that the ground upon which it grew and from which it was harvested was and is the real estate of this defendant." Upon filing this answer the defendant demanded that the cause be certified to the superior court for trial upon the ground that the title to real estate was involved. The justice thereupon transferred the cause to the superior court, whereupon the defendant filed a cross-complaint, in which he sought to quiet title to the land, and also to have a trust declared thereon in his favor and to have such trust terminated. The case being called for trial the plaintiff introduced in evidence a judgment of the superior court entered prior to the time when the wheat in question was grown, in an action between the plaintiff and the defendant, quieting the title of the plaintiff to the land as against the claims of the defendant, and adjudging the plaintiff to be the owner and entitled to the possession of said land. With this proof the plaintiff rested his case, whereupon the defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that plaintiff had not shown any right or title to the wheat in question. The court denied this motion, whereupon the defendant offered some evidence in support of his claim of ownership of the land. The cause being submitted, the court found the plaintiff to be the owner of the land upon which the wheat had been grown and of the wheat grown thereon, and found against the defendant upon the issues tendered in his cross-complaint. From the judgment based upon these findings the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The main point which the appellant urges is that the court erred in denying his motion for nonsuit, and erred in adjudging the plaintiff to be the owner of the wheat in question upon the mere proof of the plaintiff that he was the owner of the land upon which the wheat had been grown. There is no merit whatever in this contention. The sole theory upon which the defendant's answer in the justice's court was drawn and upon which his demand for the transfer of the case to the superior court was predicated was that the plaintiff was not the owner or entitled to the possession of the wheat because he was not the owner or entitled to the possession of the land upon which such wheat had been grown. Having thus narrowed and defined the issues, and having obtained a transfer of the cause to the superior court upon the claim that the title to the wheat involved depended upon the issue as to the title to the land; that having further gone to the extent of attempting to affirmatively assert and seek to have quieted his title to the land in an action originally involving only the ownership and right of possession of the wheat, he could not be heard to claim in the trial court, and may not here assert, that the plaintiff's proof of ownership of the land at a time prior to that wherein the wheat was grown did not suffice to establish the plaintiff's right to the ownership and possession of the wheat grown upon his own land. The trial court, therefore, properly denied the defendant's motion for nonsuit.

[2] Assuming that there may have been some conflict as to the ownership of the land created by the evidence offered on behalf of the defendant after the denial of the motion for nonsuit, the trial court was entitled to resolve such conflict in the plaintiff's favor, and its findings and judgment in so doing will not be reviewed upon appeal.

Much space is devoted in the brief of counsel for appellant to a discussion of matters which were concluded in other litigation between the parties hereto and which are irrelevant to this appeal.

The members of the bar could well render much aid in the way of relieving courts of last resort of their accumulating business by withholding their aid in the taking and prosecution of unmeritorious appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

BLEVINS v. BLEVINS. (Sac. 2582.)

Rehearing Denied June 24, 1918.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑965—VENUE 🔑52 (1)—CHANGE OF VENUE—DISCRETION.

Applications for change of place of trial on the ground of convenience of witnesses are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and its action should not be disturbed on appeal, unless it clearly appears that there has been an abuse of discretion.

2. VENUE 🔑72—CHANGE—REOPENING HEARING—DISCRETION.

Where two days were occupied in hearing motion for transfer of case upon affidavits and stipulations of the respective parties, and plaintiff had every opportunity to amplify her former stipulation, so as to entitle her to a transfer, the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to reopen the hearing the day after the matter had been submitted for decision.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑965—REVIEW—DISCRETION—CHANGE OF VENUE—REOPENING HEARING.

Reopening hearing on motion for retransfer of case after matter had been submitted for decision being within discretion of trial court, his action thereon will not be disturbed, in the absence of manifest abuse.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by Anita P. Blevins against Michael Blevins. From an order denying motion for change of place of trial upon the ground of convenience of witnesses, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Howard Harron, of San Francisco, and Alva A. King, of Colusa, for appellant. Millington & Millington, of Colusa, and Frank Freeman, of Willow, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from an order denying a motion for change of place of trial upon the ground of convenience of witnesses. The action is one for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. It was originally commenced by the plaintiff in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Upon the appearance and demand of the defendant the action was transferred for trial to the county of Colusa, the place of the defendant's residence. Thereafter his answer and cross-complaint were filed, in the former of which the defendant made specific denials of the averments of the plaintiff's complaint in so far as they referred to his alleged acts of cruelty, while in his cross-complaint the defendant averred numerous acts of cruelty on the plaintiff's part. To this cross-complaint the plaintiff answered with specific denials. The issues having thus been made up, the plaintiff made her motion for the transfer of the case to the city and county of San Francisco upon the ground of convenience of witnesses, supporting the same with an affidavit containing the names of 25 witnesses residing in San Francisco, with a statement as to the matters in support of the averments of her complaint to which she expected each of said witnesses to testify. In resisting this motion the defendant filed a counter affidavit, denying that the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be promoted by the change of place of trial, deposing that the calendars of the several departments of the superior court of San Francisco were congested to the extent that a trial of this action could not be had for several months if the cause should be transferred to said court, while in the county of Colusa it could be tried speedily. The defendant further set forth the names of 19 witnesses residing in the county of Colusa or counties adjacent thereto, together with the matters to which he expected each of them to testify, in denial of the averments of the plaintiff's complaint, or in support of those of his cross-complaint. The motion came on for hearing on or about July 18, 1916, whereupon the plaintiff presented and filed a so-called stipulation in which she agreed that if certain specified witnesses named in the defendant's affidavit did not appear on his behalf at the trial of the cause if transferred to San Francisco, she would admit that said witnesses would testify to the matters set forth in the defendant's affidavit to which they were severally expected by him to testify. The admission as to 11 of these witnesses was unqualified, but as to the remaining 8 was so qualified as to largely impair its value. Upon the presentation and filing of this affidavit on plaintiff's behalf the defendant presented a stipulation on his behalf to the effect that as to 17 of the plaintiff's witnesses he would admit that their proposed testimony, as shown in the plaintiff's affidavit, was true and to be considered as admitted facts in the case, and that as to one other of the plaintiff's witnesses, subject to an objection to the admission of the testimony of said witness upon the ground that it was immaterial, he would admit that said witness would testify as stated in the plaintiff's affidavit. The matter came on for hearing before the court upon this state of the record. Two days were occupied in the hearing of the motion and the matter was then submitted for decision and taken under advisement by the court. On the following day after such submission counsel for plaintiff presented for filing a further stipulation to the effect that if the cause should be transferred to the city and county of San Francisco for trial, and if any of the enumerated witnesses in the defendant's affidavit did not appear at such trial the plaintiff would agree that each of the said witnesses for the defendant not so appearing would testify to such of the facts set forth in the defendant's affidavit as were admissible in evidence. The defendant objected to the consideration by the court of this belated stipulation unless the whole matter was reopened. The court declined to reopen the matter and for that reason refused to consider this latter stipulation, and thereafter denied the plaintiff's motion for a retransfer of the cause to San Francisco for trial. It is from the order so made that the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

[1] Applications for change of place of trial on the ground of convenience of witnesses are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and its action will not be disturbed upon appeal unless it clearly appears that there has been an abuse of that discretion. Hanchett v. Finch, 47 Cal. 192; Avila v. Meherin, 68 Cal. 478, 9 Pac. 428; Clanton v. Ruffner, 78 Cal. 268, 20 Pac. 676; Stockton, etc., Works v. Houser, 103 Cal. 377, 37 Pac. 179. From a careful examination of the pleadings in the case and of the issues tendered thereby and of the respective affidavits of the parties as to the witnesses upon whose testimony they relied to support or controvert these issues, we are convinced that as the case stood before the court at the time of its submission there would have been not only no abuse of discretion in the denial of the plaintiff's motion, but upon the showing made it should have been denied.

[2] The appellant, however, contends that she was entitled to have had considered her stipulation filed after the submission of the cause, containing further admissions as to the witnesses for the defendant. Conceding, for the sake of argument, that had this belated stipulation been presented before the submission of the cause it would have entitled the plaintiff to a transfer, we are unable to say that the court abused its discretion in refusing to reopen the hearing. The cause had been before the court for two days upon the affidavits and stipulations of the respective parties to it. During that hearing the plaintiff had every opportunity to have amplified her former stipulation by the presentation of her later one containing no new matter, but she permitted the cause to be heard, argued, and submitted without doing so, and apparently only brought to light the latter when, upon reflection, she feared that her former showing might prove insufficient.

[3] The matter of reopening a cause once submitted for decision in order to present proofs which were fully known during the pendency of the hearing to the party now seeking their admission was even more largely within the discretion of the trial court than was its conclusion upon the main issue, and hence its action thereon will not be disturbed upon appeal in the absence of a manifest abuse of discretion. There is no such showing in this case, and hence the conclusion of the court in relation to both matters will be upheld.

Order affirmed.

BROWN v. FRANKLIN FIRE INS. CO.

INSURANCE ⟹328(2)—ASSIGNMENT OF OWNER'S INTEREST—ACTIONS.

In an action on a fire insurance policy, where it appeared that plaintiff had installed a third party as his agent and employé in charge of the store insured, permitting him to conduct the business in plaintiff's name as owner under an agreement for a stated salary and a half interest as soon as the profits amounted to a certain sum, such agreement was one of employment, and did not constitute an assignment of an interest in the property so as to defeat plaintiff's right to recover under the policy.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John S. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by E. M. Brown against the Franklin Fire Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hindman & Yakey, of Los Angeles, for appellant. G. C. De Garmo, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an action to recover upon a fire insurance policy upon a stock of goods destroyed by fire. The question raised is whether or not there was an assignment of an interest in the property by plaintiff to one Stewart, or such a change of possession as would prevent plaintiff recovering under the terms of the policy. The court found that plaintiff owned the property. The evidence is that he purchased the store and paid therefor, and installed Stewart as his agent and employé in charge thereof, permitting Stewart to conduct the business in the latter's name as owner, under an agreement by which Stewart was to receive $125 a month and was to be given a half interest in the business as soon as the profits amounted to $2,000 (the estimated value of a half interest in the business). This was an agreement of employment, by which the employé was to be paid upon the basis of a stated salary and a proportion of the profits. He was not to share in the losses, and his ownership in the business was contingent upon the profits amounting to enough to purchase a half interest therein. The finding of the court that Brown owned the property is supported by the evidence.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

A corporation is estopped to deny the authority of its manager to guarantee the account of its customer with another company, where it has received benefits under the contract with its customer pursuant to which its manager guaranteed his accounts.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Armour & Co., a corporation, against R. Rosenberg & Sons Company, a corporation. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Herrington & Clausen, of San Francisco, for appellant. Louis H. Brownstone, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action brought upon two guaranty contracts executed by defendant corporation for the payment of certain merchandise sold and delivered by plaintiff corporation to one W. Y. Lawton, an individual doing business under the fictitious name of "American Packing Company." Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant on the ground that the manager of defendant corporation had no authority to execute the guaranties in question. Briefly stated the facts are as follows:

Plaintiff is a manufacturing and trading corporation dealing in food products. Defendant is a business corporation dealing among other things, in new and secondhand bottles. American Packing Company originally was a corporation engaged in manufacturing, and in the conduct of its business prepared and put up in bottles salad oil which it sold to the trade. It was adjudicated bankrupt in March, 1913. W. Y. Lawton was one of its stockholders, and after the bankruptcy proceedings were closed he began and continued in the same line of business on his personal account. Defendant was one of the creditors in bankruptcy of the American Packing Company, having a claim for the sum of $875.58. No dividend was received on this account from the assets of the defunct corporation, and it was a total loss to the defendant. Later on, however, the claim was paid in full by Lawton after he had resumed the business on his individual account. This payment was made in pursuance of an agreement with the manager of defendant under the following circumstances: When Lawton resumed business he did so under the name of the American Packing Company. At that time Lawton was, to the knowledge of defendant's director and manager, Joseph Rosenberg, without resources or commercial credit, and in order to begin and continue business he made an agreement with defendant, through Rosenberg, its general manager, by the terms of which defendant agreed to guarantee payment of Lawton's purchases of raw material for his manufacturers, and, further, to sell him on credit such bottles as he might need in preparing and putting up his food products. In return for this financial assistance on the part of defendant, Lawton as an individual assumed and agreed to pay to defendant the amount of its claim against the American Packing Company, and also agreed to purchase exclusively from defendant such bottles as his business needs required. In the bankruptcy proceedings certain personal property of the defunct corporation was sold, and as part of the agreement with Lawton defendant advanced the sum of $310 for its purchase, which Lawton agreed to repay, and this property was acquired by Lawton. These agreements were substantially performed by Lawton. He paid the amount of defendant's claim against the defunct company, repaid the sum advanced for the purchase of the bankrupt stock, and during the period from July, 1913, to April 26, 1916, purchased all his bottles from defendant amounting to some $15,000. This agreement between Lawton and defendant had not been authorized by defendant's board of directors by resolution or other formal order. It was, however, made known by Rosenberg to another director, who was also president of defendant company. Defendant's board of directors consisted of five persons, two of whom resided in Chicago, and they only came to San Francisco, where the principal place of business of the corporation was situated, once a year. The other three of whom Rosenberg was one, resided in San Francisco.

After the arrangement with Lawton, Rosenberg guaranteed in the name of his company, certain purchases made by Lawton, among them being those which are the subject of this action. Except as to the date, the guaranties are duplicates, and the amount of goods sold thereunder total $1,840. In form they are as follows:

"San Francisco, March 2, 1916.

"Armour & Co. Battery and Union, San Francisco, Cal.—Gentlemen: We herein guarantee payment of forty (40) barrels of salad oil to be delivered to the American Packing Company.

"Very truly yours,

"R. Rosenberg & Sons Co.,

"By J. R."

The evidence conclusively shows that Rosenberg had the entire and complete management of Rosenberg & Sons Company, defendant herein, and transacted all of its business, and this fact is not disputed. The evidence further establishes the execution by defendant, through its manager, of the guaranties sued upon, as well as many others covering a period of two years. The guaranties sued upon were the last of a series. Those theretofore made were for approximately $20,000, and were paid. It was proved that the sales to Lawton were made by plaintiff relying upon the guaranties and that invoices of goods and monthly statements were sent by plaintiff to defendant, which in turn forwarded them to Lawton. At first Lawton made payments direct to plaintiff, but later on he sent them to defendant, which from time to time sent them to plaintiff. It further appeared that defendant kept files of carbon copies of the numerous guaranties and of letters relating to Lawton's purchases and the state of his indebtedness. There were, however, no entries in defendant's books of account showing that guaranties had been executed. Under these circumstances it is the claim of appellant that Rosenberg had complete authority to bind his company in issuing the guaranties.

[1] It is not contended that trading corporations may indiscriminately guarantee their customers' purchases from others, or exercise generally the functions of corporations chartered for the special purpose of executing surety or indemnity contracts. Whether such a corporation would have power to lend its credit to another with whom it had no business, or where such an accommodation had no relation to the business it was organized to transact, is not here presented. The rule denying corporations the right under such circumstances is one of strict construction applied by the earlier cases based upon the doctrine of ultra vires, that a corporation may not enter into a contract or do any act not specifically authorized. The contract here sued upon involves a different principle. The question presented by the different assignments of error is whether or not the general manager of a trading corporation has the implied power to guarantee debts or obligations of a customer or other person when such course is deemed by him necessary for the promotion of the business of the corporation. The obligation here guaranteed had relation to the corporation's own interest and was designed to promote its own business. In such a case the rule now seems to be firmly established that trading corporations may, in furtherance of their own interests, extend financial aid to their customers. Hess v. Sloane, 66 App. Div. 522, 73 N. Y. Supp. 313; Bacon v. Montauk, 130 App. Div. 737, 115 N. Y. Supp. 617; Winterfield v. Cream City, 96 Wis. 239, 71 N. W. 101; Koehler v. Reinheimer, 26 App. Div. 1, 49 N. Y. Supp. 755; Timm v. Grand Rapids, 160 Mich. 371, 125 N. W. 357, 358, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 186; McQuaide v. Enterprise Brewing Co., 14 Cal. App. 315, 111 Pac. 927. And this aid may be in the form of a guaranty. 10 Cyc. 1105. Nor does the fact, as suggested by counsel for respondent, that the arrangement did not prove profitable, affect the power. The right is not dependent upon, nor is it in any manner impaired by, the fact that the welfare of the corporation was not promoted by the transaction. The power existing, the result of its exercise becomes unimportant.

In the instant case it is manifest that the contract entered into by Rosenberg and Lawton was one made in furtherance of the interest of the corporation defendant. The American Packing Company, a customer, was in its debt to a considerable amount, which debt without the arrangement was a total loss. The agreement for the payment of the debt and the promise of Lawton to purchase exclusively from the defendant all the bottles required in his business, establish this fact. In both of these particulars the corporation was benefited by the agreement. Concluding, as we do, that the defendant corporation, therefore, had the implied power to enter into this contract, it only remains to be considered whether or not under the circumstances Rosenberg, as manager, had ostensible power to execute the guaranties there being no evidence of express authorization.

[2] As before stated, Rosenberg was not only a director of the company, but for several years he had entire and exclusive control and management of its business. After making the agreement he executed guaranties in conformity therewith during a long period of time and covering numerous transactions. This authority was never questioned. The bills guaranteed were always paid. This course of business dealing was sufficient to justify plaintiff in believing that Rosenberg had the power to contract as he did, and the defendant corporation was bound by his acts to the same extent as though his power was expressly granted. 10 Cyc. 937.

[3] In addition thereto we think that the defendant is further estopped to deny the authority of its manager. Having received benefits under the contract it should not be permitted to repudiate the burdens resulting therefrom. A discussion of the claimed ratification is unnecessary.

For the reasons given the judgment is reversed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1011(1)—REVIEW—TRIAL BY COURT—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to set aside an assignment on the ground of mental incapacity and undue influence, where action is brought after death of assignor, the trial court's preference of the evidence of mother, brothers, and sister, who saw assignor only occasionally during last few years of life, to that of wife and nurses, who saw him every day, held no abuse of right given trial court to weigh evidence.

2. EVIDENCE 🔑474(4)—OPINION EVIDENCE—MENTAL INCAPACITY—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

In an action to set aside an assignment on the ground of mental incapacity and undue influence, where action is instituted following death of assignor, the mother, brothers, and sisters of assignor may testify as intimate acquaintances of assignor, although their visits to him were infrequent during last few years of his life.

3. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION 🔑86 — ASSIGNMENT OF INTEREST IN ESTATE—VALIDITY—EVIDENCE.

Where the estate of a deceased person is incorporated, an assignment of a one-eighth interest in such estate, in return for one-eighth of the stock of such corporation, will not be set aside on the ground of mental incapacity and undue influence, except upon considerable preponderance of evidence.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1071(1)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

Court's finding that a cause of action was barred by laches, if error, was harmless, where there was a complete hearing of the case on its merits.

Action by Nette Sexton Dow, a widow, and others against George E. Dow Estate Company, a corporation, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Mastick & Partridge and H. F. Chadbourne, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Coogan & O'Connor and Julius Kahn, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

ZOOK, Judge pro tem. This is an action by the widow and minor child of Edwin Tyson Dow, deceased, against the mother, brothers, and sister of said decedent and certain corporation defendants to set aside, upon the ground of decedent's mental incapacity and the undue influence of his relatives, a certain transaction whereby Edwin Tyson Dow transferred his one-eighth interest in his father's estate to the defendant George E. Dow Estate Company, a corporation, and took one-eighth of the stock of the corporation in return therefor. Defendants had judgment. and as the questions raised on this appeal may be briefly disposed of, it will be unnecessary to set forth facts of the case herein.

[1-3] Appellants' main contention is that the evidence was insufficient to support the judgment, and their brief is devoted mainly to a discussion of the evidence. They claim that, because their witnesses, the wife, nurses, and the intimates of Dow saw him every day during his last illness, which began some time prior to the transfer, their testimony should, as a matter of law, have been accepted in preference to that of defendants' witnesses, who saw Dow only occasionally, and that the failure of the trial judge so to hold was an abuse of discretion, requiring a reversal of the judgment. In support of this rather unusual contention, a more startling claim is made, namely, that the mother, brothers, and sisters of decedent were not qualified as intimate acquaintances because their visits to him during the last few years of his life were rather infrequent. Both points are equally devoid of merit. We have carefully examined the whole record, and find ample evidence to support the court's finding in support of the validity of the transfer. Indeed, it would require a considerable preponderance of evidence to upset the transfer under any circumstance, for it is apparent that, in making the transfer, the decedent in effect changed the form only of his interest in his father's estate, without altering the extent thereof in the slightest degree.

[4] The only other question raised is as to the correctness of the court's finding that the action was barred by laches. As there was a complete hearing of the case on its merits and a finding adverse to appellant thereon, the question whether or not the cause of action was barred becomes wholly immaterial.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GONZALES et al. (Cr. 421.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1208(9)—SENTENCE—INDETERMINATE SENTENCE LAW.

Since under Pen. Code, § 213, robbery is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one year, the indeterminate sentence law (Pen. Code, § 1168, as added by St. 1917, p. 665) applies on conviction for robbery.

2. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑991(3)—SENTENCE—INDETERMINATE SENTENCE LAW.

Since to make a crime subject to the indeterminate sentence law (Pen. Code, § 1168, as added by St. 1917, p. 665) it need not be punishable by penitentiary imprisonment for a definite term, Pen. Code, § 671, providing that where the maximum term is not fixed by statute, the court may, in its discretion, fix such maximum term, does not require, on conviction for robbery, or other offenses subject to the indeterminate sentence law, that the judge shall fix a maximum term.

3. ROBBERY 🔑30 — SENTENCE — MAXIMUM TERM.

Pen. Code, § 213, making robbery punishable by penitentiary imprisonment for not less than one year, is within the indeterminate sentence law (Pen. Code, § 671), and thereunder robbery may be punished by maximum penalty of imprisonment for life.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Pedro Gonzales and Joe Valeskes were convicted of robbery, and they appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Fred J. Harris, of Sacramento, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. [1] The appeal is from the judgment of conviction sentencing the defendants to a term of imprisonment in the state prison, the former for a period of 15 years, and the latter for 10 years. The only question involved herein is as to the form of the judgment. Appellants contend that under the provisions of section 1168 of the Penal Code (Stats. 1917, p. 665), providing for an indeterminate sentence the court should not have fixed the term or duration of the punishment. The language of that section is:

> "Every person convicted of a public offense, for which public offense punishment by imprisonment in any reformatory or the state prison is now prescribed by law * * * shall be sentenced to be confined in the state prison, but the court in imposing such sentence shall not fix the term or duration of the period of imprisonment."

There is no question that said act of the Legislature was in effect at the time the offense herein was committed, and we may add that the constitutionality of said act has been determined by the Supreme Court in the matter of the application of Charles Lee on Habeas Corpus, 171 Pac. 958. The language as to the form of the sentence is so plain as not to admit of discussion. We may state that the provision was incidentally alluded to in the decision of this court in the case of the People v. Charles Lee, 172 Pac. 158.

The only question remaining is whether the offense is one for which punishment by imprisonment in any reformatory or the state prison is now prescribed by law or was so prescribed at the time the offense was committed. As to this there can be no possible doubt. Section 213 of the Penal Code provides:

> "Robbery is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one year."

This was in force at all the times herein mentioned. In fact, it has been the law since 1872. It is therefore entirely manifest that punishment for the crime of which the appellants were convicted was and is prescribed by the law to be imprisonment in the state prison. Hence the indeterminate sentence law is applicable, and the judgment should have been in the form which we have indicated.

[2] It seems hardly necessary to go any further in consideration of the matter, but a moment's attention may be devoted to the contention of respondent that the duty was cast upon the lower court to fix the maximum punishment by virtue of section 671 of the Penal Code providing:

> "Whenever any person is declared punishable for a crime by imprisonment in the state [prison] for a term not less than any specified number of years, and no limit to the duration of such imprisonment is declared, the court authorized to pronounce judgment upon such conviction may, in its discretion, sentence such offender to imprisonment during his natural life, or for any number of years not less than that prescribed."

But it is manifest that said section does not authorize any punishment other than imprisonment in the state prison. It is equally as clear from that section as from said section 213 that robbery is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, and hence within the terms of said indeterminate sentence law. To make the crime subject to the provisions of this latter act it is not necessary that the crime be punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a definite term fixed by the law. It is sufficient if it be thus punishable for any term.

Indeed, where there is a maximum and minimum term prescribed by the law, it was left prior to said act of 1917 to the discretion of the court to impose the punishment within these limits. That was the case in nearly all the penitentiary offenses, but the purpose of the new law was to take from the trial judge the discretion of fixing definitely the term of imprisonment and to vest it in the prison directors within the limits prescribed by the Penal Code.

[3] We can see no merit in the claim that the law does not prescribe the maximum penalty for the crime of robbery. The maximum penalty "prescribed by the law" is the extreme penalty that the law authorizes to be imposed; that is, life imprisonment in the present case, as we have seen.

The two sections of the Penal Code may be read together, and they amount to this:

> "Robbery is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one year and it may be for life."

As before suggested, the fact that a maximum and a minimum penalty is prescribed necessarily implied a discretion to be exercised by the judge pronouncing the sentence, and the circumstance that such discretion is specifically mentioned in said section 671 does not affect the legal aspect of the case.

It is clear that the judgment is informal, and it is therefore reversed, with direction to the lower court to pronounce judgment in accordance with said indeterminate sentence law of 1917.

FOREMAN v. HUNTER LUMBER CO. et al. (Civ. 2330.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑92, 376(1)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—LIABILITY OF MASTER FOR NEGLIGENCE OF PHYSICIAN.

The liability of a master and its surety at common law and under the Employers' Liability Law (St. 1911, p. 796) for the negligence of a physician employed to treat an injured employé is secondary to and dependent upon proof of the physician's negligence.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑385(16) — INJURIES TO SERVANT — EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY LAW—MEDICAL SERVICES.

Under Employers' Liability Law, § 8, subd. 1, providing liability of master for medical services to injured employé, the master is under no duty to furnish medical services for more than 90 days after injury.

3. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS 🔑18(4)—ACTIONS FOR NEGLIGENCE — PLEADING — COMPLAINT—RES IPSA LOQUITUR—NON SEQUITUR.

A complaint alleging a course of treatment entirely consistent with the physician's exercise of all necessary care and skill, but alleging nonsuccess of the treatment, is insufficient to charge negligence or malpractice; the case not being res ipsa loquitur, and the complaint pleading a non sequitur.

4. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS 🔑14(1)—CONTRACTS OF EMPLOYMENT—LIABILITY.

The implied contract of a physician taking a case is that he possesses a reasonable degree of learning and skill in his profession, and that he will apply the same to the treatment of the case, and if he possess and use such skill therein, he is not liable for the result, for a physician of necessity is not a warrantor of cures.

5. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS 🔑15—NEGLIGENCE—DEFINITION.

Negligence on the part of a physician consists in his doing something which he should not have done, or omitting to do something which he should have done.

6. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS 🔑18(4)—ACTIONS FOR NEGLIGENCE — PLEADING — PRESUMPTION.

A complaint to charge a physician with liability for negligence must allege such negligent act or omission, for otherwise it will be presumed he used the necessary care and skill.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Donahue, Judge.

Action by James Foreman against the Hunter Lumber Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Austin Lewis and R. M. Royce, both of Oakland, for appellant. Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondents Hunter Lumber Co. and others. D. C. Dutton, of Oakland (M. C. McDonough, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent Lohse.

ZOOK, Judge pro tem. In this action plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendants after demurrer sustained to plaintiff's amended complaint. The cause of action attempted to be stated arises out of an injury received by plaintiff on March 18, 1913, while in the employ of defendant lumber company, which, at the time of the accident, was operating under the Employer's Liability Law of 1911, commonly known as the Roseberry Act. The defendant surety company was the insurer for the lumber company, and defendant Lohse was the physician employed by the two corporations to treat plaintiff for the injury received. Each of the defendants demurred generally and specially to the complaint.

[1] The brief of the corporation defendants contained a very able discussion of the nature and extent of the liability of an employer, at common law and under the Roseberry Act, for the negligence of a physician engaged by the employer to treat an injured employé; but inasmuch as the liability of the employer and its surety in such a case is secondary to, and dependent upon, a showing of negligence on the part of the physician, it will not be necessary for this court to consider the questions above referred to, for the complaint fails to state a case of negligence or malpractice on the part of the attending physician.

[2, 3] The allegations of the complaint in which plaintiff seeks to show this negligence on the part of defendant Dr. Lohse commence with a statement that Dr. Lohse undertook to treat plaintiff, "but did not use due, proper, reasonable, or any care or skill in treating plaintiff's injury, but, on the contrary, carelessly and negligently treated said injury in this." Then follow several paragraphs in which the course of treatment pursued by the doctor is set forth. It is alleged that for a time plaintiff's leg remained unset, except in splints, and that on a certain day the splints were removed, the leg set, and a cast put on; that thereafter the cast was taken off, and, it being found that the leg had not knitted, it was rebroken and reset and a plate and longer cast put on, which last cast was taken off after 9 days and a shorter cast put on, and that thereafter plaintiff was discharged by Dr. Lohse, returned home, and remained in bed for four weeks. On or about July 4, 1913, and more than 90 days after the accident, it was discovered that the leg bones were not knitting, and plaintiff called upon the defendants to furnish the treatment necessary to cure him, which demand was refused. It may be here noted that under the provisions of the Roseberry Act (section 8) there is no duty imposed upon the employer to furnish treatment to an injured employé for more than 90 days after the injury, and the complaint alleges that Dr. Lohse was employed to treat plaintiff for such 90-day period. Therefore no liability on the part of any of the defendants can be predicated on their refusal to treat the plaintiff after the 18th day of June, 1913. The remaining allegations of the complaint set forth the course of treatment pursued by physicians thereafter employed by plaintiff, the expenses incurred by plaintiff in obtaining such treatment, and a general damage clause.

In pleading their case in the manner above set forth, plaintiff's counsel evidently misapprehended the law as to the duty and liability of physician to client. Their brief is wholly directed to the question of the liability of the corporation defendants, and the sole reference to the law of physician and patient to be found in their brief is the following phrase: "As to the liability of Lohse, it seems a case of res ipsa loquitur." What they have really pleaded is a non sequitur, for the description of the course of treatment pursued by Dr. Lohse, contained in the complaint, is entirely consistent with his having exercised all necessary care and skill in treating plaintiff, and it does not follow from the allegation of the nonsuccess of the treatment that Dr. Lohse was negligent.

[4-6] As was said in Houghton v. Dickson, 29 Cal. App. 321, 155 Pac. 128, the implied contract of a physician in taking a case is that he possesses a reasonable degree of learning and skill in his profession, and that he will apply the same to the treatment of the case; and if he possess and use such skill therein, he is not liable for the result, for a physician of necessity is not a warrantor of cures. "Negligence on the part of a physician consists in his doing something which he should not have done, or omitting to do something which he should have done" (McGraw v. Kerr, 23 Colo. App. 163, 128 Pac. 870), and in order to charge him with liability, some such negligent act or omission must be alleged in the pleading. In the absence of such allegation, it will be presumed that the physician has used the necessary care and skill. Houghton v. Dickson, supra, and cases there cited.

The demurrers were properly sustained. Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GASTONE. (Cr. 588.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 23, 1918.)

Criminal Law ⚷1160—Appeal—Review—Denial of New Trial.

The denial of new trial, involving finding on conflicting evidence against the charges of misconduct of the district attorney, must prevail on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Peter Gastone was convicted of grand larceny, and from the judgment and a denial of new trial appeals. Affirmed.

John L. Richardson and T. E. Parke, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

On behalf of appellant it is claimed that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, in that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict; that the verdict is "contrary to law, in that the evidence taken does not establish as matter of law that the defendant committed the offense found by the jury by the verdict." These contentions are without merit. The testimony of the complaining witness fully described the facts constituting the crime charged and identified the defendant as the guilty person. Our attention is not directed to any errors claimed in the course of the trial, either in the reception or rejection of evidence or in the instructions given to the jury. The facts found as indicated by the verdict of the jury are entirely sufficient to establish the commission of the offense by the defendant.

The only other point made in support of the appeal relates to alleged misconduct on the part of the district attorney at the trial of the case. The defendant testified as a witness in his own behalf. In giving that testimony he stated that at the time of his arrest the complaining witness Eppick was present; that Eppick took a picture from his pocket and said, "He is the man." On cross-examination of the defendant the district attorney showed to the witness a photograph and asked if that was the picture which he saw at the time referred to in his direct testimony and if he had seen that picture before. The witness having replied in the negative to these two questions, the district attorney asked: "Do you know whose picture that is?" The witness replied, "That is me." The district attorney then offered the picture "for identification," but it was not received in evidence and was not referred to any further during the trial.

The defendant moved for a new trial on various grounds, including that of misconduct of the district attorney prejudicial to the defendant occurring during the progress of the trial. In support of this motion affidavits were introduced with respect to the conduct of the district attorney at the time of the above-mentioned cross-examination of the defendant with reference to the photograph. The photograph of the defendant did not show him in prison garb, but it did have across the breast in plain figures the number 15545. In one of the affidavits the affiant referred to a conversation which he said he had with the deputy district attorney after the trial of this case in which, according to affiant, the deputy district attorney said:

> "That something was brought out on direct examination by counsel for defendant and that he (the said deputy district attorney) had a picture in his file of the defendant taken while the defendant was in custody and that it had a big prison number on it, and that he took the picture and held it in his hand, with the back of his hand toward defendant's attorney and to the court and to the court reporter, but in plain view of the jury; that he held it that way until he walked up to the defendant and asked him the question, 'Is that your picture?' that upon defendant answering that it was, the deputy district attorney turned to the clerk and asked that it be marked for identification, but that he never intended to introduce it and he never did."

The deputy district attorney testified in response to this and the other affidavits which were offered in support of the motion for a new trial and positively denied the facts thus charged against him. In passing upon the motion for a new trial the court found in favor of the district attorney with respect to the charges involving his alleged misconduct. In view of the conflicting evidence presented, the conclusion of the trial court as to those matters must prevail here.

The judgment is affirmed, and the order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial is affirmed.

In an action for a wrongful death brought by the surviving wife and children as heirs, it was not error to instruct that the action was properly brought under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, providing that when the death of a person not being a minor is caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another his heirs or personal representatives may maintain an action for damages against the person causing the death, and not under Civ. Code, § 1970, giving a right of action for the death of a servant to the widow, children, dependent parents, and dependent brothers and sisters, in the order named, and contention that action should have been maintained for benefit of widow alone, instead of widow and children, was not sustainable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Flora A. Valentine and others against W. W. Hayes and another. From an order granting a new trial as to defendant Hayes, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Stanley Moore and Geo. K. Ford, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Jas. Alva Watt and Rolla B. Watt, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action brought to recover the sum of $50,000 as damages for the death of one Clarence C. Valentine, caused by a fall from a building in course of construction, and alleged to have been due to the negligence of defendants. The action was instituted by Flora A. Valentine as the surviving wife, and by the other plaintiffs as surviving children of the deceased. Defendant Bickel, the owner of the building, was made a party defendant by reason of the existence of the state statute and a city ordinance making it incumbent upon the contractors for the erection of a building of more than two stories to cover all beams and girders with flooring to prevent workmen from falling more than one floor, and upon the owner where the contractor has neglected to do so. At the conclusion of plaintiffs' case the action was dismissed as to defendant

Bickel on her motion for a nonsuit upon the ground that the evidence showed that this duty was complied with by the contractor, and that the accident occurred in a light well where there was to be no permanent flooring. The trial then proceeded as to defendant Hayes, the contractor, and resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiffs in the sum of $7,500.

[1] The action was begun and prosecuted under section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which in substance provides that when the death of a person not being a minor is caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, his heirs or personal representatives may maintain an action for damages against the person causing the death. The trial court so instructed the jury, and upon his motion for a new trial defendant Hayes urged as one of his grounds in support of the motion that this instruction was erroneous, claiming that in actions for damages where the relation of master and servant existed, section 1970 of the Civil Code was the only section authorizing such action. This section gives a right of action to the widow, children, dependent parents, and dependent brothers and sisters in the order of their precedence therein stated. It was urged that this action should have been maintained for the benefit of the widow alone, and not for the benefit of the widow and children. The trial court concurred in this view of the case, and granted a new trial on the sole ground that the giving of the instruction relating to section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure constituted error. Subsequent to the perfecting of this appeal the Supreme Court had occasion to pass upon this very question (Gonsalves v. Petaluma, etc., Ry. Co., 173 Cal. 264, 159 Pac. 724); and it is conceded—as indeed it must be—that the later view of the law adopted by the trial court was incorrect, and that the giving of the instruction on account of which the new trial was granted did not constitute error.

[2] The motion for a new trial, however, was based upon several grounds; and notwithstanding the reason the court below gave for granting the order, we are not concluded by such reason, but have the right from an examination of the record to investigate and determine if the new trial should have been granted upon any of the grounds set forth in the notice of intention, except as to the sufficiency of the evidence where it is conflicting. Thompson v. Cal. Const. Co., 148 Cal. 35, 82 Pac. 367.

[3] The main ground relied on here in support of the order is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; it being claimed that the evidence shows conclusively and without conflict that the deceased met his death through no fault on the part of the defendant. We are of the opinion that the record supports this contention. It appears from the evidence that the defendant Hayes was engaged as a contractor to construct a certain building in San Francisco for one Abby Frink Bickel, and that deceased was employed by defendant as a carpenter on such building, where he met with the accident which resulted in his death. In the construction of the building the defendant provided a system of ladders in a light well for his employés to be used in ascending to and descending from their work. At each floor planks were run across the light well resting on the window sills. From these platforms ladders were run, each ladder being one floor in height, running from alternating sides of the light well. The platforms so constructed were about 2 feet 6 inches in width, filling up the entire space in the windows between which they extended, and the boards thereof were 2 inches thick. The ladders resting upon these platforms were about 22 inches wide at the bottom and 18 inches wide at the top. The platforms were secured by nails, and there is no evidence to show that the system adopted was not strong and substantial and reasonably safe for the purpose for which it was used. At the time deceased received the injuries resulting in his death nothing gave way or broke about the ladders or platforms. The evidence further shows that when the accident happened deceased was going down one of the ladders carrying a lot of tools, with his face outward from the ladder and his back turned thereto, and that he lost his balance and fell, receiving the injuries from which he died.

These facts are without contradiction, and conclusively show that the accident was not caused by any improper or faulty or defective construction or dangerous place of work, but solely through the carelessness and negligence of the deceased. It is true plaintiffs introduced evidence to show that the ladder from which deceased fell was not securely nailed at the top a week after the accident occurred. This testimony was objected to as being too remote; it having appeared in evidence that the ladder had been in continuous use for all of this intervening period by from 15 to 25 men daily, and might have broken loose from such use. Assuming the evidence to have been properly admitted, however, it can have no weight in the face of the positive and undisputed testimony of several witnesses to the effect that both before and after and at the very time of the accident the ladder was securely fastened.

[4] One of the questions presented was whether or not the deceased was provided with a safe place to work. The word "safe," as used in connection with the duty of employers to furnish a reasonably safe place to work, does not mean a place so made and guarded that it precludes all possibility of danger. Many employments are in themselves dangerous; and it has been said that it involves no paradox to say that a place of danger may be safe in the proper sense of the word. Martin v. Des Moines Edison Light Co., 131 Iowa, 724, 106 N. W. 359. In the construction of buildings some places must of necessity present danger. "Safe place to work" is a relative term as to which the word "reasonably" is important; and the safety of the place is to be judged by the nature of the work. Saversnick v. Schwarzchild, 141 Mo. App. 509, 125 S. W. 1192; Welch v. Carlucci Stone Co., 215 Pa. 34, 64 Atl. 392, 7 Ann. Cas. 299. An absolutely safe place of labor is not required of an employer. It is to be reasonably safe having regard to the character of the work itself.

In Spivok v. Independent Sash & Door Co., 173 Cal. 438, 160 Pac. 565, it is said:

> "Carpenters walk freely and unhesitatingly, and expect to walk, over floor joists before the floor is laid. One would not look to see a cause of action for injuries occasioned by an inadvertent slip of a carpenter walking over such floor joists, predicated upon the fact that the employer had not caused the floor to be laid so as to make the place of labor safe."

Here no duty was imposed upon defendant to maintain floors in the place of the accident. The evidence to our minds shows conclusively that the proximate cause of the injury was the negligence of deceased in descending the ladder in the hazardous and unusual manner in which he did with his arms filled with tools, and that this act, and not any act or omission of defendant Hayes, was the cause of the injury complained of.

For the reasons given the order granting a new trial is affirmed.

1. Municipal Corporations 🔑108—Initiative and Referendum—Certificate.

Under St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 131 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1915, Act 1624), requiring a city clerk to examine and from the records of registration ascertain whether or not an initiative petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified electors, and attach to such petition his certificate showing the result of such examination, a city clerk is required personally to examine the records; otherwise he has no jurisdiction to make a certificate, and one based on the report of the county clerk after examination of the registration record, at request of city clerk, is invalid.

2. Certiorari 🔑64(1)—Review — Matters Considered.

On certiorari to review sufficiency of city clerk's certificate as to requisite number of signatures to an initiative petition, a supplemental return, containing a new certificate, made after the writ issued, cannot be considered.

Certiorari by F. B. Gabbert against H. R. Perry, City Clerk of the City of Needles, the City of Needles, a municipal corporation, John Lorimer, E. N. Baker, Charles Battye, C. H. Burt, F. W. Quirmbach, Members of the Board of Trustees of the City of Needles, to review an act of the City Clerk in certifying to the sufficiency of an initiative petition. Certificate annulled.

Fredericks & Hanna and Byron C. Hanna, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner. W. J. Bailey, City Atty., of Needles, and S. W. Odell, of Pasadena, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Certiorari. This is a proceeding to review the action of the defendant city clerk of the city of Needles whereby on March 4, 1918, he certified to the sufficiency of an initiative petition by which the board of trustees of the city of Needles was petitioned to adopt an ordinance set forth in the petition, or to submit the question of adopting said ordinance to the qualified electors of the city of Needles at the general municipal election to be held in said city on the 8th day of April, 1918. The proposed ordinance is an ordinance providing that the sale of intoxicating liquors for beverages be prohibited in the city of Needles after the 31st day of December, 1918.

[1] The proceedings initiated by said petition are governed by the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for direct legislation by cities and towns, including initiative and referendum," approved January 2, 1912. Stats. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 131, being Act No. 1624 of Deering's Gen. Laws. In that statute it is provided that within ten days from the date of filing the petition, "the clerk shall examine, and from the records of registration ascertain whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified electors, and he shall attach to said petition his certificate showing the result of said examination." The clerk's return to the writ issued herein shows that the initiative petition was filed in his office on the 27th day of February, 1918; that he personally examined the petition and the signatures thereon and the affidavits thereto annexed; that on February 23, 1918, he sent the petition to L. R. Patty, county clerk at San Bernardino, Cal., together with a letter stating that, "I am inclosing herewith a petition which I wish you would have checked in your office and return same by February 28th or March 1st, with any changes that may be necessary;" that the said L. R. Patty did therepon make a comparison of the said petition with the affidavits of registration, known as the great register, in his office, and report the facts contained in the certificate signed by the defendant clerk and attached to the original initiative petition.

The statute requires that "if the petition shall be found to be sufficient, the clerk shall submit the same to the legislative body at its next regular session." It is manifest that the city clerk is without authority to make any certificate concerning the sufficiency of the petition until after he shall have examined the records of registration and by such examination ascertained whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified electors. The duty imposed upon him involves an inquiry of a judicial nature. He cannot delegate this duty to the county clerk. The certificate cannot be made arbitrarily, but must be based upon the evidence obtained by the city clerk by making the examination required by the statute. Without taking the evidence, he has no jurisdiction to make the certificate.

[2] In his supplemental return filed herein on April 5, 1918, the defendant clerk states that, on the 4th day of April, 1918, he personally took said petition to the office of the county clerk of San Bernardino county, and personally examined and from the records of registration ascertained whether or not said petition was signed by the requisite number of qualified electors; and thereupon he has made a new certificate, dated April 4, 1918, which certificate is set forth in the supplemental return, and wherein he certifies that the petition was signed by the requisite number of qualified electors. The certificate thus made on April 4, 1918, is entirely irrelevant to the case now before us. The writ issued by this court is a writ issued for the purpose of testing the jurisdiction of the clerk to make the certificate made by him on March 4, 1918. With his actions subsequent to that date we are not concerned.

The said certificate of March 4, 1918, is annulled.

On the issue of location of boundary line between adjacent lots, proof that one adjoining landowner conveyed to the city a strip along one side of his property of a certain length, and that the other owner conveyed a similar strip beginning where the other strip ended, did not prove a mutual agreement to fix the common boundary line at a point which would give the first owner a frontage of the length of the strip first conveyed, especially where the first owner refused to pay an assessment on that extent of frontage, and the second owner, although paying, expressed doubt on the subject.

6. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS 🔑315(5)—DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION—DESCRIPTION OF LAND.

Right of distributees to a greater tract of land is not defeated by decree of distribution describing land by metes and bounds, it also distributing, in general language, all the land to which deceased had title.

7. BOUNDARIES 🔑36(3, 4)—EVIDENCE—MAPS AND REPORTS.

On the issue of the boundaries of property reports of street commissioners and accompanying maps, in proceedings to open a street, were inadmissible, where the surveyor who made the original map testified he could not say that he measured the lines on the ground, and he made no field notes, and there was no evidence that the proceedings were called to the property owner's attention.

8. EVIDENCE 🔑355(1)—REFRESHING MEMORY—MEMORANDA.

Memoranda from which, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2047, a witness who made them may refresh his memory, are not admissible as independent evidence.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Samuel E. Crow, Judge.

Suit by Giselda Schiappa Pietra Marcone and others against Richard H. Dowell. From judgment for plaintiffs and from order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Canfield & Starbuck, of Santa Barbara, for appellant. Edward M. Selby, of Los Angeles, and Orestes Orr, of Ventura, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The suit was one to quiet title. Appellant contends that in reality it was an action in ejectment; that, as respondents must depend upon the strength of their own title rather than any supposed weakness in that of their adversary, they must establish a perfect chain of title from the holder, admittedly having once owned the property in dispute; that the pretended chain of title upon which plaintiffs rely is broken in two places; and that the court erred in excluding certain testimony proffered by the defendant.

The lot in controversy is 19.5 feet wide and 34.85 feet deep. It fronts on the northwest side of De la Guerra street in the city of Santa Barbara. The principal controversy in the case was centered around the question whether or not this property, when it was seized by the defendant, belonged to the heirs of Schiappa Pietra.

Defendant's asserted title depends upon the following facts: In 1909 defendant was told by Artura Orena, who owned other property then occupied as a place of business by defendant, that Mr. Orena did not want the land now in controversy, and that Mr. Dowell might as well have it as anybody else. Defendant made an examination which led him to believe that the Schiappa Pietra estate had no title to the land. He then fenced the property here in dispute except where the line over which he wished to extend one of the boundaries was covered by a part of a small brick building. This house stood partly upon the lot which defendant wished to claim and partly upon land which he knew to be a portion of the Schiappa Pietra property. The first fence was torn down by Mr. Parma, agent of the Schiappa Pietras (at least so defendant was informed), but Dowell built a stronger fence in the place of the one destroyed. After building the fence defendant caused a quitclaim deed to the lot to be executed in his favor by Geraldine C. Valde, who, so far as the record discloses the facts, had no interest in the land. This instrument was recorded, and defendant caused the lot to be assessed to him, after which he paid taxes on it. After building the fence defendant wrote to Mr. Power, who was familiar with the Schiappa Pietra property and was one of the executors of the will of Leopoldo Schiappa Pietra, that said Power had part of the house on said lot, and "it didn't belong there." The letter was not answered, but about a year later (June 29, 1910) this action was commenced.

It was stipulated that Peter Francis Aubrey owned and occupied certain land, including that here in controversy, in April, 1867, taking under a deed from one Puig. Aubrey conveyed this land in September, 1877, to William Lavies, who on the same day agreed with him in writing to reconvey it in one year for a specified price, leaving the grantor meanwhile in possession. This deed of conveyance, however, contained the following language succeeding a description by metes and bounds:

> "And being the same premises conveyed to said Aubrey by Felipe Puig by deed dated April 8, 1867, excepting and excluding from this conveyance that portion of land improvements mortgaged heretofore to Bernardo Llata by mortgage dated the 23d day of May, A. D. 1877, and recorded in the recorder's office of the County of Santa Barbara."

It is argued that, since the exception was indefinite, it may have included the land now claimed by defendant. This contention will receive attention in another part of this opinion.

On July 2, 1878, Peter Francis Aubrey, without reference to any previous mortgage or to his conveyance to Lavies, granted to Bernardo Llata a lot described as running southeasterly on State street from New De la Guerra street 46 feet, more or less, by 100 feet in depth, and also characterized as "being the same premises whereon the said P. F. Aubrey and family now actually reside." Subsequently, in the same year, Bernardo Llata conveyed this land in trust for his creditors to Gaspar Orena, describing it by reference to Aubrey's grant to him. On January 21, 1879, Aubrey confirmed this conveyance by a deed containing substantially the same description as that used in his former deed to Llata. This deed also recited the fact that a certain recorded bond was made and executed by Llata to Aubrey on the date of the former deed, and that "P. F. Aubrey is unable to comply with the conditions recited in said bond." This language is succeeded by the following:

> "Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and of the amount specified in said bond hereby grants unto Gaspar Orena, trustee for the creditors of Bernardo Llata, all his right," etc.

On June 9, 1879, the creditors of Bernardo Llata, confirming a sale in trust made for their benefit to Gaspar Orena as the highest bidder, granted the same premises to the said Orena. The description in this deed was substantially the same as in the others referring to a rectangular piece of property running 46 feet, more or less, along State street and 100 feet along New De la Guerra, and bounded on its other long side by the lands of Moraga.

On November 28, 1882, William Lavies granted to Cayetano Machiavelli the property which had been deeded to said Lavies by Aubrey, referring to the former deed for a full description of the premises. On April 1, 1889, Lavies conveyed the same property by a correction deed to the same grantee. In the deed, after description by metes and bounds, the land was further described as "being the same premises conveyed to P. F. Aubrey by Felipe Puig by deed dated April 8, 1867, and recorded in Book E of Deeds, p. 588, excepting and excluding from this conveyance that portion of land and improvements conveyed heretofore to Bernardo Llata by P. F. Aubrey by deed dated the 2d day of July, A. D. 1878, and recorded in the recorder's office of the County of Santa Barbara in Book T of Deeds, p. 65." In April, 1889, Machiavelli conveyed all of the property he had acquired from Lavies to Antonio Schiappa Pietra, expressly excepting the lot conveyed by Aubrey to Llata.

On the 29th of April, 1889, to facilitate the opening of De la Guerra street, Orena conveyed to the city of Santa Barbara a strip of land 12 feet in width running from State street along the northwesterly side of the new street 119½ feet. This was described by metes and bounds, and was further designated as:

> "A piece of land with the improvements thereon lying and being situated in De la Guerra street between State and Chapala streets in the city of Santa Barbara, county of Santa Barbara, state of California, as said street was surveyed by Salisbury Haley and as the lines of said portion of De la Guerra street were retraced and surveyed by George F. Wright, city surveyor of said city, for the commissioners appointed by the mayor and common council of said city in the matter of opening De la Guerra street between State and Chapala streets in said city."

Prior to that time Antonio Schiappa Pietra, describing himself as Machiavelli's successor in interest, had conveyed to the city a similar strip 12 feet wide commencing 119½ feet from State street. This was described by metes and bounds, and contained the same reference to Wright's retracing that was employed in the later deed to the city which Orena executed.

After the introduction in evidence of these two deeds last described defendant's counsel sought to introduce two reports and accompanying maps, being the reports of two boards of commissioners to open De la Guerra street, one made in 1885 and the other in 1888, the maps in one case having been made by City Surveyor Barker and in the latter by his successor, Mr. Wright. Defendant wished to show that the earlier proceeding had been abandoned; that the subsequent report had been substantially identical with its predecessor; that it was used in the proceedings which culminated in the opening of the street; and that the report indicated the line between the properties of Orena and Schiappa Pietra as 119½ feet southwest from State street and the existence of a fence on this line. These reports and maps were not admitted in evidence.

The city block book showed the depth of Orena's lot from State street as 119½ feet, but the county block book, made in 1889, followed the description by metes and bounds contained in the grant from Aubrey to Llata in 1878.

After Antonio Schiappa Pietra died his property was distributed to his brother Leopoldo by a decree entered December 7, 1896. While this decree contained the usual general provision distributing all property therein described, "or otherwise," and any property not then known or discovered which might belong to the estate, in the specific description of the land in block 175, the line on De la Guerra street was described as running 330.50 feet to the corner of Gaspar Orena's land; thence northerly along Orena's line 34.85 feet; and thence along the northerly line of Orena's lot 119.50 feet to State street. This description involved a depth of 119.50 feet for Orena's land and a width of 34.85 feet. The difference between this area and the lot 100 feet in depth acquired by Orena from Llata's creditors accounts for the tract here in dispute which defendant sought to acquire by fencing it, having it assessed to him, and paying taxes upon it.

In 1906 De la Guerra street was paved, and Mr. Orena was assessed for the improvement on a frontage of 119 feet. He refused to pay for more than 100 feet. The agent for Mr. Schiappa Pietra said he did not know whether the land belonged to his principal or not. He paid for the frontage assessed to Mr. Schiappa Pietra, excepting the 19½ feet, but subsequently, and before the time when a lien might be declared, he paid the balance.

In addition to the record proof which was offered, plaintiffs showed that at one time there had been a fence perpendicular to De la Guerra street and distant 100 feet southwesterly from State street, and that in 1910 Mr. Orena constructed a brick building to the line of this fence.

Upon this record appellant contends that plaintiffs have made out no complete record title; that "it was twice broken, and the two breaks were neither of them repaired." With this contention we are unable to agree.

[1, 2] The first "break" specified is the exception of the lot mortgaged to Llata, and, as no such mortgage was produced at the trial, appellant contends that it is impossible to determine what was conveyed. It will be noticed that in Aubrey's conveyance to Lavies the description by metes and bounds included the land in question, and that the mortgage applying to the excepted property was described by date and by the specification that it was recorded. If, in fact, there was no such mortgage or record, then the deed carried title to the lot now in dispute. Los Angeles & Arizona Land Co. v. Marr, 173 Pac. 83. The description by metes and bounds in the deed to the predecessor of plaintiffs gives at least color of title which as against defendant's mere title by seizure is good, and throws upon him the burden which he did not meet of showing that this land was within the area sought to be excepted. This principle is well stated in the quotation which respondent makes from Bernhardt v. Brown, 122 N. C. 587–590, 29 S. E. 884, 885 (65 Am. St. Rep. 725), as follows:

> "The defendants except because, '5,000 acres being excepted from the grant of 1795 under which the plaintiffs claim, the burden is on the plaintiffs to show that the land sued for is not the excepted part.' The law is well settled otherwise. 'The locus in quo being within the boundary of plaintiff's deed and defendant claiming under exceptions in said deed, it is clear that it is incumbent on him to bring himself within the exceptions by proof.' Steel & Iron Company v. Edwards, 110 N. C. 353 [14 S. E. 861]; Gudger v. Hensley, 82 N. C. 481."

True, that was a case in which both claimed from a common title, but that fact would have been a stronger reason for the rule sought to be invoked than any existing here. In this case defendant connects himself with no outstanding title, but asserts only such rights as may arise from the taking and fencing of the lot. He can have no possible right to the property unless it belonged to some one other than the plaintiffs. They have shown a sufficient title prima facie to put upon him the burden of proving that the lot here in controversy came within the indefinite exception in Aubrey's deed to Lavies.

Moreover, in 1882 Lavies conveyed to Machiavelli by deed which referred to his deed from Aubrey, and in a correction deed made in 1889 confirmed the grant by a deed excepting land conveyed to Llata (not mortgaged, but conveyed) by a recorded deed of later date than the mortgage specified in Aubrey's deed to Lavies. The land included in the deed from Aubrey to Llata was only 100 feet deep from State street—afterwards the Orena property. Clearly, therefore, Lavies intended to convey the lot here involved to Machiavelli. Llata in his conveyance to Orena only claimed a lot 100 feet in depth. Aubrey conveyed to Orena his rights under the contract to repurchase from Llata (asserting no equity under any mortgage), describing a lot only 100 feet in depth. Machiavelli possessed and occupied the land in dispute, and his successor, Schiappa Pietra, through the latter's agent, collected rent for a building admittedly occupying a part of the lot which Dowell could not fence completely upon the lines of his intended occupation because it was there. This agent testified that Machiavelli occupied this very building as a shop for several years before he sold it to Schiappa Pietra. With such proof of record title we think defendant is not benefited by the mere failure to account for the mortgage specified in the earlier deeds.

[3] The second alleged "break" in the title of plaintiffs which defendant's counsel specify arises as follows: In the deed from Machiavelli to Schiappa Pietra, executed in April, 1889, was contained a description which, if unqualified, would have included this land. But this description was qualified by an exception of the land conveyed by Aubrey to Llata by the deed of July, 1878. It is conceded that the description in the latter deed by metes and bounds would exclude the lot now claimed by Mr. Dowell, but appellant's counsel insist that there is a "double description" due to the words following the indicated courses by metes and bounds, "being the same premises whereon the said P. F. Aubrey and family now actually reside," and it is contended that the latter designation controls the description by metes and bounds. The contention was made that in order to justify their title under this deed the plaintiffs should have proven just what land had been so occupied by Aubrey and his family, and that their failure so to do makes another "break" in their chain of title. In this behalf defendant's counsel quote the following language from 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 1018:

> "If the land is described as the whole of a certain farm, and is again described in the deed by courses and distances, which, however, do not embrace the whole farm, this latter description will be rejected, and the title to the whole farm will pass by the deed."

The rule invoked has no application because the reference to the fact of Aubrey's residence is obviously merely a further identification of the premises and not another description. There is no uncertainty in the description by metes and bounds and no suggestion that the place of Aubrey's residence differed from the property of which the measurements were given. In other words, this is not a case of uncertainty in the description.

[4, 5] The deeds to the city by which Orena conveyed a strip of land 119½ feet in length, extending from State street along De la Guerra, and Schiappa Pietra transferred a similar strip beginning where the other ended, undoubtedly furnish evidence of some uncertainty in the minds of the grantors regarding their respective holdings, but these conveyances do not prove a mutual agreement to fix the common boundary between their properties. In the first place, proof of such agreed location of a line should be clear (Grants Pass Land & Water Company v. Brown, 168 Cal. 456, 143 Pac. 754), and the mutual acquiescence should be shown to have existed for a period greater than the statute of limitations or under such circumstances that substantial loss would be caused by a change (168 Cal. 459, 143 Pac. 756). Whatever might be said of the conclusiveness of these deeds as between the city and the grantors in any dispute involving title to the property conveyed to the municipality there was clearly no agreement by the neighbors that the true line between their lots after the opening of the street was 119½ feet from State street, because Mr. Orena refused to pay the assessment on that extent of frontage, while the agent for the owner of the adjoining property expressed doubt on the subject, but paid the bill.

[6] The decree of distribution in the Estate of Schiappa Pietra, while it describes the land of Mr. Orena in accordance with defendant's contention, also distributes, in general language, all of the land to which the decedent had title at the time of his death. Therefore the description by metes and bounds in the decree would not defeat any just claim on the part of plaintiffs; their title of record being otherwise good.

[7] There was no error committed by the court in excluding from the record the reports of street commissioners and the accompanying maps. These were not muniments of title. The surveyor who made the original map (of which the other was apparently a tracing) testified that he could not say that he measured the lines on the ground for the purpose of making the map. He made no field notes. He did not remember whether or not he intended that the Orena lot should take in a portion of the old building to which reference has been heretofore made. Furthermore, it was in evidence that the report was not made by the surveyor. The map and the first report were not used because the proceedings were abandoned, and there is no evidence that either was ever called to the attention of the property owners. The second map does not purport to have been based upon an original survey, and although the second report was made the basis of the assessment, it could not change the title to the property assessed by merely designating certain limits and boundaries of properties as showing the holdings of various individuals. The maps and reports were not declarations of any of the parties in interest and were not binding upon them. They were clearly not admissible as records of title. Payne v. English, 79 Cal. 540-547, 21 Pac. 952.

[8] It was argued that the original map and the reports should have been admitted as memoranda to refresh the memory of Mr. Barker, the surveyor. Such memoranda may be used by a witness to refresh his memory, but may not be admitted as independent evidence. Code Civ. Proc. § 2047; Baum v. Reay, 96 Cal. 462-465, 29 Pac. 117, 31 Pac. 561; Estate of Flint, 100 Cal. 391-399, 34 Pac. 863; Estate of Benton, 131 Cal. 472-480, 63 Pac. 775.

No other alleged errors require discussion or analysis.

(178 Cal. 308)

MARIN MUNICIPAL WATER DIST. v. MARIN WATER & POWER CO. et al.

(S. F. 8017.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑198(1) — CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS — FINDINGS — PUBLIC UTILITIES ACT.

Despite Public Utilities Act (St. 1911 [Ex. Sess.] p. 18) § 70, the superior court, in an action for condemnation begun under section 47, as amended by St. 1913, p. 683, is not authorized to determine the value of the property at the time of the trial, and to give judgment for such value as the compensation to be paid, for the superior court has no function to perform under the statute concerning the value of the property, but must take the finding of the Railroad Commission on that head as conclusive; and, if any additional findings of value can be made for the purpose of a condemnation suit under section 47, they must be made by the Railroad Commission, and not by the superior court.

2. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑198(1) — CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS—PUBLIC UTILITIES ACT.

Public Utilities Act, § 47, provides a scheme for the condemnation of property by the public corporations mentioned therein by a proceeding wherein the value of the property is to be fixed by the Railroad Commission, and the right and power of the public corporation to condemn the property is to be determined by the superior court, which also has jurisdiction of the enforcement of the right.

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑228, 281 — EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑198(1) — DUE PROCESS — EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAWS.

Public Utilities Act, § 47, providing a scheme for condemnation of property by public corporations by a proceeding wherein the value of the property is to be fixed by the Railroad Commission, and the right and power of the public corporation to condemn to be determined by the superior court, is not violative of the clause of the federal Constitution prohibiting a state from depriving a person of his property without due process of law, or denying him the equal protection of the laws.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑280 — EMINENT DOMAIN — DUE PROCESS — FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

Irrespective of any more specific requirements in state Constitutions, the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution requires compensation to be made or secured to the owner of private property taken by authority of the state for public use.

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑281—FIXING OF COMPENSATION — JUDICIAL PROCEEDING — PUBLIC UTILITIES ACT.

Public Utilities Act, § 47, providing a scheme for condemnation of property by the public corporations mentioned by a proceeding wherein the value is to be fixed by the Railroad Commission and the right and power of such public corporations to condemn to be determined by the superior court, is not denial of due process, as permitting the taking of private property without provision for the ascertainment of compensation by some form of judicial proceeding, the hearing provided for to determine the amount being required to be held as provided in section 70, guaranteeing to the owner affected written notice of the hearing, together with the right to be heard and introduce evidence.

6. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑281 — EMINENT DOMAIN—DUE PROCESS—FIXING COMPENSATION—JURY.

As to condemnation proceedings, it is not essential to the due process of law required by the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution that the compensation to be paid for property taken or damaged under the power of eminent domain be fixed by a jury.

7. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑228 — EMINENT DOMAIN — EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAWS — CONDEMNATION OF PROPERTY OF PUBLIC UTILITIES.

The procedure authorized by Public Utilities Act, § 47, for condemnation of the property of public utilities in certain cases, does not deprive such a utility of the equal protection of the laws because it differs in nonessential matters from the mode of condemning property under the general law, since the constitutional provision as to the equal protection of the laws does not prohibit a state from establishing different rules of procedure for different classes of cases or of litigants, providing the variations relate merely to matters of procedure, and do not operate to deprive any class of substantial equality in the adjudication of its rights or liabilities.

8. STATUTES 🔑92 — EMINENT DOMAIN — CLASS LEGISLATION—PUBLIC UTILITIES.

Public corporations, empowered to own and operate public utilities, clearly constitute a class sufficiently distinct from all other persons or corporations engaged in public service, and desiring to acquire property for public use, to justify peculiar legislation, such as Public Utilities Act, § 47, relating to them and their power to acquire property by eminent domain.

9. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑124 — PROPERTY OF PUBLIC UTILITIES—DATE OF ESTIMATION OF VALUE—STATUTES.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1249, as to the date with respect to which compensation shall be assessed for property taken under power of eminent domain, has no application in actions authorized by Public Utilities Act, § 47, providing a scheme for the condemnation of property of public utilities, with respect to the date at which the value shall be estimated.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Proceedings in condemnation by the Marin Municipal Water District against the Marin Water & Power Company and the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appealed to the District Court of Appeal, which affirmed the judgment, and on petition the decision was vacated and the case transferred to the Supreme Court. Judgment affirmed.

Lilienthal, McKinstry & Raymond, of San Francisco, for appellants. Curtis H. Lindley, of San Francisco, and George H. Harlan, of San Rafael, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This was a proceeding in condemnation by the plaintiff to acquire the property devoted to public use by the defendant Marin Water & Power Company. The other defendant is only indirectly interested in the proceeding, and its interests need not be further considered. The appeal was originally taken to the District Court of Appeal of the First District, and the judgment was there affirmed upon an opinion by Mr. Justice Richards. Thereafter, upon petition the decision of that court was vacated, and the case transferred to this court for further consideration. The facts and questions involved in the case are well stated in the following portions of the opinion of Justice Richards:

"This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action instituted for the purpose of the condemnation of the defendants' properties for public uses. The appeal is taken upon the judgment roll.

"The first and practically only point presented by the appellants is that the court erred in striking out certain portions of the defendants' amended answer upon plaintiff's motion, and upon the ground that the portions of the said amended answer assailed by said motion tendered no issuable facts, and that the same were immaterial, irrelevant, and redundant matter.

"A brief statement of the facts of the case will suffice for the purpose of a review of this contention: The plaintiff herein is a public corporation formed for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants of a designated district in Marin county with water. The defendant Marin Water & Power Company owned the lands and properties described in the complaint, and upon these the defendant Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco had a lien under the terms of a trust deed. The said plaintiff determined by proper resolution that the public interest required the acquisition by it of the said properties of the defendants for its public uses, and thereupon instituted a proceeding before the Railroad Commission of the State of California under the provisions of the Public Utilities Act, for the purpose of having determined the values of the defendants' said properties and the just compensation which should be paid by the plaintiff therefor in its proposed condemnation suit; and such steps were taken in that proceeding that on the 9th day of April, 1915, the Railroad Commission filed its findings, to the effect that the just compensation which should be paid for said properties was the sum of $1,200,500. This decision of the Commission became final on May 10, 1915; and under the provisions of section 47 of the Public Utilities Act the earliest date thereafter upon which the plaintiff could commence this action for the condemnation of said properties was May 31, 1915. This action was begun on June 5, 1915. The answer of the defendants was filed on December 17, 1915, and in their said answer the defendants did not put in issue by any sufficient pleading the question as to whether the findings and conclusions of the Railroad Commission as to the values of their properties were just and reasonable, but attacked the proceedings before the Commission on other grounds. On March 16, 1916, a few days before the case came to trial, the defendants filed an amended answer in which the following averments appear:

" 'For a separate and distinct defense alleges that the value of the properties of defendant Marin Water & Power Company is at the present time far greater than the value thereof at the date of the said award of the said Railroad Commission of the State of California, and that the condemnation thereof at this time for a price determined at a time when their value was less, as aforesaid, operates to deprive defendants and each thereof of property without due process of law.'

" 'For a separate and distinct answer denies that the proceedings before the Railroad Commission of the State of California referred to in said complaint were conducted in all respects, or any respects, according to law; and in this connection alleges that such proceedings were not conducted according to law, and in this connection admits that the compensation fixed by said Railroad Commission of the State of California for the lands, properties, and rights of defendant Marin Water & Power Company was and is the sum of $1,200,150, and denies that such compensation is just.'

"The plaintiff moved to strike out the above averments from the defendants' amended answer as presenting no issuable facts, and as immaterial, irrelevant, and redundant. The court granted said motion, and its order in so doing constitutes the chief ground of the defendants' contention upon this appeal."

[1] The first of the above-quoted paragraphs of the answer was filed upon the theory that the superior court, in an action for condemnation begun under section 47 of the Public Utilities Act, is authorized to determine the value of the property at the time of the trial, and give judgment for such value, as the compensation to be paid to the owner. We find nothing in support of this theory in the statute governing the subject.

Section 47 is extremely prolix and complex in its diction but, so far as this case is concerned, the plan therein provided is comparatively simple, and may be briefly stated.

Certain named classes of public corporations, including the plaintiff, desiring to take over and operate an existing public utility, may proceed, as in that section provided, to acquire the property of the owner of such public utility which is devoted to such public use. It must file a petition with the Railroad Commission to have the just compensation to be paid to the owner of the property determined. Thereupon the commission shall proceed, in the manner provided in section 70 of the act, to determine such compensation. Within 60 days after the commission has certified its findings, such public corporation must commence an action in eminent domain to take the property, the value of which has been so determined by the commission. In such action the finding of the commission on the subject of value "shall be deemed final and conclusive between the parties," and, after determining the right and power of the public corporation to take the property as proposed, as provided in the chapter of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to proceedings in eminent domain (sections 1237–1264), the court in such action shall give judgment, fixing as the amount of compensaton to be paid to the owner the value of the property as found by the commission in such certified findings.

It will be seen from these provisions that in the action in eminent domain to be begun under this section, the superior court has no function to perform concerning the value of the property, but must take the finding of the commission as conclusive on the subject. The appellant claims that authority for a new finding on the subject by the superior court is to be found in section 70 of the act. Section 47 declares that the commission shall proceed to make the determination as to compensation and value "in accordance with the provisions of section 70 of this act." Section 70 was originally enacted, before the amendment of 1913 to section 47, providing for valuations for purposes of condemnation by the public corporations there named. It has not been changed since its original enactment in 1911. At that time the commission was authorized to value the property of public utilities only for purposes of regulation. With this end in view the section provided that after determining the value of the property of any public utility the commission may from time to time make revaluations thereof, and of any improvements thereto, for the purpose of ascertaining the value thereof at some subsequent time, and that said supplemental finding shall be considered in connection with and as a part of the original findings, and as amendatory thereof. There is nothing in these provisions which authorizes the superior court to inquire concerning the value of the property or to find a value different from that previously determined and certified by the Railroad Commission. If any additional findings of value can be made for the purposes of a condemnation suit under section 47, they must be made by the Railroad Commission and not by the superior court. That section provides for a deduction from the valuation originally fixed by the commission, on account of depreciation or deterioration in the value of the property before payment of compensation is made. The amount of such deduction, however, is not to be determined by the superior court, but is to be determined by the Railroad Commission after the judgment of condemnation is made in the superior court. Section 47 declares that the judgment shall provide that it shall be subject to modification accordingly, if such finding is made. There is no provision for any finding on the subject by the superior court. The section provides that a petition to the commission to determine the amount of such deduction may be made by the public corporation at any time after the first application to the commission and before the payment of the compensation fixed by the judgment of the superior court. But no provision is made for a finding by the court of a subsequent increase in value.

[2] The effect of section 47 is to provide a scheme for the condemnation of property by the public corporations mentioned therein, by a proceeding wherein the value is to be fixed by the Railroad Commission, and the right and power of such public corporation to condemn the property is to be determined by the superior court. The enforcement thereof is also given over to the superior court. The appellant contends that if it shall be construed to provide for the taking of the property at the time of the judgment in the superior court, upon payment of the value previously fixed by the commission, it would be unconstitutional. The argument is that the owner is entitled to the value of the property at the time it is taken, and that he cannot be deprived thereof for public use, upon payment as compensation of the value fixed at a previous time, unless it shall appear that there has been no increase in value up to the time it is taken. So far as the provisions of the Constitution of California are concerned, the proposition is without merit. In November, 1914, after the amendment of section 47 in 1913, the Constitution itself was amended by the addition thereto of section 23a, art. 12, giving the Legislature authority to confer upon the Railroad Commission the power to fix the just compensation to be paid for existing public utilities as provided in section 47, and confirming and declaring valid all acts of the Legislature previously adopted, which, of course includes said amendment of section 47. It follows that if any of the provisions of said section should be deemed to be in violation of any provision of the Constitution on the subject of eminent domain, the amendment of 1914 to article 12 would supersede such provision and render the act immune from attack on such grounds.

[3] Nor is the enactment, we think, violative of the clauses of the federal Constitution prohibiting a state from depriving a person of his property without due process of law, or denying him the equal protection of the laws.

[4] It is not to be doubted that, irrespective of any more specific requirements in state Constitutions, the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires compensation to be made or secured to the owner of private property taken by authority of the state for public use. C., B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 17 Sup. Ct. 581, 41 L. Ed. 979. But section 47 of the Public Utilities Act provides in express terms for the ascertainment, and the payment to the owner, of "just compensation" for property taken. It is contended that the scheme of valuation is not fair to the owners of public utilities, in that the value is fixed as of the time of the hearing by the Railroad Commission, which must precede the commencement of the formal condemnation suit. Under the general law relative to eminent domain, the value of property taken is assessed as of the date of the issuance of summons. Code Civ. Proc. § 1249. It is settled by our decisions that this rule, the equivalent of which is found in many other states (15 Cyc. 721), involves no violation of constitutional right. Cal. So. R. R. Co. v. Kimball, 61 Cal. 90; Tehama County v. Bryan, 68 Cal. 57, 8 Pac. 673; San Jose, etc., R. R. Co. v. Mayne, 83 Cal. 566, 23 Pac. 522; Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 597, 648, 57 Pac. 585; Sacramento Term. Co. v. McDougall, 19 Cal. App. 562, 126 Pac. 503. On analysis, it will be found that the distinction between the Code provisions and those of the Public Utilities Act is formal rather than substantial. Section 47 creates a special proceeding in eminent domain. The ascertainment of value by the Railroad Commission, and the subsequent action in the superior court, in which the previous finding of value is made conclusive, are both parts of that proceeding. The hearing by the commission on the question of value is merely a step in the litigation prosecuted to enforce the right of eminent domain. In effect, therefore, the value is fixed as of the date of the institution of the condemnation proceeding, as it is in cases prosecuted under the Code sections alone.

[5] The fixing of the amount payable as compensation for property taken for public use presents a judicial question (Monongahela Nav. Co. v. United States, 148 U. S. 312, 327, 13 Sup. Ct. 622, 37 L. Ed. 463), and it may well be that due process of law would be lacking in a proceeding by which the state should assume to take private property without providing for the ascertainment of compensation by some form of judicial proceeding. The Public Utilities Act is not, however, open to criticism on this ground. The hearing provided for to determine the amount, under section 47, is to be held in the manner provided in section 70, and that section guarantees to the owner affected written notice of the hearing, together with the right to be heard and to introduce evidence. That the valuation proceeding before the commission is judicial in character was directly held by this court in its review, on certiorari, of the finding of value made in the case of this very appellant. Marin Water & Power Co. v. Railroad Com'n, 171 Cal. 706, 712, 154 Pac. 864, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 114.

[6] Finally, on this branch of the inquiry, it may be remarked that it is not essential to the due process as required by the Fourteenth Amendment that the compensation to be paid for property taken or damaged under the power of eminent domain be fixed by a jury. 15 Cyc. 873; C., B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 244, 245, 17 Sup. Ct. 581, 41 L. Ed. 979; Bauman v. Ross, 167 U. S. 548, 17 Sup. Ct. 966, 42 L. Ed. 270. See Koppikus v. State Capitol Com'n, 16 Cal. 248; People v. Blake, 19 Cal. 579.

[7, 8] The contention that the procedure authorized by the Public Utilities Act deprives the appellant of the equal protection of the laws is based upon the discriminations to which we have just referred between the mode of condemning property under the general law and that provided by section 47 for condemning the property of public utilities in certain cases. None of these discriminations, as we have seen, goes to any matter of essential justice or fundamental right. The constitutional provision under consideration does not prohibit a state from establishing different rules of procedure for different classes of cases or of litigants, provided the variations relate merely to matters of procedure, and do not operate to deprive any class of substantial equality in the adjudication of its rights or liabilities. 12 C. J. 948; Cin. St. Ry. Co. v. Snell, 193 U. S. 30, 24 Sup. Ct. 319, 48 L. Ed. 604; Cook v. Ray Mfg. Co., 159 Cal. 694, 115 Pac. 318. In condemnation proceedings, so long as the state provides a fair and equitable judicial inquiry, in which the parties interested are allowed to be heard and present evidence, and are protected in their right to have just compensation, they are not deprived of the equal protection of the laws because the state, under authority of its own Constitution, has seen fit to provide for other classes of cases a different method or a different tribunal for accomplishing the same result. Railroad Co. v. Tel. Co., 65 S. C. 459, 43 S. E. 970; Kennebec Water D. v. Waterville, 96 Me. 234, 52 Atl. 774. Whether the property of public utilities forms a class which may fairly be thought to require a different kind of procedure from that adopted for the taking of other property by eminent domain is primarily a question for the state itself. Elements of peculiar complication and difficulty are often involved in the valuation of the property of a public utility. The fact that public utilities are subject to constant regulation and examination by the Railroad Commission may well have led the Legislature to conclude that that commission was best able to make a just and equitable appraisement of their property. Kennebec Water D. v. Waterville, supra. So far as defendants are concerned, the classification made by the act cannot therefore be regarded as purely arbitrary. It is not claimed that any constitutional right of the appellant is invaded by the limitation of the right to proceed as plaintiffs under section 47 to certain kinds of public corporations, which are empowered to own and operate public utilities. Such corporations clearly constitute a class sufficiently distinct from all other persons or corporations engaged in public service, and desiring to acquire property for the public use, to justify peculiar legislation relating to them.

Little need be said concerning the second of the above-quoted paragraphs stricken out by the court below. The appellant calls attention to the fact that the complaint itself alleged that the proceedings before the Railroad Commission were conducted in all respects according to law, and it is claimed that this is an allegation of fact which it is proper for the defendant to deny in the answer. If the superior court in the action in eminent domain had power to review the conduct of the proceedings before the Railroad Commission and to amend its findings, this allegation of the complaint might be material, and, if so, it might be proper to answer it, if it is not a mere conclusion of law, which we do not decide. But the superior court had no such power. The Public Utilities Act provides that in all collateral actions the orders and decisions of the commission which have become final shall be conclusive (section 65), and that no court except the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct, or annul any order or decision of the commission (section 67). The complaint alleges that the finding of the commission as to compensation was made after due notice had been given to the appellant herein, and upon a hearing regularly had by the commission. This allegation is not denied. Jurisdiction of the person of the appellant was established, and jurisdiction of the subject-matter is given by the provisions of section 47, and by the Constitution. The finding was therefore conclusive, so far as the superior court and the action in eminent domain were concerned. The allegation was therefore wholly immaterial, and was properly stricken from the answer.

[9] We do not think section 1249 of the Code of Civil Procedure has application in actions authorized by section 47 of the Public Utilities Act, with respect to the date at which the value shall be estimated.

MARIN MUNICIPAL WATER DIST. v. NORTH COAST WATER CO. et al.

(S. F. 7873.)

1. COURTS 🔑24, 37(1)—JURISDICTION—CONSENT.

Jurisdiction of the subject-matter cannot be conferred upon a tribunal by consent, so that the parties cannot make an effective waiver of lack of such jurisdiction.

2. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSIONS 🔑27—REVIEW OF DECISIONS — POWERS OF COURT — LIMITATIONS—VALIDITY.

Public Utilities Act (St. 1911 [Ex. Sess.] p. 18) §§ 66, 67, providing that any party interested in an order or decision made by the Railroad Commission may petition for rehearing, and that, if such rehearing is denied, application may be made to the Supreme Court for writ of review to have the lawfulness of the order or decision determined, are valid limitations on the powers of the courts of the state.

3. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑243(1)—IRREGULARITY OF PROCEDURE—WAIVER.

Where, at the time the Railroad Commission's decision was made valuing property sought to be condemned, Const. art. 12, § 23a, had validated legislation vesting the commission with such authority, the fact that the finding was based on a proceeding instituted and testimony heard before the constitutional amendment had become valid and effective was a matter going only to the regularity and propriety of the procedure leading to the finding, rather than to the fundamental jurisdiction of the commission to make the finding itself; and defendant, by failing to ask the commission for rehearing pursuant to Public Utilities Act, § 66, or to apply to the Supreme Court for writ of review pursuant to section 67, waived any objection, and permitted the commission's decision to become final.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Marin Municipal Water District, a public corporation, against the North Coast Water Company, a corporation, and others. From the judgment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles S. Wheeler and John F. Bowie, both of San Francisco, for appellants. George H. Harlan, of San Rafael, and Curtis H. Lindley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The defendants appeal from a judgment in condemnation. The case presents a situation very similar to that discussed in the opinion which we have just filed in Marin Municipal Water District v. Marin Water & Power Company (S. F. No. 8017) 173 Pac. 469. In the present action, the Marin Municipal Water District sought to acquire the property of North Coast Water Company, comprising the system devoted to supplying water to the towns of Mill Valley and Belvedere, together with surrounding territory, in the county of Marin. Here, as in the Marin Water & Power Company Case, the plaintiff had applied to the Railroad Commission for a valuation of the property under the terms of section 47 of the Public Utilities Act (as amended in 1913 [St. 1913, p. 683]), and the commission had made its decision, finding the just compensation to be paid for the lands, property, and rights to be purchased. The value of this appellant's property was fixed at $289,200. In the ensuing proceeding for condemnation, this sum was taken as conclusively establishing the amount of compensation to be paid to the North Coast Water Company, and judgment was entered accordingly. Certain additions had been made to the plant after the Railroad Commission had made its finding of value, and the parties stipulated that these additions should be taken over by the plaintiff at an agreed value of some $1,500, if the plaintiff should ultimately succeed in establishing its right to acquire the original plant at the price fixed by the Railroad Commission.

The main point of controversy, in both condemnation suits, turned on the validity of the scheme provided by section 47 of the Public Utilities Act. It was claimed by the respective water companies that the provisions of this section were in violation of both the state and the federal Constitutions. In each instance, the proceeding before the Railroad Commission was commenced, and the evidence taken, before the adoption of section 23a of article 12 of the Constitution, which expressly confirmed and validated the prior legislation (i. e., section 47 of the Public Utilities Act), undertaking to confer upon the Railroad Commission power to find, for purposes of condemnation, the value of property to be taken in cases like this. The findings were, however, made after the change in the Constitution. This constitutional amendment "removes all doubt of the present validity of the said amendment of section 47," so far as any objection based upon the terms of the state Constitution is concerned. Marin Water & Power Co. v. R. R. Com., 171 Cal.

706, 710, 154 Pac. 864, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 114. The claim that the scheme embodied in that section is in violation of the federal Constitution is met and answered by our decision in Marin Municipal Water District v. Marin Water & Power Company.

[1-3] That decision virtually disposes of every point here involved, with one exception. The point thus remaining is one which arises, not so much from any difference in the essential facts in the two cases, as from the different modes in which the controversies have been conducted by the respective defendants and appellants. The present appellant maintains that, under the Constitution as it read prior to the adoption of section 23a of article 12 the Legislature was not authorized to confer upon the Railroad Commission power to make a conclusive finding of value for condemnation purposes, as provided by section 47 of the Public Utilities Act; that, inasmuch as the proceeding was initiated and the hearing of evidence concluded before the adoption of the confirmatory provision of the Constitution, all of the steps taken under the supposed authority of section 47 were coram non judice and void; and that, accordingly, the commission's finding of value should not have been admitted in evidence, and a fortiori, should not have been given conclusive, or any, effect. We shall, for present purposes, assume, without deciding, that the appellant is correct in its claim that the Constitution, as it read prior to the amendment of section 47 of the Public Utilities Act, did not authorize the grant of the powers specified in that section. It will be observed that the point that the action of the commission was totally void, because the proceeding was commenced before the amendment of the Constitution, would have been equally available to the Marin Water & Power Company. But that corporation did not take this position. It applied for and obtained a writ of certiorari to review the decision of the Railroad Commission fixing the value of its property for purposes of the proposed condemnation. In that proceeding, however, it expressly waived any objection that might be urged because of the enactment of section 47 before the amendment of the Constitution. Marin Water & Power Co. v. R. R. Com., 171 Cal. 706, 711, 154 Pac. 864, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 114. This court, in the proceeding for review, affirmed the determination of the Railroad Commission. In the course of the opinion it dealt with the matter of the waiver of this objection in a manner to which we shall advert further. The present appellant, on the other hand, did not seek to attack the decision and finding of the Railroad Commission, by certiorari or otherwise. After contending, before the commission, that the proceeding there was unauthorized, it allowed the decision of the commission to become final, so far as any direct attack was concerned, and contented itself thereafter with urging, on the trial of the present action, its objections to the commission's finding when that finding was presented as a basis for an adjudication of value in the condemnation suit now before us. Its right to take this position must rest upon the premise that the finding, or decision, of the commission was absolutely void as beyond the jurisdiction of the commission, because, although such decision was made at a time when power to make it was vested in the commission, the proceeding had been instituted and the testimony taken before the adoption of the constitutional provision confirming the grant of power which the Legislature had theretofore attempted to make. We think, however, that this premise cannot be accepted without departing from our ruling in Marin Water & Power Company v. Railroad Commission, supra. As we have already suggested, the petitioner there waived the objection now urged by this appellant. In that connection we said, in our opinion, that:

> "We have no doubt that the petitioner may effectually waive a matter of that character."

While the question was not discussed at length, the expression just quoted necessarily involves a holding that the objection was one that did not go to the commission's jurisdiction of the subject-matter at the time the finding in question was made. For if the commission was absolutely without power to make a finding in a proceeding instituted and partially heard before the constitutional confirmation of section 47, the want of power could not be waived. It is the universal rule that jurisdiction of the subject-matter cannot be conferred upon a tribunal by consent, and it follows that the parties cannot make an effective waiver of a lack of such jurisdiction. 7 R. C. L. 1043. The necessary import of our holding in the certiorari proceeding brought by Marin Water & Power Company was therefore that, where at the time the decision was made, the law had vested the commission with authority to make it, the fact that the finding was based upon a proceeding instituted, and testimony heard, before the law purporting to vest jurisdiction in the commission had become valid and effective was a matter going to the regularity and propriety of the procedure leading to the finding, rather than to the fundamental jurisdiction to make the finding itself. Adhering to the view thus taken in the certiorari proceeding, we must hold that this appellant, also, has waived the right to object to the premature institution and hearing of the proceeding to fix the value of its property to be taken. It is true that it did not at any stage make an express waiver. But by failing to ask the commission for a rehearing, or to apply to this court for a writ of review, it permitted the commission's decision to become final, so far as the law could make it so. Under section 66 of the Public Utilities Act any party interested in an order or decision made by the commission may petition for a rehearing, and, under section 67, if such rehearing is denied, application may be made to this court for a writ of review, for the purpose of having the lawfulness of the order or decision inquired into and determined. No court of this state except the Supreme Court, to the extent specified "shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct, or annul any order or decision of the commission." These are valid limitations upon the powers of the courts of this state. Pac. T. & T. Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 137 Pac. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822; Clemmons v. R. R. Com., 173 Cal. 254, 159 Pac. 713. The failure to apply for such rehearing, or, in the event of its denial, for a review by the Supreme Court, must necessarily, therefore, operate as a waiver of any objection except, perhaps, the one that the order of the commission is absolutely void on its face. But the decision here in question was not so void. It was rendered at a time when the commission had jurisdiction to make such an order, and it did not show on its face that any of the proceedings leading to it had been taken before the adoption of the constitutional amendment.

There is therefore no substantial distinction between this case and that of Marin Water & Power Company, and the result here must be that reached in the other case.

The judgment is affirmed.

KEYES et al. v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 7017.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 25, 1918. On Petition for Rehearing, Feb. 23, 1918.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑974(3)—TAXES—LIMITATION OF AMOUNT.

Whether, under Charter of City and County of San Francisco, art. 3, c. 1, §§ 11, 13 (St. 1899, p. 261), there exists a "great necessity or emergency" justifying a levy of taxes in excess of $1 on each $100 valuation, is not finally determined by ordinance of the supervisors therefor, but may be reviewed by the courts.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑977—CLAIMS—PRESENTATION OF AS A CONDITION PRECEDENT.

The provision of Charter of City and County of San Francisco, art. 2, c. 1, § 19, requiring all demands payable out of the treasury to be approved by the board of supervisors before being approved by auditor and paid by treasurer, except as provided in article 3, c. 3, and also article 3, c. 4, § 1, and article 4, c. 2, § 7, do not apply to or make approval by such board of a claim for repayment of taxes paid under protest a condition precedent to action for their recovery.

3. TAXATION 🔑542—RECOVERY OF TAX PAID—VOLUNTEER PAYMENT.

Unless there is a law for the recovery of illegal taxes paid under protest, the payment is voluntary and cannot be recovered in the absence of duress or coercion.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑977—TAXES—RECOVERY OF TAXES PAID.

Pol. Code, § 389 (St. 1893, p. 32), providing that a payment of taxes under protest shall not be regarded as voluntary, applies to taxes collected by the city and county of San Francisco in view of its title, "Collection of Property Taxes."

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑958—TAXATION—CHARTER AND OTHER STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The charter of the city and county of San Francisco authorizing the board of supervisors to provide for the collection of taxes is not self-executing, and, the board not having acted thereon, the general laws remain paramount.

6. COUNTIES 🔑190(1)—TAXATION—VOLUNTARY PAYMENT.

In so far as the city and county of San Francisco has the attributes of a county, Pol. Code, § 3819, providing that payment of taxes under protest shall not be regarded as voluntary, is applicable.

In Banc. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Alexander D. Keyes, as executor of the estate of Mary L. Zimmerman, deceased, and another, against the City and County of San Francisco. From a judgment sustaining a general demurrer to the complaint, plaintiffs appealed and on affirmance by the District Court of Appeal the case was ordered up for rehearing in Supreme Court. Reversed and remanded.

Alexander D. Keyes, of San Francisco, in pro. per. Percy V. Long, Jesse H. Steinhart, Harry G. McKannay, Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., and George Lull, City Atty., all of San Francisco, for respondent. Drown, Leicester & Drown, Cushing & Cushing, Wm. H. Gorrill, A. R. Baldwin, Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, Geo. J. Hatfield, C. Irving Wright, Elmer Westlake, and E. J. Foulds, all of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

LAWLOR, J. The court below sustained a general demurrer to the complaint, and from the judgment thereupon entered the plaintiffs prosecuted an appeal to this court, which was transferred to the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, for decision. After an affirmance of the judgment by the District Court the case was ordered up for a rehearing by this court. The facts and general nature of the case and the contentions of the parties appear in the following excerpts from the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, which we hereby adopt and make a part of this opinion:

"The object of the action is to recover taxes alleged to have been paid under protest to the tax collector of the city and county of San Francisco, the plaintiffs claiming that the tax levy under and in pursuance of which said taxes were paid was illegal and void.

"The lands upon which the protested taxes were levied are situated in the city and county of San Francisco, and are owned and were assessed against the estate of Mary L. Zimmerman, testate of the plaintiff Keyes and the plaintiff Mary E. Chilton.

"Section 11 of article 3 of the charter of said city (Stats. 1899, p. 261) provides that the supervisors thereof shall, on the last Monday of June in each year, levy the amount of taxes for city and county purposes required to be levied upon all property not exempt from taxation. 'The amount shall be sufficient to provide for the payment during the fiscal year of all demands upon the treasury authorized to be paid out of the same; but such levy, exclusive of the state tax and the tax to pay the interest and maintain the sinking funds of the bonded indebtedness of the city and county, and exclusive of the tax to pay for the maintenance and improvement of the parks, squares, and public grounds of the city and county, shall not exceed the rate of one dollar on each one hundred dollars valuation of the property assessed.' Section 13 of said charter provides, in part, as follows: 'The limitation in section eleven of this chapter upon the rate of taxation shall not apply in case of any great necessity or emergency. In such case the limitation may be temporarily suspended so as to enable the supervisors to provide for such necessity or emergency. No increase shall be made in the rate of taxation authorized to be levied in any fiscal year, unless such increase be authorized by ordinance passed by the unanimous vote of the supervisors and approved by the mayor. The character of such necessity or emergency shall be recited in the ordinance authorizing such action, and be entered in the journal of the board.'

"On June 21, 1911, the board of supervisors passed an ordinance purporting to suspend the dollar limitation. Said ordinance recited and declared that a great necessity and emergency exists within the city and county of San Francisco, which requires that the limitation upon the rate of taxation provided by said section 11 of article 3 of the charter of said city be temporarily suspended; that the character of such necessity and emergency is as follows, to wit, that taxable property of said city of approximately the value of $175,000,000 had been destroyed by the conflagration commencing on the 18th of April, 1906, and continuing for several successive days thereafter; that the assessment roll for said year aggregated $525,000,000, but that at no time since said year has the assessment roll of said city equalled said amount; that said fire checked the normal increase of said assessment roll, 'and its restoration to the former amount has been impossible'; that the adoption by the people at the election of November 8, 1910, of senate constitutional amendment No. 1 (Stats. 1909, p. 1332, providing for the separation of state and local taxation, and providing that taxes levied, assessed, and collected upon railroads and other public utilities and the franchises thereof shall be entirely and exclusively for state purposes) still further reduced the amount of taxable property of said city and county by approximately $75,000,000 and at the same time deprived the city of certain license tax revenues amounting to a large sum; that, by certain amendments to the charter, the salaries in the police and fire departments had increased to the amount of more than $1,000,000, and that by other amendments to said charter other additional expenses were added to the burdens of the city amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $100,000. The ordinance proceeds:

" 'That at the several sessions of the Legislature since 1905, large additional expenses and financial burdens were laid upon the city and county of San Francisco, which expenses and burdens could not be anticipated and provided for under the provisions of the charter of said city and county when adopted in 1898. That furthermore, the Legislature, by various enactments, has materially reduced the sums heretofore received from the state in support of the public school system, which reductions could not be foreseen and provided for at the time of the adoption of the said charter.

" 'That the demands due to the rapid growth of the city, particularly in new districts of the city and county, developed as a result of shifting of population caused by the fire aforesaid, for additional public institutions, services and necessities have been great, which demands and necessities could not be reasonably foreseen.

" 'That the estimated and necessary expenditures of the city and county of San Francisco for the fiscal year commencing June 30, 1911, will be $11,938,750. * * *

" 'Section 3. There is hereby levied a tax of sixty-two and one-half cents upon each one hundred dollars of assessed valuation of property within the city and county of San Francisco as the same appears, or will appear upon the assessment roll of said city and county for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and the proceeds of such tax shall be part of the general fund of said city and county.

" 'Such tax is and shall be an increase of and an addition to the rate of one dollar taxation on each one hundred dollars of assessed valuation. * * *'

"On the same day that said ordinance was passed, to wit, on the 21st day of June, 1911, the supervisors, by ordinance, fixed the tax rate and levied taxes upon all the taxable property in said city in accordance with the ordinance suspending the 'dollar limit.'

"The complaint alleged that the plaintiffs, upon paying the two installments of taxes levied under the suspension of the restriction referred to, protested, on each occasion of the payment of said installments, against the payment of so much of said levy as is in excess of the dollar restriction prescribed by the charter, and that they filed with the tax collector their protests in writing. Said written protests were expressly based upon section 3819 of the Political Code (which provides that where the owner of property assessed by the proper county authorities claims that such assessment is void in whole or in part and pays the taxes so assessed under written protest, specifying that the assessment is in whole or in part void, such payment shall not be regarded as a voluntary payment, and that such owner may, at any time within six months after such payment, bring an action against the county in the superior court to recover back the taxes so paid).

"The points urged against the validity of the tax levy complained of by the plaintiffs may be stated in the language of their counsel as follows: 'The ordinance suspending the dollar limit is void: First, because it did not recite the character of any emergency or great necessity; secondly, because the alleged emergency levy was not made for the purpose for which it could lawfully be made, namely, to provide for the great necessity or emergency in question; thirdly, because the proceedings to levy taxes in excess of the dollar limit were begun and the ordinance making the levy was passed by the supervisors before the dollar limit was suspended.' "

[1] Counsel for defendant concede that the determination by the supervisors of the existence of a "great necessity or emergency" is not conclusive, but may be reviewed by the courts. See San Christina Investment Co. v. City and County of San Francisco, 167 Cal. 762, 131 Pac. 384, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 676; Spring Valley Water Works v. San Francisco, 82 Cal. 286, 22 Pac. 910, 1046, 6 L. R. A. 756, 16 Am. St. Rep. 116; Davis v. Mayor of New York, 1 Duer, 451, 497; People v. Sturtevant, 9 N. Y. 263, 59 Am. Dec. 536;

Josselyn v. San Francisco, 168 Cal. 436, 143 Pac. 705.

[2] It is claimed, however, that the complaint is defective in two particulars: First, that according to the charter a prior demand within a specified time must have been approved by the board of supervisors and presented to the proper officer for payment, and the complaint contains no allegation that such a demand was presented or approved; second, that the payment of the taxes by the plaintiffs was voluntary, because the charter does not provide for the payment of taxes under protest, and section 3819 of the Political Code, in pursuance of which the protest alleged in the complaint was made, has no application to taxes levied by the city and county of San Francisco.

As to the necessity of a prior presentation and approval of the demand, the provisions of the city and county charter relied upon by the respondent, in so far as material, are as follows:

> Section 19 (chapter 1, art. 2): "Except as provided in chapter III of article III of this charter, all demands payable out of the treasury must, before they can be approved by the auditor or paid by the treasurer, be first approved by the board of supervisors. * * *"
> Section 13 (chapter 3, art. 3), after providing for the allowance of fixed salaries, continues: "All other demands payable out of any funds in the treasury, must before they can be allowed by the auditor, or recognized, or paid, be first approved by the department, board or officer, in which the same has originated, and in all such cases must be approved by the supervisors."
> Section 1 (chapter 4, art. 3): "The salaries and compensation of all officers, including policemen and employés of all classes, and all teachers in the public schools, and others employed at fixed wages, shall be payable monthly. Any demand upon the treasury accruing under this charter shall not be paid, but shall be forever barred by limitation of time, unless the same be presented for payment, properly audited, within one month after such demand became due and payable; or, if it be a demand which must be passed and approved by the supervisors or board of education, or by any other board, then within one month after the first regular meeting of the proper board held next after the demand accrued. * * *"

Respondent cites no case in which it has been held that these provisions of the charter apply to a claim for the repayment of taxes paid under protest. Geimann v. Board of Police Com'rs, 158 Cal. 748, 112 Pac. 553, the only decision referred to arising under the present charter of San Francisco, was an action by policemen for salaries alleged to be due them. Such demands are specifically named in the charter and are clearly within the sections above quoted, but bear no resemblance to the claim in controversy. Neither can any reliance be placed upon such sweeping provisions as were considered in Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. City of Los Angeles, 151 Cal. 655, 91 Pac. 795, and the cases there discussed. McCann v. Sierra County, 7 Cal. 121; People v. Supervisors, 28 Cal. 429; Alden v. Alameda County, 43 Cal. 270; Rhoda v. Alameda County, 52 Cal. 350; Bigelow v. Los Angeles, 141 Cal. 503, 75 Pac. 111. The cases against the city of Los Angeles turned upon the following section of the charter:

> "No suit shall be brought upon any claim for money or damages against the city of Los Angeles, * * * until a demand for the same has been presented as herein provided, and rejected in whole or in part. * * *"

The other cases cited were decided upon the basis of section 24 of the County Government Act (Stats. 1855, p. 51) which was repealed by the Political Code. See Lehn v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. 76, 4 Pac. 965. Section 24 provided that:

> "No person shall sue a county in any case, or for any demand, unless he or she shall first present his or her claim or demand to the board of supervisors" for allowance, and the same shall be rejected in whole or in part.

Manifestly the sections of the San Francisco charter on the subject of prior demand are not of the sweeping and all-inclusive character of the provisions just quoted. We do not believe that the charter was intended to contain a clause requiring prior presentation of all classes of demands as a condition precedent to the right to sue thereon. The Consolidation Act (Stats. 1856, p. 145), to which the present charter is largely similar, had no such general provision. See Lehn v. San Francisco, supra; Bloom v. San Francisco, 64 Cal. 503, 3 Pac. 129; Spangler v. San Francisco, 84 Cal. 12, 20, 23 Pac. 1091, 18 Am. St. Rep. 158. Moreover, to construe the sections of the charter relied upon by respondent as requiring a prior presentation and approval in the case of taxes paid under protest would be inconsistent with other portions of that charter, which are themselves conclusive on the point that no such procedure was contemplated or provided for in this instance.

Section 7 (chapter 2, art. 4) reads:

> "Every demand upon the treasurer, except the salary of the auditor, must, before it can be paid, be presented to the auditor, who shall satisfy himself whether the money is legally due, and its payment authorized by law, and against what appropriation payable, and out of what fund it is payable. If he allow it, he shall indorse upon it the word 'Allowed,' with the name of the fund out of which it is payable, and the date of such allowance, and sign his name thereto. No demand shall be approved, allowed, audited or paid unless it specify each special item, date and amount composing it, and refer by chapter and section to the provisions of this charter authorizing the same."

Section 13 (chapter 3, art. 3) provides:

> "* * * Every demand against the city and county shall, in addition to the other entries and indorsements upon the same required by this charter, show: (1) The ordinance or authorization under which the same was allowed. (2) The name of the board, department or authority authorizing the same. (3) The fiscal year within which the indebtedness was incurred. (4) The appropriation provided to meet the demand [same]. (5) The name of the specific fund out of which the demand is payable. Each demand shall have written or printed upon it a statement that the same can only be paid out of the income and revenue provided, collected and paid into the specific fund in the treasury for the fiscal year within which the indebtedness was incurred, and shall refer to chapter II of this article, and be numbered with reference to the fund out of which it is payable."

The limitations above set out upon the payment of a demand under the charter show that the only classes of demands that could have been intended are those the payment of which the charter contemplates or authorizes. The charter nowhere provides for the repayment of taxes paid under protest, and under the provisions of the charter referred to there would be no authority in any officer of the municipality to approve or pay the plaintiffs' demand if the same were presented as contended for. In this situation, of course, such presentation and approval cannot be a condition precedent, and we conclude that the charter does not make it such.

[3, 4] The more important contention of the respondent, and the one upon which the District Court upheld the action of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint, is that section 3819 of the Political Code, in pursuance of which the protest was made, does not apply to the city and county of San Francisco, and the charter itself makes no provision for the payment of taxes under protest; consequently the payment was voluntary and no action to recover the taxes lies. It may be conceded that if there is no provision of law, applicable to the city and county of San Francisco, for the payment of taxes under protest, and for the recovery thereof after such protest, where the tax is illegal, then in the absence of an allegation of duress or coercion they were paid voluntarily and cannot be recovered. McMillen v. Richards, 9 Cal. 365, 417; Bucknall v. Story, 46 Cal. 589, 597, 13 Am. Rep. 220; Bank of Woodland v. Webber, 52 Cal. 73; Wills v. Austin, 53 Cal. 152; Dear v. Varnum, 80 Cal. 86, 22 Pac. 76; Justice v. Robinson, 142 Cal. 199, 75 Pac. 776. But we are unable to agree that section 3819 of the Political Code, the substance of which is set out in the portion of the opinion of the District Court which is quoted above, has no applicaton to the city and county of San Francisco. The provision in question is found in title 10 of part 3 of the Political Code, which deals with the revenue of the state and is limited, so far as taxation is concerned, to the matter of state and county taxation. The particular chapter in which section 3819 appears (chapter 7) is entitled "Collection of Property Taxes." The Political Code, under the caption "The Government of Cities" (title 3 of part 4), contains the following provision (section 4390):

> "The assessor, in addition to the duties prescribed by the common council, must make out, within such time as the common council orders, a correct list of all the taxable property within the city limits, with the valuation thereof, which list, certified by him, must be returned to the common council. The mode of making out the list and of ascertaining the value of property, and of collecting all taxes, is the same as prescribed in this code for assessing and collecting the state tax."

[5] Taxation for municipal purposes is a municipal affair; accordingly, a scheme of local taxation framed by a municipality whose charter empowered it to devise its own taxing system would be superior to the general law of the state on that subject. Ex parte Braun, 141 Cal. 204, 209, 74 Pac. 780. But if the charter itself does not contain such a scheme of taxation, and the legislative body of the municipality has also failed to devise a system, then there is no local law with which the general law can be inconsistent. Merely to authorize the board of supervisors to provide for the collection of taxes is not sufficient to exclude the operation of general laws for the collection of taxes. The provision of the charter in this instance (article 3, c. 1, § 14) reads:

> "The supervisors shall fix the amount of municipal revenues and provide for the collection thereof. * * *"

If this can be taken as referring to the collection of taxes, it is a mere authorization to the supervisors; it is not self-executing, and without further action by the supervisors has no effect whatever upon the general law. Had legislation been enacted to carry out the power thus lodged in the municipality, it may be that whatever plan of local taxation would thus have been adopted would have been paramount to the general law. In this case nothing was done by the supervisors to execute the power lodged in them by the charter. Under such circumstances, only the general law governing the collection of taxes, which is the same for cities and for counties, exists in San Francisco, and obviously that is the only law that can be applied. There has been no other law on the subject since the charter was adopted, in 1899; that is the only law that could have been followed; it is rather strange that it should be questioned now. In arriving at the conclusion that section 3819, as well as the remainder of that portion of the Political Code pertaining to the collection of state and county taxes, applies to the city and county of San Francisco, we do not rely upon former cases where the same remedy was sought and granted without question. Mackay v. San Francisco, 113 Cal. 392, 45 Pac. 696; Mackay v. San Francisco, 128 Cal. 678, 61 Pac. 382; Savings & Loan Society v. San Francisco, 131 Cal. 356, 63 Pac. 665; Bank of California v. San Francisco, 142 Cal. 276, 75 Pac. 832, 64 L. R. A. 918, 100 Am. St. Rep. 130; San Christina Inv. Co. v. San Francisco, 167 Cal. 762, 141 Pac. 384, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 676; Josselyn v. San Francisco, 168 Cal. 436, 143 Pac. 705. The propriety of protesting the payment of city and county taxes was not in those cases doubted by the municipality or by this court, so the matter was not put in issue; but on the principle of contemporary construction this fact lends strength to the view that the collection of city and county taxes was not only governed by the general law as a fact, but also as a matter of intention.

The contrary result reached by the District Court was based upon Justice v. Robinson, 142 Cal. 199, 75 Pac. 776. In that case the plaintiff sought to recover taxes paid to a drainage district, the payment having been made under protest in pursuance of section 3819 of the Political Code. We there held that the statute creating the drainage district provided no method of paying taxes under protest, neither did it adopt the provisions of the Political Code relating to the collection of state and county taxes. We are in agreement with the holding in that case. But it has no application to the facts here presented. Once it is fully appreciated that the city and county of San Francisco is, by the very constitutional provision authorizing its existence, a municipality, subject to all the restrictions of a city, it becomes clear that the same rules apply to it as apply to any city having a freeholders' charter. In municipal affairs the charter and any acts of the city in pursuance of it are paramount; but if, as here, the charter contains no provision on the particular subject that is self-executing, and nothing is done to carry the authorization of the charter into effect, then under the Constitution as it was when this action was begun, the general law remains paramount. Civic Center Ass'n v. Railroad Commission, 166 Pac. 351, 354.

It is claimed by respondent that "the mode * * * of collecting all taxes," which is the language used in section 4390, Political Code, does not include the payment of taxes under protest, from which it would follow that while other provisions of the general law for the collection of taxes would apply to San Francisco, section 3819, which is in the same chapter, would have no application. Respondent relies upon Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Los Angeles, supra. But that case was decided upon the point that the charter required a prior presentation of the claim, and what was said about section 3819 was a mere expression of doubt on the subject and no decision was made thereon. The exact question was decided in Hellman v. City of Los Angeles, 147 Cal. 653, 82 Pac. 313, where the court said:

> "It is quite plain that section 3819, found in chapter 7 of the Political Code, under the title of 'Collection of Property Taxes,' is a part of the 'mode and manner' of collecting state and county taxes, and is none the less a part of that mode and manner in that it deals with the right of the taxpayer to pay under protest. It would be absurd to say that the mode and manner of collecting taxes was limited solely to the right of the state and its tax collectors, and had reference only to the duties of the taxpayer, and no pertinency whatever to the taxpayer's correlative rights. It is a provision definitely declaring a certain mode and manner in which the taxpayer may pay his taxes and preserve his rights in case the assessment and levy should be found void. The statute is in derogation of the general common-law rule as to voluntary payments, and is befitting to this more enlightened age."

[6] Much of the difficulty that has arisen in this case is caused by the peculiar and anomalous position occupied by the city and county of San Francisco, having the powers and exercising the functions both of a city and of a county. It would be a fruitless task even to attempt to segregate the activities of the municipality and of its officers and employés according as they partake of the character of city or county functions. In so far as San Francisco has the attributes of a county, section 3819 of the Political Code by its terms applies; in so far as it has the attributes of a city, section 3819 is made applicable by reason of the failure of the charter to provide any other system for the collection of taxes. The exact status of the city and county of San Francisco, whether it is to be determined by the provisions relating to counties or by those relating to cities, is not, therefore, pertinent to the issue here presented. It is argued by respondent that the limitation on the rate of taxation cannot apply to taxes used for what are normally county purposes because they are prescribed by the state and no discretion as to their performance by the city and county of San Francisco would be permitted; consequently, the dollar limit would apply only to taxation for municipal purposes, and it is not alleged that the tax rate for such purposes exceeds the limit. Granting that the city and county cannot by a limitation upon its tax rate disable itself from performing the functions properly imposed upon it by the state, it does not appear that the limit fixed in this instance is insufficient to enable such functions to be performed. The question of the due performance of county duties being eliminated, the abstract right to place a limit upon the rate of county taxation becomes unimportant.

It follows that the complaint was not defective in the particulars claimed and that the demurrer was improperly sustained. We are not here concerned with the merits of plaintiffs' contention that the suspension of the dollar limit is invalid. That must in the first instance be determined by the trial court after answer by the respondent.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer to the complaint and permit the defendant to answer.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.; MELVIN, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. In its petition for a rehearing, the respondent urges that the opinion is in error in holding that section 4390 of the Political Code is applicable to the city and county of San Francisco. The criticism seems to be well founded. Ex parte Simpson, 47 Cal. 127; In re Pfahler, 150 Cal. 71, 88, 88 Pac. 270, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092, 11 Ann. Cas. 911.

But the decision may well stand without regard to section 4390. No mode for the collection of taxes has been prescribed in the charter itself, or by the legislative body of the city and county, under the authority given by the charter. Section 3819 of the Political Code is a general law, a part of the system established for the collection of county taxes. San Francisco is a county, as well as a city. Unless the provisions of the general law for the collection of taxes apply to San Francisco, the city and county is left without any scheme for collecting taxes. In the absence, at least, of any provision on the subject contained in, or made pursuant to, the charter, the scheme of which section 3819 is a part must be held to be in force in the city and county of San Francisco.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

WENTLAND et al. v. CLARK & HENERY CONST. CO. (Civ. 1846.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑281(1) — STREET IMPROVEMENTS—PAVING CONTRACTS —RIGHT OF LOT OWNERS.

In a proceeding for street improvements in a city of the sixth class under St. 1911, p. 736, § 12, providing that the owners of three-fourths of the lots liable to assessment therefor may, within 10 days after first publication of notice of award for paving contracts, enter into a written contract to do the work themselves and that if they fail to so elect within the 10 days the superintendent of streets shall enter into a contract therefor with the person to whom the award was made, section 13, providing for letting of the contract in case original bidder refuses to enter into the contract, and section 18, authorizing the superintendent of streets to make all written contracts, when the board of trustees made its award its powers ended and a notice under section 12, given to them within the 10 days after publication of notice of award, conferred no rights upon the property owners.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑519(1) — STREET IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENT LIEN.

Under the Improvement Act, a lien exists before the making of the record by the superintendent of streets, and an error in the record stating the contract was to be completed in 80 days, when the original contract on file called for 180 days, does not affect the lien.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑444—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—PAVEMENT CONTRACT—SPECIFICATIONS.

Where the specifications and the resolution of intention provided for improvement of a street between certain other streets, it was immaterial that the plans accompanying the specifications were in error as to the exact foot frontage of some owners, particularly where no appeal therefrom, under Improvement Act, § 26, was taken.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Actions by Fred Wentland and another, and Ann M. Phillips and another, against the Clark & Henery Construction Company. Judgment for defendant and the named plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Walter R. Dunn, of Oakland, for appellants. White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to quiet title from a street assessment with a cross-complaint by defendant for moneys claimed to be due under the assessment. There were three cases set down in the trial court at the same time for trial—the present case, No. 1846, and the case of Sarah A. Lillie v. Clark & Henery Construction Co. (No. 1845) 173 Pac. 483. In the third case Ann M. Phillips is plaintiff and is here on appeal in No. 1846. The trial court directed:

> "That the evidence introduced, so far as the same is applicable, shall be considered as directed to the case to which the testimony may be pertinent as it may be introduced."

At the hearing here, counsel addressed themselves to No. 1846 (Fred Wentland et al. v. Clark & Henery Construction Co.) with the understanding that the points involved were the same as in No. 1845 and should embrace the case in which said Phillips is plaintiff. Judgment went for defendant and cross-complainant. The appeal is from the judgment and is by plaintiffs Fred Wentland and Ann M. Phillips.

The city of Lodi, a city of the sixth class, by its city council, on October 9, 1914, adopted plans and specifications and passed a resolution of intention to grade, pave, and gutter three blocks of Pine street in said city "from the center line of Garfield street to the easterly city limits." The contract for the work was duly awarded to defendant on November 18, 1914, and publication of notice thereof duly given and made on November 20, 1914. Certain of the owners of lots fronting on that part of Pine street to be improved, among the number appellants Wentland and Phillips, decided to take over the proposed work themselves. A daughter of one of the interested parties telephoned on their behalf to the superintendent of streets, Coleman, within 10 days after the contract was awarded to respondent, informing him of their intention and requesting information as to the necessary procedure. He answered that he could do nothing for them.

Witness Fleming, one of the property owners, testified that he had a conversation with Mr. Coleman, street superintendent, two or three days prior to November 30, 1913, and was asked what the conversation was:

> "I asked him for plans and specifications for to figure on, told him we were to take over the paving and do it ourselves; and he said he didn't have any, couldn't furnish me any. He says: 'By the way, I have some specifications for curbing that I made myself. I can furnish them to you.' And he also gave them to me; and that was practically all there was said. Q.

Did you or did you not at that time tell him whether or not you wanted to take over the contract? A. I told him we were figuring on it, to take it over, and we wanted those plans and specifications to figure on, to know what we were to do. Q. Did you afterwards have any conversation with him after that, in regard to it? A. I did not. Q. Ever go to see him? A. I don't think I did."

No further notices were given to the superintendent of streets and no other requests were made to him. Counsel for plaintiff offered to prove by this witness that on November 30, 1914, the property holders went before the board of trustees "and then and there told the board of trustees they were there for the purpose of taking over the contract for the performance of this work, and that the board of trustees told them they were too late, and refused to let them have the contract." The offer was objected to as immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and the objection was sustained. Counsel for defendant moved "to strike out the testimony of the witness concerning the conversation between him and the superintendent of streets, Coleman, as being irrelevant and immaterial." The court:

"I can state right from the bench, with regard to testimony of that kind, it is not sufficient in legal effect to justify the court in taking any action on it. Now whether any testimony will be introduced upon which the court could take action, I cannot say until I have heard all the testimony."

No further testimony was offered by plaintiffs. The remaining evidence consisted of copies of certain of the proceedings in the matter of letting the contract, namely: the contract and the contractor's bond; certificate of the engineer; assessment; contractor's return; diagram; warrant; street superintendent's certificate; plans and resolution of intention.

It should be noted that plaintiffs made the following offer:

"Mr. Dunn (plaintiff's attorney): We want to prove by this witness (Mr. Coleman), the superintendent of streets, after the recording of this assessment, did not keep his office open during business hours, between the 14th day of—after recording the instrument—until the expiration of the 30 days within which the property holders were required to appeal to the board of trustees. Mr. White: To which offer I object as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, on the ground that the property owner, or any citizen has, or any party interested has, an entirely different mode of relief if a public officer don't keep his office open. The Court: The objection is sustained. We are not trying Mr. Coleman as to whether he has innocently rendered himself liable for damages by failure to keep his office open during business hours. Mr. Dunn: That is all."

[1] 1. The point principally urged by appellants is that it was the duty of the board of trustees, in response to the notice given them by the property owners, to direct the street superintendent to let the contract to them. The work in question was being done under the Improvement Act of April 7, 1911, Stats. 1911, p. 730. Section 12 of the act reads, in part, as follows:

"The owners of three-fourths of the * * * lots and lands liable to be assessed, or their agents, and who shall make oath that they are such owners or agents, shall not be required to present sealed proposals or bids, but may, within ten days after the first publication of said notice of said award, elect to take said work and enter into a written contract to do the whole work at the price at which the same has been awarded. * * *"

The section provides that:

"Should the said owners fail to elect to take said work and to enter into a written contract therefor within ten days, * * * it shall be the duty of the superintendent of streets to enter into a contract with the original holder to whom the contract was awarded and at the price specified in his bid."

The section does not specifically indicate to what officer or body the application of the owners must be made. Appellants claim, however, that:

"It may easily be drawn from section 13 that, in letting a new contract, the city council must disregard further election of the owners. In the absence of statutory direction to the contrary, the owners should have the right to make their election before either the city council or the superintendent of streets."

Section 13 throws no light upon the question. It simply provides that:

"If such original bidder neglects or refuses for fifteen days after the first publication of the notice of award, to enter then into the contract, the city council, without further proceedings, shall again advertise for proposals or bids," etc.

Section 18 provides as follows:

"The superintendent of streets is hereby authorized, in his official capacity, to make all written contracts, and to receive all bonds authorized by this act, and to do any other act, either express or implied, that pertains to the street department under this act," and setting forth sundry other powers and duties in respect of the contract.

When the board of trustees made its award, its powers and duties in respect of letting the contract ceased. It then became the duty of the superintendent of streets either to cause the contract to be entered into by the original bidder or with the property owners should they elect to take over the work. The statute confers this power and duty upon him, acting of course, in his official capacity, and it was not necessary for the board of trustees to take further action unless there was a failure on the part of the original bidder to enter into the contract, in which case the city council, under section 13, was directed to "again advertise for proposals or bids." The notice given by the property owners to the board of trustees conferred no rights upon them, nor did it impose any duty upon the board of trustees. Somewhat similar provisions to those in the Improvement Act are found in the act of 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 162). In Fairchild v. Wall, 93 Cal. 401, 29 Pac. 60, the superintendent of streets entered into a contract with the property owners after an award had been made to plaintiff. Mandamus was sought by plaintiff to compel the city council to enter into a contract with the plaintiff for the work. The writ was denied. As we understand that case, the superintendent of streets let the contract to the property owners without further authority than that conferred by the statute and without any action on the part of the city council other than making the award in the first instance.

Appellants do not rely, nor do we think under the facts shown they could rely, upon the notice given to the superintendent of streets. Their reliance is upon their construction of the statute that, upon the election of the property owners being made known to the board of trustees, it became the duty of that body to award the contract to the property owners and to direct the superintendent of streets to enter into the contract for the work with them. We cannot agree with appellants in their construction of the statute.

[2] 2. In copying into the record kept by the superintendent of streets, it was stated that the time for the completion of the contract was within 80 days. Concededly, the work was not completed within that time but was completed within 180 days. Defendant introduced the original contract which showed that the time of completion was within 180 days and the superintendent of streets testified that a mistake was made in copying it into the record. The original contract was on file in his office with other records and was open to inspection, as were other records. The mistake in recording the contract did not affect the lien for the reason that, under the provisions of the improvement act of 1911, a lien exists before the making of the record. Plaintiffs must have known of the terms of the award, and in offering to do the work on such terms they must have known the price to be paid.

It was held under the Vrooman Act, § 10 (St. 1885, p. 155), that a failure to record the contract will not prevent recovery. Perine v. Lewis, 128 Cal. 236, 60 Pac. 422, 772.

[3] 3. It is claimed that the assessment is invalid for the reason that the plans which accompanied the specifications for the work indicated that the frontage of plaintiff Wentland's lot was 155.5 feet and that the record of the assessment shows but 152 feet. Also, that in the case of the assessment of Ann M. Phillips the specifications showed that her lot had 286 feet frontage, whereas the assessment shows 294.51 feet.

The resolution of intention stated that the following work was to be done, to wit:

> "That Pine street in said city between the center of Garfield street and the easterly city limits be improved by grading the same * * * in accordance with the plans and specifications adopted therefor by the board of trustees of said city, October 9, 1914, to which said plans and specifications reference is hereby made for description of said work and further particulars."

No mention of lots is made.

The plans and specifications describe the work to be done the same as above; that is, Pine street between the center of Garfield street and to the easterly city limits. The plans attached to the specifications are made part thereof. The blueprint copy of the plans shows on its face that it is "plan for improvement of East Pine street, city of Lodi, California, between Garfield street and the east city limits."

The court found that this blueprint "indicated that the lot belonging to Fred Wentland, and which fronts on said street, had a frontage of 155.5 feet, and that the lot of plaintiff Ann M. Phillips, fronting on said street, had a frontage of 286 feet. In fact, the lot of Fred Wentland had a frontage of 152 feet and the lot of Ann M. Phillips had a frontage of 294.51 feet." The certificate of the city engineer states the whole amount each of the grading, paving, curbing, and gutters. Assessment No. 4, as made by the superintendent of streets, shows that the assessment is upon certain lots fronting on Pine street to the easterly city limits amounting in all to $3,460.90, and showing "the number of the lot and the amount assessed thereon." Attached to his certificate is a diagram showing the entire line of the work and the lots fronting on Pine street and the actual frontage of each on which the assessment was made. The Wentland assessment was on 152 feet, his actual frontage, and on 294.51 feet, the actual frontage of Ann M. Phillips' lot. It is not claimed that the entire work done was less than was certified to by the city engineer and superintendent of streets, and it is not contended that the actual frontage of the Phillips lot was less than that assessed. The specifications did not call for the improvement of a certain number of feet in front of each lot fronting on Pine street or for any specified number of feet. They called for the improvement of the street between certain stated points—from Garfield street to the easterly city limits, and it was not necessary to state in the specifications the frontage of each lot. The juridiction to do the work had its origin in the passage and publication and posting of the resolution of intention. Plaintiff Wentland has no cause for complaint, since he was assessed for less frontage than shown in the specifications and admittedly for his actual frontage. Nor can we see why plaintiff Phillips should escape payment because of the variance between the statement of an immaterial fact in the specifications and in the final certificate of the engineer of the actual length of the improved line of the street and the actual part of that line which was in front of the Phillips lot. Defendant's obligation was to complete the work as designated in the resolution of intention and this, concededly, it has done. The law fixes the liability of the lot owner, and, as no substantial right of any lot owner is shown to have been violated, the contractor should, pursuant to the statute, be paid for his work in accordance with his contract and the resolution of intention.

Section 26 of the act gives the right of appeal to the city council to all interested persons, if aggrieved, within 30 days after the date of the warrant, and the council is given power "to modify or correct any assessment in such manner as to them shall seem just," and the decision of the council is made final on all matters as to which an appeal is given. "No assessment, warrant, diagram or affidavit of demand and non-payment, after the issue of the same, and no proceedings prior to the assessment, shall be held invalid by any court for any error, informality, or other defect in the same, where the resolution of intention of the council to do the work, has been actually published as herein provided, and said notices of improvement have been posted along the line of the work, as provided in section five of this act, before the passage of the resolution ordering the work to be done."

The law was fully complied with in these particulars. No appeal was taken by any of the property owners at any stage of the proceedings.

Appellants seek to excuse their failure to appeal on the grounds: First, that the defects pointed out appeared on the face of the record and no appeal was necessary as the property owner was not aggrieved, citing Ryan v. Altschul, 103 Cal. 174, 176, 37 Pac. 339; and, second, because "the record was inaccessible by reason of being locked up as hereinbefore mentioned, and which appellants offered to prove." We do not think the record shows any invalidity in the assessment on its face or at all. Plaintiffs called Mr. Coleman, superintendent of streets, and made the offer set forth in the early part of this opinion to which objection was sustained. It does not appear, nor did plaintiffs offer to show, that the superintendent of streets was inaccessible and could not be found, or, being found, refused to allow plaintiffs access to the records. Nor does it appear, nor was it attempted to be shown, that plaintiffs had not or could not obtain the information necessary to take an appeal; nor does it appear that they had any intention to appeal, nor that they had any substantial grounds for appeal. On the contrary, as we have seen, the proceedings were regular and without substantial infirmity and that an appeal, if taken, would have been unavailing.

We fail to discover error in the ruling of the court or that appellants were excused from taking an appeal to the board of trustees if they felt aggrieved.

The judgment is affirmed.

BOND v. AICKLEY et al. (Civ. 2383.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION 🔑114(1) — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

In an action between grantees of a common grantor, in which defendants set up paramount title derived from remote owners by the common grantor after his deed to plaintiff, evidence held to show adverse possession by the common grantor and plaintiff as his grantee, which barred the title which the remote owners attempted to convey.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Suit by Mary Bond against Ruth Aickley, administratrix of the estate of W. C. Aickley, deceased, Irving E. Smith, and others. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant Smith appeals. Affirmed.

L. D. Manning and McKee & Tasheira, all of Oakland, and Matt. Wohrhaftig, for appellant. F. A. Berlin, of Oakland, for respondent.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. This action to quiet title was begun on June 4, 1907, by the plaintiff, Mary Bond, against W. C. Aickley, James Miller, and Lydia A. Larue individually and as the administratrix of the estate of James Larue, deceased. On September 1 1909, Aickley made a deed of the property in controversy to Irving E. Smith, after which Aickley died, and his widow, Ruth, who had become his administratrix, and Smith, his grantee, were substituted in his stead as defendants. From the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, Smith appeals.

The action was once before appealed to the Supreme Court and reversed by that court. Bond v. Aickley, 168 Cal. 161, 141 Pac. 1188. At the time of the first trial, from which that appeal was taken, none of the parties attempted to deraign title from any paramount source. that case for the facts as they appeared in the record at that time.

On the second trial the defendants attempted to show a paramount title derived by William C. Aickley subsequent to his deed to Annie Bond. This attempt was based upon two deeds to the property executed the one by Lydia A. Larue upon April 2, 1907, purporting to convey an undivided one-half of the property to Aickley, and the other by R. C. Corrigan, dated September 24, 1908, and purporting to convey the whole thereof to Aickley. The appellant claims that Lydia A. Larue and Corrigan, when they executed these deeds to Aickley, held the title to this property. The property is a part of a small tract 37½ feet wide at one end, and running down to a point apparently at the other, known to searchers of record in Alameda county as "No man's land." It is a portion of the rancho San Antonio, which was a Mexican grant made to Antonio Maria Peralta, confirmed by a patent of the United States dated September 15, 1874. Previous to the patent the title to the strip of land, of which the little lot in controversy here formed a part, had been obscured and entangled by conveyances of parts of the ranch to many parties; and, while we have examined this record with care after the manner of a technical title attorney, and find that the title apparently did not, at the time of their deeds to Aickley, rest in either Mrs. Larue or Corrigan, we are not confronted with the necessity of determining that point, because the plaintiff's title seems to be supported by proof of adverse possession on the part of W. C. Aickley before he deeded to Mrs. Bond, coupled with the possession of Annie Bond, his grantee, and the plaintiff, Mary Bond, subsequent to that date and extending down to the time of filing the complaint in this action.

It appears that this strip of land was vacant in 1890; that there were no improvements thereon, and no one was in possession thereof. About that time W. C. Aickley went upon the land, and between 1890 and 1892 he improved it by placing a two-room house thereon. He retained possession of the property in person, and by the improvements which he placed thereon until the year 1892, when he went to live with Annie Bond, and remained with her without paying any board for five or six years. Evidently feeling under obligation to her, Aickley, on the 16th day of April, 1894, about three or four years after he took possession of the property, conveyed it to Annie Bond, and on the 5th day of February 1895, Annie Bond quitclaimed the same to the plaintiff, Mary Bond. During the years between the time when Aickley took possession of the property and the beginning of this action either Aickley or Annie Bond or Mary Bond maintained the house upon the premises, making various improvements of a substantial character thereon, occupying the house, and at times leasing the same to a tenant. While they were not always in actual, physical possession of the property by being actually personally located in the home, they did always claim title thereto, and always held the possession thereof so far as the acts above described show possession. There is no evidence that any other person ever had possession of the property during this period, and the evidence shows that some one of the parties was at various times and during most of this period in actual physical possession thereof, and that they claimed ownership of the property, Annie Bond and Mary Bond especially asserting title thereto at all times by reason of their deed from Aickley. The evidence of the various movements of this family is not perfectly co-ordinated; but it is sufficient to show an ownership claimed against the world, and a possession adverse to every person who might claim the property against them. Aickley and the Bonds evidently paid the taxes on the property during the years when they respectively occupied it and held and claimed to own it. From 1891 to 1897 the property was assessed to Samuel Lewis. The evidence shows that the plaintiff had the tax bills from 1892 down to 1900 consecutively. These tax bills were in the office of her attorney in San Francisco at the time of the great fire of 1906, and were badly damaged in that catastrophe; but they were produced in court, and this, in connection with other evidence as to the payment of the taxes, is sufficient to sustain the finding of the court that the taxes were paid by Annie Bond and the plaintiff. While the evidence upon the subject of the payment of taxes, and also upon the subject of adverse possession, is not as full as could be desired, it must be said, in passing upon the findings made by the court based upon this evidence that often one of the most difficult things to prove is the name of the person paying taxes, and that we can find no fault with the findings of the trial court upon these propositions. This being so, the after-acquired title of Aickley from Corrigan and Mrs. Larue was barred by the adverse possession of himself, and of Annie and Mary Bond thereafter, before this action was begun.

EDSON et al. v. MANCEBO. (Civ. 1564.)

1. Sales 🔑439 — Breach of Warranty — Proof.

Where a stallion was sold under written warranty that he was a 60 per cent. foal-getter, and that, if not, the sellers would furnish another stallion on his redelivery, etc., to defeat the sellers' action on the buyer's notes it was incumbent on the latter to show that the stallion failed to meet the warranty, that he was properly cared for, and that the buyer delivered or was legally excused from delivering him to the sellers in as good condition as when sold.

2. SALES 🔑287(6)—BREACH OF WARRANTY—DUTY TO RETURN—EXCUSE.

Where the buyer of a stallion under warranty as to his procreative powers offered to return the horse on discovery of deficiency in that respect, but the sellers refused to furnish him with another horse, as they had agreed, the sellers' refusal to comply with their agreement relieved the buyer of an obligation to do more than offer to return the horse.

3. SALES 🔑287(3)—BREACH OF WARRANTY—OFFER TO RETURN—TIMELINESS.

Where a stallion was sold under warranty as to his procreative powers, which warranty was not limited to the season of 1913, and the buyer, on discovery of his defect in respect to such powers, offered to return him in the latter part of 1913, or the early part of the spring of 1914, as soon as practicable after the ascertainment of the stallion's incapacity, the offer to return was timely within the warranty, since, though the buyer could not retain the horse indefinitely without offer to return, it was not unreasonable to try him for another season.

4. TRIAL 🔑252(13)—INSTRUCTION—LACK OF SUPPORT IN EVIDENCE.

In an action on notes given for the price of a stallion, where there was no evidence that the buyer's offer to return the stallion for breach of warranty of procreativeness was not seasonably made, an instruction that the contract between the sellers and buyer required that the buyer, within a reasonable time after the breeding season of 1913, demand that the seller replace the stallion with another, and that, if the buyer did not within such time demand that the stallion be replaced, and his notes were not induced by fraud or misrepresentation, it was the jury's duty to bring in verdict for the sellers, was unsupported by any evidence, and properly refused.

5. TRIAL 🔑199 — DETERMINATION OF ISSUE OF FRAUD—PROVINCE OF COURT.

An instruction which would have submitted to the jury the issue of fraud in the notes in suit, given for the price of a stallion, where defendant asked reformation and enforcement of contract, which was reserved and determined by the court itself in accordance with the averments of the answer, was properly refused; it being the province of the court, and not of the jury, to determine the issue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Suit by James Edson and Frank Brown, doing business under the firm name of Edson & Brown, copartners, against M. A. Mancebo. From judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

William V. Cowan, of Sacramento, for appellants. F. W. Henderson, of Merced, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. This suit was brought to recover upon three promissory notes executed by respondent on March 5, 1913. The validity of the notes was not disputed nor was it denied that the amount claimed was unpaid. The defense was that they were given for the payment of a certain stallion purchased by respondent from appellants upon a certain guaranty that failed and thereby avoided the contract. It is not disputed that there was a written guaranty, as follows:

"If the above-named stallion should not get 60 per cent. of the producing mares that are properly bred and returned for second trial at the end of the third week in foal, during the breeding season commencing April 1st, and ending August 1st, with proper care and management, we agree to find another stallion of the same size, breed, and quality upon delivery of the above-named stallion in as good condition as at present to our barn at Sacramento, California."

Another defense was that the respondent was illiterate; that he could not and did not read the contract; that appellants, through their agent, deceived respondent as to the terms of the guaranty, by reading it to him so he thought it provided that said stallion was potent to the extent of getting at least 60 per cent. of the mares bred to him in foal, and, that in the event of his failing so to do, said stallion might be returned and the notes hereinbefore mentioned canceled and returned to defendant. Respondent therefore asked to have the contract reformed in that respect and enforced as thus reformed. There is no dispute as to the sufficiency of the pleadings, and therefore the demurrer need not be considered.

A jury found a general verdict for the defendant, and the court reformed the guaranty as prayed for, and gave judgment to the defendant for his costs.

[1] We may consider the case first upon the theory that the written guaranty contained the real agreement of the parties. In that respect, to defeat the action, it was incumbent upon the defendant to show that the horse failed to meet the procreative requirement, that he was properly cared for, and that respondent delivered or was legally excused from delivering said stallion to appellants in as good condition as when said stallion was sold at their barn in Sacramento. In other words, there must have been a violation of the warranty on the part of appellants and no default on the part of respondent. This, of course, the law required, and the jury was so instructed.

[2] Considering, then, the terms of the warranty, we may say that the evidence was ample to show that the horse was woefully lacking in potency. It would probably not be inappropriate to call him a "slacker." It would do no good to repeat the evidence, but it has been read with some care. Nor can it be doubted that the horse received proper care and management, and that during all the time in controversy he remained in as good condition as when he was sold. The only remaining element relates to the duty of the defendant to redeliver the horse to the plaintiffs at Sacramento. He did not so deliver him, but there is substantial evidence from which the reasonable inference follows that he was not in default for his omission thus to return the horse. After ascertaining that the stallion was deficient, he had a conversation with one Biggerstoff as follows:

> "I told him that horse is no good, to take that horse away and give me my notes back. 'Take that horse; if you don't give me another horse like that, I want to make money for to pay for it.' * * * I say, 'The horse is no good, Mr. Biggerstoff; you better do that.' He said, 'I am going to sell it.' * * * He said he would not give me the horse that would weigh the same as that. He would not get it; he said, 'This is a big Belgian I got,' and he said, 'I cannot get another horse just like that, that weigh the same.'"

As to this, it might be stated that Biggerstoff represented appellants throughout the transaction. There is no doubt of the sufficiency of the evidence not only to show ostensible, but real, agency on his part. Said conversation may therefore be regarded as if it had taken place with the appellants themselves. The result is that upon the offer of respondent to return the horse as he had agreed appellants declined and refused to furnish him with another horse as they had promised. The conditions being mutual and concurrent, the refusal of appellants to comply with their covenant, of course, relieved respondent of an obligation to do more than to make the offer.

Under such circumstances offer to perform is equivalent to performance. No citation of authority is required for the support of such proposition. We may say, though, that the principle is recognized in section 1511 of the Civil Code. As to the good faith of respondent, we may add that he attempted to sell the horse, in fact, delivering him to said Biggerstoff for that purpose upon the latter's solicitation, but the effort failed of any results, and there is evidence in the record that the horse was and is without any appreciable value.

From the showing made by respondent we may therefore conclude that the consideration for the notes was lost through the failure of the warranty without any default on the part of the respondent.

The evidence being sufficient to support the first defense of respondent, it is unnecessary to consider the second. In fact, support for the first would necessarily cover the second.

Appellants seem to think that the conclusion reached is opposed to the doctrine of the case of Union Investment Co. v. F. M. Landon Co., 32 Cal. App. 305, 162 Pac. 903, decided by this court. Therein it is true that in a similar action upon a similar contract it was held that a mere offer to return was not sufficient to entitle the vendees in an action brought against them to recover the balance of the purchase price to successfully urge the breach of the warranty as to the breeding qualities of the horse as a defense to the action. But in that case there was no waiver of the performance on the part of the vendees, and it was very justly said:

> "And there could be a failure of consideration only in case the stallion failed to come up to the percentage for foal-getting provided by the warranty and the refusal or failure of the vendees to replace the stallion with another of the same breed and value."

Herein we are justified in holding that the horse fell short of the warranty, that there was a refusal of the vendors to supply another animal as agreed, and that they waived the performance by respondent of his agreement to deliver the horse at Sacramento.

[3] Another point made by appellant is:

> "That the failure of the defendant to offer to return the horse within a reasonable time after August, 1913, precluded him from setting up a lack of consideration."

There is evidence, however, that this offer was made in the latter part of the year 1913, or in the early part of the spring of 1914. It was timely, for two reasons: First, because it was as soon as practicable after the ascertainment of the fact as to the horse's incapacity; and, second, because the warranty was not limited to the season of 1913. Manifestly the vendee would not be permitted to retain the horse indefinitely without offer to return him, but it would not be unreasonable to hold that he might elect to try him for another season to determine beyond question the ability of the horse to meet the situation.

Moreover, it appears from the testimony of appellants that, if the offer had been made immediately after August 1, 1913, it would have been of no avail, since it would not have been accepted and no exchange would have been made. Therefore any delay was without prejudice to appellants.

[4, 5] The only other point made is that the court erred in refusing to give the following instruction:

> "I instruct you that the contract between the plaintiff and defendant required defendant within a reasonable time after the breeding season of 1913 to demand that plaintiff replace the stallion Socrates with another stallion. If you find from the evidence that the defendant did not within such time demand that said stallion be replaced, and if you further find that said notes were not induced by fraud or misrepresentation, it is your duty to bring in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff."

But it is sufficient to say that, if there was an offer, it was made within a reasonable time. In other words, there is no evidence that it was not seasonably made. Hence the theory of the instruction in that respect was not supported by any evidence. Besides, appellants admit that they would have refused any offer made after August 1, 1913. In view of that admission, they could not claim that an offer should have been made immediately thereafter. It would have been an idle act, and therefore not required.

Moreover, the instruction would have submitted to the jury the issue of fraud, whereas it was reserved and determined by the court itself in accordance with the averments of the answer. It was the province of the court, and not of the jury, to determine that issue.

Respondent claims that the record shows that the judgment has been satisfied, and therefore no appeal lies. We find no such evidence in the transcript, but for the reasons stated we think the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

IRVINE v. POSTAL TELEGRAPH-CABLE CO. (Civ. 2311.)

1. CONTRACTS 🔑138(2) — CONTRACT TO FURNISH TELEGRAPH PRIVILEGES—ILLEGALITY—RELIEF.

Under Civ. Code, § 1451, providing that, if one of the alternative acts required by an obligation becomes unlawful or impossible of performance, the obligation is to be interpreted as though the other stood alone, where a contract whereby a telegraph company secured a right of way for its line over plaintiff's land provided that the consideration for the rights granted was "telegraph privileges to the amount of $1,500, which said amount shall be taken in the use of telegraph privileges at the usual and ordinary rates," on the company's failure to deliver telegraph franks when needed and requested, after federal and state laws prohibited telegraph companies from issuing franks for any consideration whatsoever except cash, the contract became one to pay the sum of money designated as a consideration for the privileges granted, since the amount of money named was the exact equivalent of the telegraph privileges which the company was compelled to furnish.

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑113 — OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS—PROHIBITION AGAINST STATES.

The provision of Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, against the passage of laws impairing the obligation of contracts applies expressly only to the states, and not to Congress.

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑155—OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS—FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Under Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, providing that no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, where a telegraph company, in consideration of a grant of right of way for its line over plaintiff's land, agreed to furnish telegraph privileges to the amount of $1,500, the state Public Utilities Act, passed thereafter, prohibiting telegraph companies from issuing franks for any consideration except cash, had no effect on the obligation of the telegraph company to furnish franks for intrastate messages.

4. CONTRACTS 🔑137(2)—PARTIAL ILLEGALITY — SEVERABLE CHARACTER — INTRASTATE AND INTERSTATE MESSAGES.

Where a telegraph company's contract, in return for grant of a right of way, to furnish privileges or franks to the amount of $1,500, became void as to interstate messages by the subsequent enactment of the Interstate Commerce Act (Act Cong. Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 379), it did not also become void and unenforceable as to intrastate messages, as to which the franking privilege was within the protection of Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, providing that no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, since the contract to furnish telegraph privileges to the amount specified was not entire and inseparable; interstate and intrastate messages being clearly separable in fact and law.

5. CONTRACTS 🔑138(2)—ILLEGALITY OF PERFORMANCE—RIGHT OF ACTION.

Where a telegraph company, in consideration of a right of way, agrees to accord plaintiff $1,500 worth of telegraph privileges, and performance thereafter becomes illegal on account of federal and state legislation prohibiting grant of telegraph franks, the reasonable value of the right of way granted the telegraph company being $1,500, and the only consideration ever received by plaintiff being $500.26 worth of franks, plaintiff has a cause of action for the recovery of $999.74.

6. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES 🔑20(5) — GENERAL DEMURRER—STATEMENT OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

In an action against a telegraph company to recover on quantum meruit for a right of way furnished it, for which it agreed to accord plaintiff $1,500 in telegraph privileges, performance on its part having become illegal under legislation prohibiting franks, the complaint, which failed to allege the company continued in possession after September, 1913, but alleged that the value of the right of way and the use and enjoyment thereof by the company and its predecessor up to that date was $1,500, stated a cause of action as against general demurrer.

7. CONTRACTS 🔑138(1) — SUBSEQUENT ILLEGALITY—EFFECT.

The rule that, where parties to an illegal contract are in pari delicto, the court leaves them as it finds them, and there can be no recovery for the reasonable value of the property transferred under it, does not apply where the contract, when made, was legal, just, and equitable, but has become unlawful in part by subsequent legislation.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by James Irvine against the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company, a corporation. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Guy C. Earl and W. H. Spaulding, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Willard P. Smith and Berkeley B. Blake, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment following an order sustaining defendant's general demurrer to plaintiff's second amended complaint.

The complaint alleges the execution of a written contract on April 29, 1893, between the plaintiff and defendant's predecessor in interest, the Pacific Postal Telegraph-Cable Company, and the assignment of the contract by the Pacific Postal Telegraph Company to defendant; that by the terms of the contract plaintiff granted to the telegraph company a right of way and easement to construct and maintain poles for telegraph lines across his property. The alleged consideration for the said grant was the sum of $1,500 cash, the defendant to have the privilege, however, of paying in telegraph franks to that amount. The contract, which was attached to the complaint and made a part thereof, provided that the consideration for the rights and privileges was to be "telegraph privileges over the lines of the said party of the second part upon what is known as the Pacific Coast lines to the amount of $1,500, which said amount of $1,500 shall be taken in the use of telegraph privileges at the usual and ordinary rates." It is further alleged that the plaintiff performed all of the obligations on his part to be performed, but that the defendant since the month of September, 1913, failed to issue to plaintiff any telegraph franks or allow him any telegraph privileges, and that the only consideration ever received by him was and is telegraph privileges of the value of $500.26; that the right of way granted to defendant is upwards of nine miles in length and extends across valuable lands of the plaintiff; and that said right to erect and maintain telegraph poles and wires, with the right of ingress and egress across plaintiff's said lands, was on the 29th day of April, 1893, ever since has been, and now is, of the reasonable value of $1,500 cash; that the actual use and enjoyment by the defendant and its predecessor in interest of the said rights and easement from said 29th day of April, 1893, to the commencement of this action was and is reasonably worth the sum of $1,500, and as a result of defendant's failure to issue any franks since September, 1913, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $999.74. The prayer of the complaint is that defendant be required to issue telegraph franks and to grant plaintiff telegraph privileges in accordance with the agreement of the value, at the usual rates, of $999.74, or that defendant be ordered and directed to pay plaintiff cash in said sum, and for such other or additional relief as the facts would warrant.

In support of the order sustaining the general demurrer it is argued that the law, both federal and state, enacted and in force since the execution of the contract in controversy, prohibited telegraph companies from issuing franks for any consideration whatsoever except cash; that therefore defendant is excused and relieved from any obligation to furnish further franks to plaintiff; and that no consideration other than franks can be required of defendant under the terms of the contract. This position is untenable under the construction of the contract compelled by the weight of authority, namely, that by its terms the contract in question is in effect in the alternative, and, secondly, because intrastate messages are not prohibited either by the state or federal laws.

[1] The contract provides that the consideration for the rights granted by said agreement is "telegraph privileges * * * to the amount of $1,500, which said amount shall be taken in the use of telegraph privileges at the usual and ordinary rates." Upon the failure of the obligor to deliver telegraph franks when needed and requested the contract, in our opinion, became one to pay the sum of money designated as the consideration for the privileges granted by the contract, and this is so, we think, because the amount of money named in the contract was the exact equivalent of the value of the telegraph privileges which the obligor was compelled to furnish.

In the case of Marshall v. Ferguson, 23 Cal. 69, the obligation was "to pay $650 in grain at the market price" on a certain date. The court said:

> "It was not an agreement to deliver any specified parcel or quantity of grain, but he (the obligor) was to deliver a sufficient quantity which, at the market price, would amount to the sum of $650. * * * Under these circumstances it was the duty of the defendant to deliver the grain on or before the day named to the plaintiff, and his failure to do so made him liable to pay the sum named in money."

In the case of Beckwith v. Sheldon, 168 Cal. 742, 145 Pac. 97, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 963, the obligation was "to convey * * * the sum of $50,000 in bonds * * * at par." The court, construing this to be a provision for performance in the alternative, said:

> "Looking to the terms of the agreement, it is easily seen that it is not a mere agreement for the delivery of the bonds. The promise is 'that there shall be paid to' Beckwith 'the sum of $50,000.' This is not an agreement to sell or deliver bonds, but a promise to pay money. The addition of the words 'in bonds of the * * * company at par' does not change it into an agreement solely for the delivery of the bonds, but merely gives the payor the option or privilege of making such payment by delivering the bonds as specified when the time of performance arrived."

We see no difference in principle between the contracts construed in the two cases last cited and the contract in suit here. If, therefore, the obligation to pay "telegraph franks up to the amount of $1,500 at the usual and ordinary rates" is an alternative obligation and gives the obligor an election up to the time of payment (the time of payment being from time to time as the franks are needed by plaintiff), and conceding as the defendant contends, that the obligation to issue the franks has become unlawful, then the alternative obligation to pay the coin stands alone. Civ. Code, § 1451.

[2, 3] The federal Constitution does not prohibit Congress from making laws which impair the obligations of contracts (8 Cyc. 929), but it does provide that "no state shall * * * pass any * * * law impairing the obligation of contracts." Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10. The contract here involved when made was lawful, and while Congress may pass an interstate commerce act which would impair the obligation of the contract in so far as it relates to interstate messages, still there remain the intrastate messages within the state of California covered by the contract which would not be affected by the Interstate Commerce Act (Act Cong. Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 379), and which could only be affected, if at all, by the state Public Utilities Act (St. 1911 [Ex. Sess.] p. 18). With respect to that act our Supreme Court has held that:

> "There is still the Constitution of the United States, the supreme law of this state, supreme over its Constitution and over its Legislature; and of no protection accorded by that instrument to a litigant before this court can that litigant be deprived. Therefore, if it shall be that among the powers conferred by the Legislature upon the Railroad Commission are those whose exercise by that commission do violence to a petitioner's rights under the Constitution of the United States, protection under that Constitution will be awarded him." Pac. Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 137 Pac. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822.

It is still legal, therefore, to issue under the contract in question telegraph franks for intrastate messages.

[4] It is urged that the contract is not enforceable as to the intrastate messages if void as to the interstate messages, because the contract is entire and inseparable. This point is not well taken, for interstate and intrastate messages are clearly separable in fact and in law. They constitute distinct classes of messages and are governed by distinct bodies of laws, the one being governed by the laws of the United States, and the other governed by the laws of the state within which the message is to be conveyed. The pleadings allege the failure and refusal of the defendant to issue franks or allow privileges for intrastate messages, and, as the contract might be enforced and plaintiff allowed to receive his consideration in the form of intrastate messages, a perfectly feasible and practicable procedure, the complaint, in this particular at least, states a cause of action upon the contract.

[5] But, apart from these considerations, the prayer of the complaint asks for general relief, and the facts alleged are sufficient, in any event, to constitute a cause of action for recovery of the reasonable value of the rights granted. The complaint alleges that the reasonable value of the privileges granted has at all times been, and now is, $1,500. Facts are alleged to support this claim, and it is averred that the only consideration ever received by plaintiff for the same was $500.26 worth of franks; that plaintiff has actually suffered damage by reason of the refusal to issue franks or to pay any other consideration for the granted rights and easements, such damage being in the sum of $999.74.

[6] Defendant contends that the complaint fails to state a cause of action on a quantum meruit because it fails to allege that defendant continued in possession after September, 1913. This contention is without merit. The complaint alleges that the value of the right of way and the use and enjoyment thereof by the defendant and its predecessor up to September, 1913, was $1,500. Consequently the failure to allege that defendant continued in possession after September, 1913, does not militate against the sufficiency of the complaint when tested by a general demurrer.

[7] Defendant further contends that, where a contract is illegal, there can be no recovery for the reasonable value of the property transferred under it, and in this behalf cites a number of cases where the contract involved, at the time it was made, was contrary to an express provision of law, or to good morals. The rule that, where parties to an illegal contract are in pari delicto, the court leaves them as it finds them, does not apply in the present case, where the contract was a legal, just, and equitable one when made, but which has become unlawful in part by subsequent legislation. To deny recovery for property conveyed under a contract legal when made, and legal when the property was conveyed, but which by reason of a change in public policy has become unlawful, would be to take property without due process of law.

For the above reasons, the judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer and require the defendant to answer.

PEOPLE v. WARRINER. (Cr. 586.)

Indictment and Information ⟹130—Joinder of Offenses.

Rape and commission of lewd and lascivious conduct with a child, by Pen. Code, § 288, made a felony, may be charged in different counts in the same information, under section 954, permitting it as to offenses of the same class of crimes.

Appeal from Superior Court, County of San Diego; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Charles H. Warriner was convicted of rape, and appeals. Affirmed.

E. L. Johnson and E. M. Parker, both of San Diego, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. By the information of the district attorney filed in this case the defendant was charged under two counts: First, with having committed the crime of rape; and, second, with having committed lewd and lascivious acts, such as are described by section 288 of the Penal Code. Both crimes were alleged to have been committed on the same day and with the same female child, who is alleged to have been of the age of 13 years. The jury returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty of the crime of rape, and not guilty on the second count of the information. Defendant appeals from the judgment of imprisonment entered and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Preliminarily it may be stated that there was submitted to the jury ample evidence to justify the verdict of guilty as returned. The only point urged on this appeal is one which goes to the form of pleading in the information. Section 288 makes it a felony for a person to commit lewd and lascivious acts with a child. There was a demurrer to the information. Appellant contends that it is not allowable to charge two offenses in the same information, both of which refer to the same acts alleged to have been committed by a defendant, where it appears that the defendant could not be guilty of both offenses. He argues that the charge is inconsistent in this case, because, had the defendant been guilty as alleged in the second count of the information, he could not have been guilty of the crime of rape, and vice versa. Section 954 of the Penal Code provides that an indictment or information may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, "or two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses, under separate counts." To our minds it is clear that the two offenses charged by the information in this case were of the same class of crimes. On the face of the information it could not be told whether the acts relied upon to show that the crime of rape had been committed were the same as those relied upon to sustain the charge contained in the second count. Both crimes might have been committed on the same day and with the same person. The demurrer was properly overruled. Had the jury found the defendant guilty on both counts of the information, and had the evidence shown that the crime of rape had been committed, and no other evidence offered against the defendant, the judgment might with more plausibility be attacked. However, the jury affirmatively held the defendant guiltless of the second offense charged, and we can see that he has suffered no prejudice by reason of the double charge made in the information. The crime of rape was charged in language sufficient to satisfy the requirement of the statute.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

RUTHERFORD v. OTT et al. (Civ. 2251.)

1. TRUSTS 🔑225—CREDITS TO TRUSTEE—EXPENSES FOR BROKER.

The employment of real estate brokers by a trustee, required to sell real estate and distribute the proceeds, being reasonably necessary, and the sum paid by him therefor reasonable compensation, he should be allowed therefor.

2. PERPETUITIES 🔑1—PAYMENT FOR CARE OF CEMETERY LOT.

There is no tying up of property, creating a perpetuity, by payment, in accordance with provision of trust, to a cemetery association, or to person or persons having charge of upkeep of cemetery, to care for cemetery plot, even if there be an agreement to care for it for all time.

3. CHARITIES 🔑33—GIFT TO PASTOR.

A gift to a particular church is a gift to the pastor or other person or persons to whom the revenues of that particular church are payable, or by whom they are controlled or disbursed.

4. CHARITIES 🔑4—LIMITATION ON AMOUNT—STATUTE.

Civ. Code, § 1313, limiting to a third of the estate bequests for devises to charity, does not apply to a trust not testamentary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Suit by Wallace Rutherford against Monica L. Ott and others. From the judgment, plaintiff and defendants Lena McNally and others appeal. Reversed in part, with directions.

Wallace Rutherford, of Napa, in pro. per. E. L. Webber, of Napa, James A. Nowland, of St. Helena, and Frank M. Silva, of Napa, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. This case arises out of a trust created by Lena Ott in her lifetime. After her death the property of the trust was sold, and the trust fully administered. The trustee then brought this suit against the beneficiaries of the trust to settle his accounts and to obtain a judgment directing distribution of the trust assets. A judgment resulted, and two appeals were taken which are here for determination.

The trustee has appealed from the disallowance of three items in his account: (1) $231.25 paid by him as brokers' commissions upon the sale of real property; (2) $150 paid by him for the care of the cemetery plot of the author of the trust at St. Helena as provided in the trust; (3) $250 disallowed in respect of the trustee's claim for compensation. The other appeal is by beneficiaries under the trust who are also heirs at law of the decedent. The trust contained provisions for the payment of certain sums, hereafter to be mentioned, which these appellants claimed to be invalid. The court below held otherwise; hence the appeal.

We shall first take up the appeal of the trustee and deal with the items disallowed below, and then consider the merits of the other appeal.

[1] 1. Under the terms of the trust the trustee was bound to sell the real property of the trust estate and to distribute the proceeds. The trustee attempted to make a sale of the property, but was unable to do so, and after repeated endeavors with many prospective purchasers he finally employed real estate brokers. Through their efforts the sale was made, and the trustee, in good faith, paid them commissions to the amount of $231.25, which was the usual and a reasonable rate. The court below disallowed this item in conformity with the practice of disallowing commissions established by the learned trial judge to govern the administration of estates of deceased persons in the court over which he presides. The general idea which underlies the custom followed below is a very commendable one, inasmuch as its purpose is to reduce the cost of the administration of estates; but the rule cannot be made an inflexible one, and exceptions thereto must be indulged now and then. In this case we think the evidence shows that the employment of real estate brokers was reasonably necessary, and that the sum paid them by the trustee was a reasonable compensation. The testimony dealing with this phase of the case is not extended, for the reason that no beneficiary made objection to the expenditure, but we think that the evidence, which is uncontradicted, is ample to establish the conclusion reached by us.

[2] 2. The trustee paid to the rector of the Roman Catholic Church at St. Helena, who has charge of the Roman Catholic Cemetery at St. Helena, the sum of $150 to insure appropriate care of the cemetery plot of the author of the trust. This payment was in accordance with the provisions of the trust. The court below, upon the objection of some of the beneficiaries of the trust, held that this payment was an attempt to create a perpetuity, and therefore invalid. In this we think there was error. Such payments to a cemetery association, or to the person or persons who have charge of the upkeep of a cemetery, do not involve a perpetuity. The payment is made as a consideration for an agreement to give appropriate care to the cemetery plot, and, even if there be an agreement to care for that plot for all time, there is no tying up property giving rise to a perpetuity.

3. In his account the trustee made claim to compensation in an amount which the court below reduced by $250. Although the services of the trustee extended over a considerable period of time and were properly and zealously performed, nevertheless, considering the size of the trust estate, we think it was a legitimate exercise of discretion for the court to reduce the compensation by the amount disallowed.

This disposes of the questions presented by the appeal of the trustee, and we shall now take up the appeal of the beneficiaries.

[3] By the terms of the trust the trustee was required to pay specified sums of money to specified Roman Catholic churches for the celebration of masses in line with the pious intention of the author of the trust. It is claimed by the beneficiaries that these churches had not legal capacity to take the donations provided for in the trust, but we think the only question involved is the question to whom these donations were made. In re Gibson, 75 Cal. 329, 17 Pac. 438.

"A bequest to a school has been held to be a gift to a schoolmaster; one to a church, a gift to the parson and his successors; one to parishioners, a gift to church wardens." Domestic & Foreign Mission Societies' Appeal, 30 Pa. 436.

In line with these obviously correct decisions we hold that a gift to a particular church is a gift to the pastor or rector of that church, or to the vestrymen or trustees of the congregation, or to the presiding elder or bishop, or to any other person or persons to whom the revenues of that particular church are payable or by whom they are controlled or disbursed.

It is conceded by appellants that, if the direction had been to make payment to the pastor of the church rather than to the church itself, the direction would have been valid. Estate of Lennon, 152 Cal. 330, 92 Pac. 870, 125 Am. St. Rep. 58, 14 Ann. Cas. 1024.

The conclusion thus reached by us makes it unnecessary to here deal with the question whether gifts for masses, oftentimes in line with special intentions of donors and which are gifts for the promotion of divine worship, do or do not give rise to charitable trusts, which are defined to involve gifts for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, either by bringing their hearts and minds under the influence of education or religion, or otherwise contributing to the betterment of their bodies or minds. These questions have been before the courts (Estate of Lennon, 152 Cal. 327, 92 Pac. 870, 125 Am. St. Rep. 58, 14 Ann. Cas. 1024; 11 C. J. 322, 2 Coffey, 165), but the position of the appellants has been otherwise met, and we need not now discuss the question just stated.

[4] It is also argued that the gifts to charity under the trust exceed one-third of the trust estate. Without stopping to decide the question of fact thus presented, we hold that the provisions of section 1313, Civil Code, apply only to wills (Bowdoin College v. Merritt [C. C.] 75 Fed. 480), and therefore do not apply to the trust here involved. Furthermore, it is clear that this trust cannot be said to be testamentary in character. Tennant v. Tennant, 167 Cal. 570, 577, 140 Pac. 242.

This disposes of the appeal by the beneficiaries.

As a result of the views expressed, we order that the judgment be reversed, with directions to the lower court to allow to the trustee the two items above mentioned, $231.25 and $150, with his costs of appeal, and that in all other respects the judgment be affirmed.

OSBORN v. HENRY COWELL LIME & CEMENT CO.

LONG et al. v. SAME.

(Civ. 2365, 2366.)

1. Landlord and Tenant 🔑22(4) — Contract to Execute Lease—Evidence.

In action against owner for failure to execute lease, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that defendant refused to execute the lease according to contract.

2. Landlord and Tenant 🔑22(2)—Lease—Contract for—Construction.

A contract to lease a one-story building, except space leased to J. W., "lessees to have the exclusive right to the roof for sign space, for which privilege they agree to keep the roof in good order and repair," was clearly an agreement to lease the entire roof.

3. Evidence 🔑441(4)—Varying Terms of Written Lease.

Where a contract for lease clearly showed an agreement to lease an entire roof, evidence of statements of the proposed tenant as to what the lease was to cover was inadmissible, because it tended to vary the terms of the written instrument.

4. Landlord and Tenant 🔑22(4) — Contract for Lease—Breach.

Where it was plain that a demand for lease would have been futile, no demand on the part of the proposed tenant was necessary before suing for failure to perform a contract to execute such lease.

5. Landlord and Tenant 🔑22(3) — Contract for Lease—Breach.

Where defendant agreed to execute a lease, plaintiff to furnish satisfactory bondsmen, the duty to furnish the bondsmen did not ripen until the defendant was ready to execute the lease in accordance with its agreement.

6. Landlord and Tenant 🔑22(3) — Contract for Lease—Breach.

Under a contract to execute a lease, where the owner refused to execute such lease, there was such a breach that no further step, such as furnishing agreed securities, was necessary to place him in default.

7. Landlord and Tenant 🔑22(4)—Contract for Lease—Findings—Sufficiency.

A finding that plaintiff was ready, willing, and able to enter into a lease upon the terms of the agreement necessarily included a finding that plaintiff was ready, able, and willing to furnish sureties as provided in the agreement.

8. Landlord and Tenant 🔑22(3) — Contract for Lease—Breach.

Under contract for lease providing that the proposed tenant furnish satisfactory bondsmen, it was sufficient to furnish sureties sufficiently responsible as to be satisfactory to a reasonable person.

9. Landlord and Tenant 🔑22(2) — Contract for Lease—Rescission.

Where the owner of a one-story building contracted to lease part thereof, with entire roof for advertising purposes, a refusal to execute a lease for the entire roof justified a rescission by the proposed tenant.

10. Brokers 🔑63(1)—Obtaining Tenant.

Under a contract to pay a broker a commission upon the execution of a lease satisfactory to the owner, the broker was entitled to commission where he obtained a person with whom the owner entered into a contract to execute a lease, although, due to the sole fault of the owner, the contract was rescinded.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Actions by William C. Osborn against the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company, a corporation, and by J. T. Long, as administrator of the estate of J. O. Long, deceased, and Herman Wobber, against the same defendant. From judgments for plaintiffs and orders refusing new trials, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Mastick & Partridge, of San Francisco, for appellant. Walter H. Linforth and Leo Kaufmann, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. The above-entitled cases are here upon the same transcript and were argued in the same briefs. The case of Long and others against the cement company will be considered first.

The defendant, Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company, agreed to execute a lease to J. O. Long and Herman Wobber of a certain piece of property situated between Sacramento, Market, East, and Commercial streets in the city of San Francisco, and the agreement to execute this lease contained the following provisions, namely:

> The company agreed to lease to Long and Wobber "that certain one story and basement reinforced concrete building to be erected on that certain lot owned by the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company, situated on Sacramento, Market, East, and Commercial streets, with the exception of the space leased to J. Welsh as a saloon, as outlined in yellow on a certain blueprint floor plan revised July 7, 1913, and marked Exhibit A, and attached hereto and made a part hereof."

This agreement contained the following further provision:

> "Lessee to have the exclusive right to the roof for sign space, for which privilege they agree to keep the roof in good order and repair."

These are the vital provisions of this agreement so far as the decision of this case is concerned.

When the time came for the execution of the lease the defendant refused to let to the plaintiffs that portion of the roof of the building over Welsh's saloon. It claimed then, and claims now, that this agreement was to lease only the part of the roof situate over the portion of the building to be let to plaintiffs. The part of the roof over the saloon was by far the most valuable for sign purposes, as it was over the corner of Market and East streets. The court found generally that the defendant refused to execute the lease in accordance with their agreement.

The main point in controversy between the parties at the trial, and during negotiations carried on after the execution of the contract with a view to agreeing upon the terms of the lease, was over the question whether the sign space above the saloon should be included in the lease or not. This finding of the court was tantamount to a finding that the defendant refused in this respect to carry out the terms of its agreement. It claims that it did not so refuse, and that this finding is not supported by the evidence.

[1] The defendant presented two written leases to the plaintiffs in both of which it reserved to itself this roof space over the saloon, and the presentation of the last of these two leases was accompanied by a demand in writing that the plaintiffs enter into the lease as presented. Besides this, from the beginning to the end of these negotiations over the form of the lease the attorney acting for the defendant, who carried on all these negotiations, insisted that the plaintiffs could not have this space above the saloon. He so insisted in polite language, but nevertheless with emphasis and finality. The finding is therefore supported by the evidence.

[2] The truth is plain that the defendant was of the opinion that the agreement it had made did not include this space on the roof over the saloon, and it acted upon this opinion. This view is still adhered to, but is a mistaken one. Nothing could be clearer than this agreement. It provided for the exclusive possession of the roof of the entire building for advertising purposes, and the exclusive care of the roof by the plaintiffs in consideration therefor.

[3] The language of the agreement being clear and unambiguous, the questions asked by defendant of Welsh as to conversations with plaintiffs with reference to the portion of the roof over his saloon, and whether he had told them that his lease included sign privileges over the saloon, offered by defendant for the purpose of assisting the court in interpreting the agreement, were incompetent and properly disallowed, in that the evidence thus sought to be introduced tended to vary the terms of a written instrument the language of which is clear.

[4] It being plain that a demand for the execution of a lease in accordance with the terms of the defendant's agreement would have been futile, no demand on the part of plaintiffs was necessary; besides, the defendant assumed the burden of drafting and presenting the lease. The plaintiffs constantly requested a lease including the exclusive sign privilege of the roof. The defendant, as the trial court found, refused to accede to this demand, and nothing further was required to put it in default.

[5-8] The agreement provided that the plaintiffs should furnish to the defendant satisfactory bondsmen for a sum equal to one year's rental as security for the lease. It is claimed that these sureties were never offered, but the obligation of the plaintiffs to furnish bondsmen did not ripen until the defendant was ready to execute a lease in accordance with its agreement, and this it was never ready or willing to do. Besides, the defendant having refused to execute such a lease, and thereby broken its contract, no further step was necessary to place it in default. Moreover, the court found that the plaintiffs were ready, willing, and able to enter into the lease upon the terms of the agreement at all times. This included of necessity ability, willingness, and readiness to furnish the securities provided in this agreement. The names of two sureties were presented to the defendant. It never actually rejected these sureties; and while there is a conflict of evidence as to their financial standing, the record is not without evidence that they were worth the sum required of them. The provisions of this contract were fulfilled if sureties sufficiently responsible as to be satisfactory to a reasonable person were offered to the defendant. Gladding, McBean & Co. v. Montgomery, 20 Cal. App. 279, 128 Pac. 790.

It is contended that the evidence does not support the finding as to damages to the plaintiffs. Without reciting the evidence on this, it may be said that there was an abundance of testimony showing a greater amount of damages than the trial court awarded.

[9] Lastly, the defendant claims that the finding of an absolute refusal on its part to include the portion of the roof over Welsh's saloon would not justify a rescission of the whole contract, because the breach of such a condition is readily compensable in damages. There is nothing in this point. The defendant entered into an agreement to lease this real property. This agreement contained an important stipulation which it refused to fulfill. The plaintiffs were not compelled to take such portion of the building as the defendant might be willing to let to them, and sue for damages for refusal to include the remainder of the building in the lease. Besides, we cannot say for what sign purposes the plaintiffs wished to use the roof. It may have been that they desired to use it for the advertising of the business which they were to conduct in the portion of the building which they were to occupy, and as such they might have considered it a vital part of their leasehold.

The judgment and order refusing a new trial in the case under consideration are affirmed.

[10] The case of Osborn against the same defendant rests mainly upon the same facts as that of Long and Wobber. Osborn is the assignee of Newell-Murdoch Company, who as real estate brokers brought Long and Wobber and the defendant together in this transaction. Simultaneously with the execution of the agreement of the defendant to lease the property to Long and Wobber defendant entered into an agreement with Newell-Murdoch Company, by which it agreed to pay these brokers the sum of $3,500 upon the execution of a lease satisfactory to the defendant of the building involved in the agreement with Long and Wobber. Having broken its agreement to enter into a lease in accordance with the terms of its contract, the defendant may not now be heard to say in an action by the real estate brokers for their commission, either that Long and Wobber were not able to perform their contract, or that a satisfactory lease was not executed in the premises, because a satisfactory lease would have been executed had not the defendant refused to carry out its obligation to execute it, and it was because of the fault of the defendant alone that such lease was not entered into. We have already seen that it was not the duty of Long and Wobber to furnish their sureties so long as the defendant was unwilling to carry out its agreement. Phelan v. Gardner, 43 Cal. 311.

The judgment and order are also affirmed in this case.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. The defendant, Maryland Casualty Company, appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiff upon a statutory bond furnished pursuant to section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure by the defendant to the owner of the building that was being erected by Siebert & Co. as contractors and for which the plaintiff, Crane Company, furnished materials.

The sole question in the case is whether or not it was a condition precedent to the recovery by the respondents in this action against appellants upon their bond that the respondent file a claim of lien pursuant to the provisions of the Mechanics' Lien Law. The trial court decided this question in the negative, and in accordance with this answer gave judgment for plaintiff, although plaintiff had filed no such claim. The answer given by the trial court to the question was incorrect, and the judgment must therefore be reversed; and it is so ordered. Hubbard v. Jurian, 170 Pac. 1093.

Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, of San Francisco, for appellant. C. M. Fickert, Dist. Atty., and Aylett R. Cotton, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action for damages for false imprisonment, brought by the plaintiff against D. A. White, chief of the police department of San Francisco, and William Minahan, a detective sergeant in the department. Upon plaintiff resting his case a motion for a nonsuit as to defendant White was granted; and at the conclusion of the testimony of both sides the court of its own motion instructed the jury to return a verdict for defendant Minahan, which the jury did. This is an appeal by plaintiff from the judgment entered on the instructed verdict.

The circumstances of the plaintiff's arrest and imprisonment were as follows: One Samuel Kalish, a person other than plaintiff, had embezzled the sum of $800 belonging to one Mrs. Lydia McCarthy, and shortly thereafter disappeared, whereupon Mrs. McCarthy reported the matter to the police department of San Francisco, with the result that a warrant was issued for the arrest of the offender. About ten months prior to the embezzlement Minahan had known the plaintiff in San Francisco, and the execution of the process was placed in his hands. He made a diligent search for the plaintiff, and learned that he had recently vacated his room, leaving some of his clothes behind, and that prior to leaving it had been his custom to get his mail at the post office. The search in San Francisco proving fruitless, and it having been learned from the complaining witness that the accused had brothers in New York and Chicago, Minahan advised her to write decoy letters addressed to Samuel Kalish at both those cities. This she did, and received a reply from the plaintiff signed "Sam Kalish." Thereupon the case was presented to the grand jury, and an indictment was returned against the plaintiff, charging him with embezzlement; extradition proceedings were inaugurated, and Minahan proceeded to New York, where he found the plaintiff in the custody of the police department, awaiting process for his removal to California. Plaintiff protested his innocence, but Minahan proceeded to execute his process. It is also to be noted that the record discloses that while plaintiff did not precisely answer the description furnished by the complaining witness of the man who had embezzled her money as to age or as to a noticeable scar on one of his hands, still by inference it appears that he measured up to the furnished description as far as build, weight, complexion, and nativity were concerned. Upon arriving in San Francisco Minahan immediately made his return on the warrant, and plaintiff was incarcerated. Still protesting his innocence, he was confronted by the complaining witness who, after two visits to the prison, refused to identify him as the thief. Notwithstanding this the plaintiff was kept in confinement for a period of ten days, when he was arraigned on the indictment, at which time, the complaining witness not appearing, the court received evidence as to the identity of the plaintiff, and ordered his release from custody.

[1] When a warrant, valid in form and issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, is placed in the hands of an officer for execution, it is his duty without delay to carry out its commands; and the law is well settled that for the proper execution of such process the officer incurs no liability however disastrous may be the effect of its execution upon the person against whom it is issued. Newell on Malicious Prosecution, § 70; 11 R. C. L. 795. The authority, however, derived from the warrant justifies the officer in arresting no one but the person named therein against whom it is issued; and any interference, therefore, with the liberty of a person other than the one named in the writ renders the officer liable in trespass, unless such interference is caused by the act of the person himself. Newell on Malicious Prosecution, § 74. Accordingly, it has been held that an officer will not be justified in arresting a person other than the one named in the warrant even if he is the one intended. 11 R. C. L. § 12, p. 799; Newell on Malicious Prosecution, § 73. Likewise, that a warrant is no defense to an officer who arrests and refuses to release the wrong person, although bearing the same name, where an investigation would have disclosed the fact of his innocence. 11 R. C. L. 220; Clark v. Winn, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 223, 46 S. W. 915.

Here, however, it appears that the process, which was regular in form and legally issued, described the plaintiff by his name, which is the usual way (11 R. C. L. § 12, p. 799), and that he was in fact the person for whom it was intended. Under such circumstances, even if Minahan had been in doubt as to whether or not the plaintiff was the person who committed the crime, he was not bound to decide that question; and he was certainly acting within his duty when he took the plaintiff into custody, and thus permitted the question of identity to be ultimately decided. Under the undisputed facts of the case the warrant is a complete defense to this action against the office. Cox v. Durham, 128 Fed. 870, 63 C. C. A. 338; Madden v. Meehan, 153 Ky. 648, 156 S. W. 116.

[2] In view of the innocence of plaintiff his confinement and restraint for ten days are unfortunate, but for this the defendants are not responsible. Minahan discharged his duty as an agent of the state when he delivered him to the city prison in San Francisco. He then, it appears, in his capacity as a police officer, took plaintiff into custody under a bench warrant issued by the superior court, and delivered him to his superior officer, who was in charge of the city prison, and from then on neither of these defendants was responsible for the plaintiff's detention nor for any delay in the proceedings against him.

[3] From the evidence it appears that the prima facie case made out by the plaintiff was overcome by the evidence justifying Officer Minahan's acts respecting the arrest and imprisonment of plaintiff, and that such evidence in justification was not at all, or at least substantially, rebutted. The action of the trial court in instructing the jury to return a verdict in favor of Minahan, therefore, cannot be disturbed. The authorities so hold. "A directed verdict is proper whenever, upon the whole evidence, the judge would be compelled to set a contrary verdict aside as unsupported by the evidence." Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 471, 123 Pac. 267. To the same effect, see Davis v. Cal. St. R. R. Co., 105 Cal. 131, 38 Pac. 647; Perera v. P. P. I. E. Co. (No. 7815), 175 Pac. 454. In Lacey v. Porter, 103 Cal. 597, 37 Pac. 635, the court says:

> "It is further insisted that the court erred in taking from the jury the question of the credibility of witnesses, malice, motives, intention, and belief of respondent, and what facts the evidence established. The general rule undoubtedly is that these questions should be submitted to the jury where the evidence is conflicting; but it is equally well settled that the court may, within certain limits, control the verdict, either by such an instruction as was here given, or by setting it aside and granting a new trial, either upon motion of the defeated party or upon its own motion. To justify the court in directing a verdict it is not necessary that there should be no conflict in the evidence; but where the evidence is such that it is clearly insufficient to support a verdict in favor of the party against whom the direction is given, the instruction is proper, unless the circumstances of the case indicate that upon another trial" a different verdict "may be had. But in either case the decision of the court below will be sustained, unless the appellate court can clearly see that its conclusion is wrong upon the facts."

Assuming that White is a party to this appeal, although not named in the verdict or judgment, as to him it is sufficient to say that, while he has grounds of defense other than those herein discussed, it follows under the circumstances of the case that what we have said concerning his codefendant disposes of the case as to him.

JAMESON v. TULLY. (Sac. 2590.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 4, 1918. Rehearing Denied July 2, 1918.)

1. Witnesses 🔑188(2)—Husband and Wife—Privileged Communications.

By Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, communications between husband and wife are excepted from the class of privileged communications in an action brought by husband or wife against another person for alienation of the affections of the other spouse, or in an action for damages against another person for adultery committed by either the husband or wife.

2. Evidence 🔑271(14), 317(3)—Hearsay—Alienation of Affections.

In a husband's action for alienation of his wife's affections, the relations between husband and wife being a proper subject of inquiry, the declarations of the wife, contained in her letters to the husband during temporary absences, showing the state of her feelings prior to the alienation, were admissible, and were not hearsay and self-serving.

3. Evidence 🔑317(8)—Alienation—Hearsay.

In such action, statements of the wife in her letters, written to her husband after her enticement and seduction, and her oral statements, all constituting confessions of her guilty relations with defendant some months before their date, not having been written or spoken with defendant's consent or in his presence, were inadmissible as hearsay, not being res gestæ.

4. Trial 🔑412—Objection to Evidence—Waiver—Cross-Examination.

Such statements were not rendered admissible because defendant, after the admission in evidence of the husband's testimony as to such matters over his objection, undertook to cross-examine thereon, for waiver of objection to evidence and of right on appeal to complain of error in its admission is only effected by the later introduction by the objecting party of independent evidence to the same point and effect as that to which the evidence objected to related.

5. Appeal and Error 🔑1170(7)—Harmless Error—Evidence.

In a husband's action for alienation, error in admitting the husband's evidence as to his wife's confession of her own and defendant's guilty conduct was not ground for reversal of judgment for the husband, the error being disregarded under Const. art. 6, § 4½, where, in the face of defendant's admissions, and the fact that neither he nor the wife took the stand to make any denial of them, no other conclusion could have been reached by a fair-minded jury.

6. Depositions 🔑90—Deponent Within Jurisdiction—Statute.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2021, subd. 6, as to when depositions may be taken in the state, where plaintiff's wife was present in the town during trial up to within an hour of the time when the offer of her deposition was made, but no subpœna was issued or other effort made to secure her presence as a witness, though she had been in consultation with defendant's counsel just before the court convened and had then taken a train, leaving town with their consent and with no effort to detain her, the court properly refused to allow defendant to read her deposition in evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Charles M. Jameson against Ernest R. Tully. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wise & O'Connor, of San Francisco, for appellant. Peck, Bunker & Cole, of Oakland, and Frank R. Wehe, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $10,000 damages in an action charging the defendant with enticing away and seducing the plaintiff's wife. The complaint is in two counts, one for the enticement and alienation of the plaintiff's wife, and the other for her seduction. There is no merit in the appellant's contention that the complaint on each of these counts did not state a cause of action.

[1] The main points upon this appeal arise out of alleged errors of the trial court in the admission of evidence and in the giving of certain instructions to the jury. During the course of the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence certain letters written to him by his wife during her temporary absences from their home. The purpose for which most of these letters were offered was that of showing the affectionate relations between the plaintiff and his wife prior to the exercise of the alleged arts of enticement on the part of the defendant which alienated the wife's affections from her husband. The objection was that they were privileged communications, and as such inadmissible in the absence of consent on the part of the wife. The case of Humphrey v. Pope, 1 Cal. App. 374, 82 Pac. 223, was cited by the appellant in support of this contention. That case, however, arose and was decided prior to the amendment of section 1881, Code of Civil Procedure, effected in the year 1911, by which communications between husband and wife were excepted from the class of privileged communications "in an action brought by husband or wife against another person for the alienation of the affections of either husband or wife or in an action for damages against another person for adultery committed by either husband or wife." That case is therefore no longer authority for this contention.

[2] The appellant further insists, however, that the statement contained in these letters from the wife to the plaintiff, her husband, were inadmissible as hearsay and as self-serving declarations. This contention is answered by the case of Cripe v. Cripe, 170 Cal. 91, 148 Pac. 520, in which this court, citing numerous cases, declares the rule to be that when in an action for alienation the relations between the husband and wife are a proper subject of inquiry, the declarations of the person whose affections have been alienated showing the state of her feeling prior to such alienation, are admissible. This rule applies to the letters written by the wife to the plaintiff during the year when they were living happily together before the enticements of the defendant began and the objection to some of these letters on the ground of their remoteness goes merely to the weight and not to the competency of these letters.

[3] A more serious objection, however, is made to the action of the court in admitting in evidence several letters written by the wife to the plaintiff after her enticement and seduction, and after the suspicions of her husband had been aroused as to her relations with the defendant. These letters could not have had for their purpose that of showing that the former feelings of affections between husband and wife continued notwithstanding the defendant's acts, injuries, and damages of which the plaintiff complains. Had these letters been couched in terms showing an altered state of affection on the part of the wife for her husband, they would doubtless be admissible under the former rule, but an examination of these latter letters will serve to clearly show that, notwithstanding the statement of counsel for plaintiff at the time of their offer, to the effect that they were offered for the purpose of showing the feelings between husband and wife at the time they were written, the real scope and purpose of the offer of these letters was to introduce in evidence the confessions of her guilty relations with the defendant some months before their date. They are thus to be considered in the same category with certain oral statements made by the wife to her husband about the same time that these letters were written in which she confessed in detail as to her illicit relations with the defendant. The plaintiff undertook as a witness to testify to these oral statements on the part of his wife made several months after the consummation of the arts of enticement and acts of seduction and adultery of which the plaintiff complains, and they were admitted by the trial court in evidence over the defendant's objection. There is little room for argument that the trial court was not in error in the admission of these latter letters and oral statements and confessions of the wife. They cannot be held to be res gestæ under the utmost extension of tnat limited rule of evidence. They are hearsay pure and simple, and, having been written or spoken without the defendant's consent or presence, could upon no theory of the law or the case be binding upon him or admissible in evidence against him.

[4] The respondent does not, in fact, attempt to justify the admission in evidence of these written and oral statements of the wife, implicating the defendant in her transgression, except upon the utterly untenable ground that the defendant, having, after the admission in evidence of the plaintiff's testimony as to these matters over his objection, undertaken to cross-examine the plaintiff thereon, in so doing waived his objection to their admissibility and his right on appeal to complain of the court's error in their admission. The authorities cited by counsel for the respondent in support of this contention do not sustain it. The cases cited all refer to the later introduction by the objecting party of independent evidence to the same point and effect as that to which the evidence objected to related. By the presentation on his own part of such independent proofs the objecting party, of course, waives his objection and point upon appeal; not so, however, when the objecting party undertakes to exercise his right to cross-examine a witness as to statements to which he has erroneously been permitted to testify. Were it otherwise, one of the main functions of cross-examination would be most seriously impaired; for a party, after rightfully objecting to the admission of evidence, may, by his cross-examination, lay the foundation for an obviously proper motion to strike it out, or may compel its contradiction or withdrawal, or may utterly destroy its effect, and thus render unnecessary his remedy by appeal from the court's erroneous action.

[5] In the instant case the defendant did not waive his objection to the evidence thus offered and admitted on the plaintiff's behalf. That such evidence would ordinarily be prejudicial does not admit of dispute, but the question whether the judgment should be reversed upon that ground should be determined by certain other considerations in the case. Aside from the confessions of his wife, the plaintiff's case in support of the averments of his complaint rested upon inferences to be drawn from proof of certain acts, and conduct of the defendant, showing a guilty relation with the plaintiff's wife. This proof was mainly drawn from the deposition of the defendant himself, which was taken by the plaintiff and was offered as a part of his case. It appeared therefrom that, following a period of increase in social intimacy between the families of plaintiff and defendant, the latter and the plaintiff's wife, in the month of August, 1915, had met clandestinely in the town of Newman, about 20 miles from the then home of both of them, and spent several hours together in a room at a hotel there; that early in the following month the pair met in San Francisco upon at least two occasions, and, after going to various places together, went to a hotel, late at night, and there registered as husband and wife under an assumed name, and were assigned to and occupied the same bedroom, part of two days and all of two nights, upon each occasion. Coupled with these admissions were the defendant's evasive answers while under examination as to the details of these episodes, which rendered his denial of any acts of adultery with the plaintiff's wife inconclusive if not inconceivable. In the face of these admissions, and of the fact that neither the defendant, nor the plaintiff's wife, took the witness stand to make any denial of them, no other conclusion could be reached by a fair-minded jury than that arrived at in this case. This being so, the error of the court in admitting the plaintiff's statement of his wife's confession or her own and the defendant's guilty conduct cannot be said to have affected the verdict. It must therefore be disregarded under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

[6] The final contention of the appellant is that the trial court erred in its refusal to permit the deposition of the plaintiff's wife to be offered and read in evidence on behalf of the defendant. The record discloses that the offer of the deposition was made at the close of a several days' trial, during which the plaintiff's wife was present in Merced, where the trial was being held, up to within an hour of the time when the offer of her deposition was made; that no subpœna was issued, or other effort made to secure her presence as a witness; that she had been in consultation with defendant's counsel just before court convened; that she had then taken a train, leaving town with their consent and with no effort to detain her. These facts being shown, the court properly refused to allow her deposition to be read in evidence. Code Civ. Proc. § 2021, subd. 6.

No other points in the record require discussion.

(Supreme Court of California. June 3, 1918.)

1. DIVORCE 🔑167—DECREE—SETTING ASIDE—COLLUSION OR CONNIVANCE.

Where a wife has consented to an interlocutory divorce decree by her husband on the represented grounds of desertion of which the wife was not in fact guilty, equity will not thereafter set aside such decree and enjoin the entry of a final decree.

2. DIVORCE 🔑167—SUITS TO SET ASIDE DECREE—GROUNDS—STATUTES.

Where a party who has consented to the entry of a collusive interlocutory divorce decree fails to apply for relief within six months and within the time for appeal, Code Civ. Proc. § 473, empowering the court to relieve against judgments or orders, does not apply, and to set aside such decree in another suit thereafter an independent showing of some equitable consideration or reason of public policy is necessary to justify the interference of equity.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Suit by Ethel W. Bancroft against Griffing Bancroft to set aside an interlocutory divorce decree. From a judgment dismissing the action on demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 173 Pac. 582, 585.

Luce & Luce, of San Diego, and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Sweet, Stearns & Forward and Ward, Ward & Ward, all of San Diego, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal of this action after an order sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint. The action was brought by the plaintiff to have set aside an interlocutory decree in the case of Griffing Bancroft v. Ethel Bancroft, L. A. No. 5419, 173 Pac. 582, upon the ground that such decree was procured by collusion between the parties to that action, who are also the parties to this one. The facts out of which this action arose as set forth in the complaint herein are as follows: The parties were married on or about October 30, 1901. Three children were born of this marriage, a daughter named Barbara, now of the age of 14 years, and two sons, Griffing, Jr., and Hubert Howe, whose ages are now respectively 11 and 8 years. On October 30, 1914, the plaintiff left the home of the defendant and herself in or near San Diego with the defendant's knowledge and consent for the purpose of paying a visit to her parents in Washington, D. C., intending and expecting to return to her said home in about 2 months, and without any intention of deserting the defendant. That in the month of January, 1915, the plaintiff received a letter from the defendant informing her that the defendant had decided that they could no longer live together as husband and wife, and directing her not to return to their home, and agreeing and promising that he would pay her the sum of $125 as a monthly allowance, and permit her to have the custody and care of their daughter Barbara, and to see and visit their two sons upon some satisfactory arrangement. That the plaintiff upon receipt of this letter did not return to the home of herself and defendant on account of such direction and arrangement, but went to reside in the city of New York. During the month of May, 1916, the defendant wrote to plaintiff informing her that he desired and intended to secure a divorce from her, and desired and requested her to consent to such divorce action, and to refrain from contesting his application for a decree therein. That the plaintiff thereupon agreed with the defendant not to institute a contest, nor offer any objection to his proceeding for a divorce, nor to file any answer or offer any testimony therein, provided the defendant would make provision in the decree therein regarding the custody of their children. That thereafter the defendant arranged with an attorney to represent this plaintiff in said action, and caused this plaintiff to instruct said attorney to enter her appearance therein as her attorney of record, but to offer no objection to the entry of a decree therein dissolving the bonds of matrimony between the parties thereto. That thereafter and on June 5, 1916, the defendant herein commenced such action for divorce in the county of San Diego against this plaintiff, alleging willful desertion as the ground of divorce. That in accordance with their aforesaid understanding this plaintiff's attorney so provided entered her appearance therein, but offered no objection to the proceedings therein, but facilitated the same in every way possible to the end that the defendant herein should secure an interlocutory decree in his favor in said action. That when said cause came on for trial the defendant herein as plaintiff therein testified falsely that this plaintiff had willfully deserted him, and that such desertion had continued for more than a year prior to the inception of said action. That no objection was made by or on behalf of this plaintiff to such testimony, or to any of the proceedings in said action, or to the granting of the interlocutory decree therein, and such interlocutory decree was accordingly granted and duly entered on June 22, 1916, notwithstanding the fact that the plaintiff herein had a good and valid defense to said action which she did not present on account of the prior agreement and understanding between herself and the plaintiff therein. That thereafter and in the month of May, 1917, the defendant herein informed the plaintiff herein that he would not permit her to see or visit their two sons, and did thereafter so refuse to permit this plaintiff to see or visit her two children, and also failed and refused and still refuses to longer pay this plaintiff her agreed allowance of $125 a month. That this plaintiff thereupon came to San Diego and took steps to procure counsel and to assert her rights in the premises, and was informed by her said attorneys that said divorce decree was invalid, and was also advised that the defendant herein was about to apply for a final decree in said action, whereupon she instituted this action, setting forth the foregoing facts, and praying that said interlocutory decree be set aside, and that the defendant herein be enjoined from procuring a final decree. The defendant demurred to this complaint upon several grounds, but chiefly that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend, and entered judgment accordingly, dismissing the action, and from such order and judgment the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The appellant herein contends that the trial court, sitting as a court of equity, had power, and that it was its duty to entertain this action and to set aside the interlocutory decree of divorce given and made in the defendant's favor in said action wherein he was plaintiff, upon the facts recited in her complaint herein, showing that said interlocutory decree had been obtained by a collusive agreement between herself and the defendant herein, by which a fraud had been practiced upon the court.

[1] We are unable to give our support to this contention upon the facts set forth in the appellant's complaint. It is practically conceded by the appellant herein that as a general rule courts of equity will not interfere to relieve a party to an action from a judgment which has been procured through a collusive agreement between the parties to the action to the effect that either of said parties shall commence the action and obtain by the connivance or consent of the other a judgment to which he would not otherwise be entitled. This rule has been uniformly adhered to in this state. Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 Pac. 970, 27 Pac. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159; Fealey v. Fealey, 104 Cal. 354, 38 Pac. 49, 43 Am. St. Rep. 111; Sohler v. Sohler, 135 Cal. 323, 67 Pac. 282, 87 Am. St. Rep. 98; Hanley v. Hanley, 114 Cal. 690, 46 Pac. 736; Civil Code, §§ 3515, 3517, 3524. The appellant, however, contends that however correct in principle and policy this rule may be in its general application, an exception should be made in its application to divorce cases, for the reason that in this class of cases it is to the public interest not only that the courts should not be imposed upon in the commencement and prosecution of divorce cases, but also that the marriage relation should be maintained and not be permitted to be sundered for light or trivial causes, or through the collusion or consent of the parties to it. While the cases cited by counsel for the appellant make application of the foregoing rule to the facts of such cases, they are not to be understood as insisting upon its universal application to every action brought to have a decree of divorce set aside upon the ground of collusion between the parties thereto, but that being an exception to the otherwise general rule above stated, it is to be confined in its application to those cases where, in the action itself, the court has full control over its own orders and decrees. The cases of Mulkey v. Mulkey, 100 Cal. 91, 34 Pac. 621, and Rehfuss v. Rehfuss, 169 Cal. 86, 145 Pac. 1020, may be referred to as illustrating the class of cases to which application of the exception to the general rule may be given. In each of these cases the application for relief was made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In the former of these cases the record discloses that in entering into the collusive agreement for the divorce the party seeking to avoid it had been grossly deceived and misled by her husband and by means thereof had been induced to enter into the collusive agreement. In the case of Rehfuss v. Rehfuss, supra, the party seeking to set aside the interlocutory decree also made her motion under said section of the Code of Civil Procedure, basing the same upon a showing that her consent to the granting of the decree had been induced by fear occasioned by the threat of her husband that if she defended the action her infant child would be taken from her and placed in a public institution.

[2] There is a distinction to be drawn, however, between cases where the application for relief from a decree collusively obtained is made in the action itself and within the time prescribed by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure or before the period passes within which the interlocutory decree may be assailed upon appeal and cases where relief is sought in an independent action. For the period of six months the trial court has full control over the case, and may grant relief within the action itself to either party; but after the expiration of that period the rights of the parties have become fixed beyond the power of the court to grant relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and also beyond remedy by appeal; and the party who has allowed this period to expire without any effort to obtain relief within the action itself and who thereafter seeks the aid of another tribunal in an independent action should be required to make an affirmative showing of some equitable consideration, or of some good reason sounding in public policy sufficient to justify the interference of equity with the crystallized status of the parties in the particular case. On the other hand, the authorities are numerous to the effect that in the absence of such equitable considerations or of any showing that the public interest or policy in preserving the marriage relation in the particular case would be subserved, the general rule will prevail in divorce as in other cases, and courts of equity will not interfere with judgments in such cases obtained solely through the collusive connivance of the parties to the proceeding. The following authorities fully sustain this view: Hubbard v. Hubbard, 19 Colo. 13, 34 Pac. 170; Robinson v. Robinson, 77 Wash. 663, 138 Pac. 288, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 534; Whittley v. Whittley, 60 Misc. Rep. 201, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1078; Newman v. Newman, 27 Okl. 381, 112 Pac. 1007; Karren v. Karren, 25 Utah, 87, 69 Pac. 465, 60 L. R. A. 294, 95 Am. St. Rep. 815; Smith v. Smith, 48 Mo. App. 612; Nichols v. Nichols, 25 N. J. Eq. 60; Simons v. Simons, 47 Mich. 253, 645, 10 N. W. 360. We are satisfied that the rule of noninterference adopted in the foregoing cases should be applied to the case at bar. A review of the facts and circumstances of the case in detail justifying this conclusion would subserve no useful purpose.

MELVIN, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment and in everything written by Mr. Justice RICHARDS in the opinion, and I do so the more readily because I have never believed in the soundness of the doctrine announced in such cases as Deyoe v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 476, 74 Pac. 28, 98 Am. St. Rep. 73, and Grannis v. Superior Court, 146 Cal. 245, 79 Pac. 891, 106 Am. St. Rep. 23, that the state is a party interested in every divorce case. I do not believe that in any logical sense the state should be considered a party to a divorce proceeding any more than it is a party to any other suit to terminate a status fixed by contract. Heretofore the doctrine of the state's being a party interested in such an action has been useful only to save the procedure prescribed by statutes which would be otherwise vulnerable to the charge of unconstitutionality. Perhaps the end justified the fiction; but if it were more than a fiction of very limited applicability, the supposed standing of the state as a party in interest in every action for divorce might be invoked, with reason, it seems to me, as giving to a court of equity jurisdiction of an action to set aside an interlocutory decree obtained by collusion of husband and wife.

SHAW, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment, on the ground that, while it is to the interest of the state that divorces shall not be obtained by collusion between the parties, that interest does not extend so far as to prevent the operation of the doctrine that equity will not relieve a party from an improper judgment rendered upon his own invitation, upon full knowledge of the facts and without coercion, imposition, or fraud upon him. I am not ready to approve the opinions in Mulkey v. Mulkey, 100 Cal. 91, 34 Pac. 621, and Rehfuss v. Rehfuss, 169 Cal. 86, 145 Pac. 1020, in so far as they appear to intimate that the superior court, in a proceeding ostensibly under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, may set aside a judgment of divorce, in the absence of any showing of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect on the part of the party applying for relief. The intimations to that effect were not necessary to the decision of either case. Section 473 does not give such power. I see no sound reasons for holding that the court has any greater power to set aside a judgment for fraud or mistake within the period of six months after it is rendered than it would have at any time within the statutory period of limitation for such actions.

In view of the concurring opinion of Justice MELVIN, I wish to add that I do not understand that this court, either in Deyoe v. Superior Court, or Grannis v. Superior Court, has announced the doctrine that the state is a party interested in every divorce case. The cases, as I understand them, merely say that the state is interested in the matter of granting of divorces, not that it is a party to the action in any ordinary sense of the word.

DIVORCE 🔑164, 165(1)—VACATION OF DECREE —TIME.

An interlocutory decree of divorce is only subject to attack in the proceeding in which it is entered on appeal, or by proceedings under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, empowering the court to grant relief against judgments or orders made through surprise or excusable neglect within six months after the entry of the decree, after which time the trial court is without jurisdiction to alter or set the decree aside, regardless of whether a final decree has been entered.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Suit for divorce by Griffing Bancroft against Ethel W. Bancroft. From an order dismissing defendant's application for an order setting aside an interlocutory divorce decree after an order sustaining without leave to amend plaintiff's demurrer, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 173 Pac. 579, 582, 585.

Luce & Luce, of San Diego, and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Ward, Ward & Ward and Sweet, Stearns & Forward, all of San Diego, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from an order dismissing the defendant's application for an order setting aside the interlocutory decree herein after an order sustaining, without leave to amend, the plaintiff's demurrer to said application. The facts of the entire case embracing the particular grounds upon which said application was made and upon which it was demurred to and dismissed are set forth in the decision of the case of Bancroft v. Bancroft (L. A. No. 5451) 173 Pac. 579, this day decided by this court. The main contention of the appellant upon this appeal is that the trial court has power, upon the motion of either party, to set aside the interlocutory decree in a divorce case at any time prior to the entry of the final decree. This contention cannot be sustained. It is well settled that an interlocutory decree of divorce is only subject to attack in the proceeding in which it is entered upon appeal, or by proceedings under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, within six months after the entry of such decree, and that after the expiration of the period within which either of these forms of attack may be made, the trial court is without jurisdiction to alter or set aside its interlocutory decree. Claudius v. Melvin, 146 Cal. 257, 79 Pac. 897; Suttman v. Superior Court, 162 Pac. 1032; Newell v. Superior Court, 27 Cal. App. 343, 149 Pac. 998; Reed v. Reed, 9 Cal. App. 748, 100 Pac. 897.

It follows that the appellant's contention cannot be upheld, and hence that the order must be and is hereby affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; SLOSS, J.; WILBUR, J.; SHAW, J.

MELVIN, J. (concurring). I concur because the law is and has long been settled just as Mr. Justice RICHARDS indicates. I do not wish to be understood, however, as approving Claudius v. Melvin, cited in the main opinion, except that part of the decision in which this court held that as judge of the superior court I properly decided that a final decree might not be entered until one year after the entry of an interlocutory decree. I have never felt satisfied with this court's ruling that a decree final in form and intended to be a final decree was in reality an interlocutory judgment.

1. DIVORCE 🔑303(2)—CUSTODY OF CHILDREN —MODIFICATION OF DECREE.

Where a divorce has been obtained by a husband in collusion with his wife who did not testify, and the children were awarded to the father, it was no abuse of discretion for the trial court to modify the decree as to the custody of the children, where it appeared that one of them had been in the mother's actual custody since the original decree, and that the husband had but recently denied the wife the privilege of seeing the others in violation of an agreement prior to the decree, and that two of the children had been in charge of others than the husband, who was about to marry again; there being no contradictory evidence offered by the husband.

2. DIVORCE 🔑289, 312 — CUSTODY OF CHILDREN—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The trial court in divorce proceedings has jurisdiction to determine to which of the spouses the custody of the children shall be assigned, and it retains such jurisdiction during the pendency of the case; their welfare being of paramount interest, and the discretion of the court not being subject to interference, except for manifest abuse.

3. DIVORCE 🔑309—CUSTODY OF CHILDREN—ALLOWANCES.

The making and modification of orders for the payment of money in divorce proceedings for the support and education of children committed to the care of one of the spouses, being a mere incident to the order of their custody, it was not an abuse of discretion for the court to allow a wife $200 a month for maintenance of her children, and to allow $100 for the expense of bringing one of them from New York to Los Angeles.

4. DIVORCE 🔑303(3) — MODIFICATION OF DECREE—COUNSEL FEES.

Upon motions to modify decrees in divorce cases, counsel fees may be allowed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Suit by Griffing Bancroft against Ethel Bancroft for divorce. From an order of the superior court modifying an interlocutory decree and from the final decree, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 173 Pac. 579, 582, 585.

Ward, Ward & Ward and Sweet, Stearns & Forward, all of San Diego, for appellant. Luce & Luce, of San Diego, and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court modifying an interlocutory decree of divorce, and also from such portions of the final decree as embody the modifications of the interlocutory decree embraced in the said order appealed from. The facts of this case essential to the determination of this and also of the several other pending appeals of the parties hereto may be briefly summarized as follows: The parties hereto were married in the year 1901. Three children were born to them—Barbara, a daughter, now of the age of 14 years, and Griffing and Hubert Howe, sons, now, respectively, 11 and 8 years old. Prior to the year 1914 discords had arisen between the parties hereto, due in a large measure to conduct of the defendant which would have constituted cause for a divorce upon other grounds than desertion. In the year 1914 the wife went East on a visit to relatives there, with her husband's concurrence and consent, and with no intent of desertion on her part. A short time thereafter plaintiff wrote a letter to her to the effect that they could no longer live together as man and wife, and informed her that he would pay her the sum of $125 monthly for her support and permit her to have the custody and care of the daughter Barbara, with permission to see and visit their two sons. The defendant acquiesced in this condition. A few months later plaintiff informed the defendant that he desired and intended to secure a divorce from her on the ground of desertion, and that he also desired and requested her consent to such divorce and her agreement to refrain from contesting the same. This the defendant agreed to, and the plaintiff thereupon commenced this action, and in the course thereof, and with the defendant's consent, procured an attorney to represent and appear for her in the action, but not to make any contest or opposition thereto. In pursuance of this arrangement, the defendant appeared by such attorney, but filed no answer or other objection to the granting of the divorce; and the plaintiff upon the hearing testified to the defendant's willful desertion. An interlocutory decree upon such evidence was entered on the 22d of June, 1916. By such decree it was provided that the plaintiff should have the care and custody of the three children of the parties to the action. Matters remained in this condition until the month of May, 1917, the defendant in the meantime having the actual custody of the daughter Barbara, and the plaintiff retaining the custody of the two boys, and sending to the defendant in the East, where up to this time she remained, a monthly allowance of $125. At this time, however, according to the defendant's story, the plaintiff informed her that he would not permit her to see or visit their two sons, and he also ceased to pay her said allowance. Whereupon the defendant came to California and consulted counsel as to her rights in the premises, with the result that on June 4, 1917, she filed herein an application to have the interlocutory decree amended so as to give her the custody of the children, with an allowance for their support, and the final decree stayed until such amendment could be made. To this application the plaintiff presented a demurrer upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to grant such application, and that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and also filed an answer thereto denying all of the material averments thereof. Thereafter and on July 27, 1917, the defendant filed an application to have the interlocutory decree set aside on the ground that it was procured by collusion. To this application the plaintiff also demurred, upon the ground of lack of jurisdiction in the court to entertain or act upon the same, and on the further ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court, on August 7, 1917, sustained this demurrer without leave to amend, and from its order made in that behalf the defendant has taken an appeal. On August 27, 1917, the trial court proceeded to hear evidence upon the defendant's first application for a modification of the interlocutory decree as to the custody and support of the children, and on August 29, 1917, made its order modifying the interlocutory decree so as to award the custody of the children to the defendant until they should reach the age of majority, or until further order of the court, with leave to the plaintiff to visit them and for their temporary custody at certain intervals; and further amended said interlocutory decree by requiring plaintiff to pay to the defendant $200 monthly for the support, education, custody, care, and maintenance of said children, $100 for the cost of bringing Barbara from New York to Los Angeles, $200 counsel fee for the prosecution of the motion and her costs incurred therein. On the same day the court made and entered its final decree granting the plaintiff a divorce, but embodying in said final decree the modifications made on that day in the interlocutory decree. Thereupon the plaintiff took this appeal from the order modifying the interlocutory decree and from that portion of the final decree embodying such modifications. The defendant also took an appeal from that portion of the final decree granting plaintiff a divorce. In the meantime, and on June 21, 1917, the defendant herein had commenced action against the plaintiff herein to have set aside the interlocutory decree in this action, upon the ground of collusion, setting up in her complaint substantially the same facts as those averred in her application to have said decree set aside. The plaintiff herein and defendant in said last-named action demurred to said complaint upon the same grounds as those urged against said former application. The court sustained said demurrer without leave to amend and dismissed said action, and from its order and judgment so made the plaintiff in that action has taken an appeal. These four several appeals are now before this court for determination, but the only one herein to be considered is the appeal of the plaintiff from the order modifying the interlocutory decree as to the custody and support of the children and from the portions of the final decree which embody such modification, and also from so much of said order and decree as purports to allow to the defendant counsel fees and costs.

[1, 2] The first contention of the appellant herein is that it was an abuse of legal discretion on the part of the trial court to modify its interlocutory decree so as to transfer the custody of the children from the father, to whom they had been awarded by said decree, to the mother, in the absence of any showing of new facts and circumstances arising since the making of said decree and justifying the change in the children's custody. It is unnecessary to consider whether or not the authorities cited by counsel for the appellant correctly state the law in this respect, for the reason that an inspection of the record satisfies us that there was not only presented to the trial court upon the motion for modification of the decree a different state of facts than those considered by it in making the original decree, but that there was also presented it a different status of the parties arising since the entry of such decree sufficient to justify the exercise of its discretion in modifying its terms. Upon the original trial of the cause the defendant did not appear in person, and the decree was made upon the formal hearing following her prearranged default. No evidence was taken upon the question as to which of the parties was the most suitable person to be given the custody of the children, but they were awarded to the father upon his request for such an order. Upon the hearing of the motion to modify this award the defendant herself appeared and testified fully as to her qualifications to be their custodian, and was supported in such testimony by a number of other witnesses. From this evidence it appeared that the daughter Barbara had been in the actual custody of the defendant ever since the making of the original decree; that the plaintiff had but recently denied her the privilege of seeing the two boys, in violation of his agreement in that regard made prior to the making of said decree; that the two boys had been much of the intervening time in charge of others than the plaintiff; that the plaintiff was about to marry again. Upon the hearing upon the motion to modify the decree the plaintiff did not take the witness stand to refute the testimony given by the defendant or the other witnesses in her behalf. Under such conditions there was clearly no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge in assuming to modify the former decree in respect to the custody of the children. It is conceded that in respect to the children of a marriage which is being dissolved at the suit of either or both of the parties to it the court becomes invested with jurisdiction to determine to which of the spouses the custody of the children shall be assigned, and that it retains such jurisdiction during the pendency of the case before it, and that the welfare of the children is the paramount interest before the court in determining who shall be their custodian, and that in the exercise of this jurisdiction the trial court is invested with a very large measure of power, which will not be interfered with upon appeal except in the clearest instance of its manifest abuse. No such case is presented by the record before us.

The appellant's next contention is that the evidence presented before the court was insufficient to justify the making of its order modifying the interlocutory decree in respect to the custody of the children. It would serve no useful purpose to enter into a detailed review or discussion of the evidence upon which the modifying order of the trial court was predicated. We deem it sufficient to say that after a careful consideration of the entire record we are satisfied that there was a sufficient showing made on behalf of the defendant to justify the court in making the order appealed from, and to repeat that, in the absence of any showing of an abuse of its discretion in the premises, such order will not be interfered with upon appeal.

[3] The appellant's next contention is that the trial court was in error in modifying the interlocutory decree so as to allow the defendant the sum of $200 a month for the support, education, and maintenance of the children awarded to her custody. The making and modifying of orders for the payment of money for the support, education, and maintenance of children committed to the care of one of the spouses is a mere incident to the order for their custody, and may, of course, be made to suit the changed conditions created by such order. This the appellant does not dispute, but he contends that the sum awarded was in part given for the support of the defendant herself, and to that extent was alimony given to the offending and defaulting spouse, which, appellant insists, it was beyond the power of the court to award. The record does not bear out this contention. The order itself confines the expenditure of the sum awarded to the care, support, education, and maintenance of the children themselves. The evidence does not show that the sum awarded was disproportionate to that required for these purposes, nor to the plaintiff's means or station in life. This court will not assume upon this appeal that the court intended its award to be applied to any other purposes than those specified in its order, or that it will be so applied. The discretion of the court in this respect was not abused, nor was its action error.

[4] The final contention of the appellant is that the order of the court was erroneous in its allowance of the sum of $100 for the expense of bringing the daughter Barbara from New York to Los Angeles, and the further allowance of the sum of $200 as counsel fees to the defendant upon her motion for the modification of the interlocutory decree. As to the first of these allowances it was merely an additional award on account of the care and maintenance of this one of the children, and was within the discretion of the court. As to the allowance of counsel fees upon motions to modify decrees in divorce cases, such orders have heretofore been upheld by this court. Grannis v. Superior Court, 143 Cal. 630, 77 Pac. 647; Bohnert v. Bohnert, 91 Cal. 431, 27 Pac. 732; Bruce v. Bruce, 160 Cal. 28, 116 Pac. 66. The order in the instant case is not assailed as disproportionate to the plaintiff's financial ability to respond to it.

No error appearing in the record, the order is affirmed.

DIVORCE 🔑184(1)—REVIEW—GROUNDS FOR REVERSAL.

Where a final decree in divorce has been entered, such decree will not be reversed for matters occurring prior to the inception of the action, which were subject to review on appeal from the interlocutory decree, had such appeal been taken.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Suit by Griffing Bancroft against Ethel W. Bancroft for divorce. From a final decree, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 173 Pac. 579, 582.

Luce & Luce, of San Diego, and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Ward, Ward & Ward and Sweet, Stearns & Forward, all of San Diego, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from that portion of a final judgment decreeing a divorce between the parties to this action. The facts of the case are fully set forth in the case of Bancroft v. Bancroft (L. A. No. 5419) 173 Pac. 582, this day decided by this court. The matters upon which the appellant predicates her right to a reversal herein occurred prior to the inception of the action, and were therefore the subject of review upon an appeal from the interlocutory decree had such appeal been taken, and hence cannot be made the subject of review upon an appeal from the final decree. Code Civ. Proc. § 956; Claudius v. Melvin, 146 Cal. 257, 79 Pac. 897; Suttman v. Sup. Ct., 174 Cal. 243, 162 Pac. 1032; Newell v. Sup. Ct., 27 Cal. App. 343, 149 Pac. 998; Reed v. Reed, 9 Cal. App. 748, 100 Pac. 897. In addition to this, however, the points discussed upon this appeal have been decided adversely to the appellant's contention in the case of Bancroft v. Bancroft, L. A. No. 5451, 173 Pac. 579, also this day decided by this court, and upon the conclusions arrived at in that decision the portion of the judgment herein appealed from is affirmed.

MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑367—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION—"EMPLOYÉ."

One employed to cut with his own tools such timber as in his judgment was best suited to his purpose in converting it into units for which he was to be paid and over which the employer exercised no control was an "independent contractor," and not an "employé."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé.]

In Bank. Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by William Huddle to obtain compensation for personal injuries, opposed by W. B. Parsons, employer, and the Employer's Liability Assurance Corporation, Limited, of London, England. Compensation was awarded, and employer and insurer applied for a writ of review, and certiorari was issued. Award annulled.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. Certiorari to review an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission. The admitted facts disclose that petitioner, W. B. Parsons, as owner of certain wooded land, made a contract with William Huddle, the sole and only provisions of which were that the latter was to cut firewood from said land for which Parsons agreed to pay him for each cord of three 14-inch tiers the sum of $4.50. Parsons exercised no control over Huddle, who, with his own tools and as a free agent working when and as he pleased, cut such timber as in his judgment was best suited to his purpose in converting it into units for each of which he was to be paid. The sole question for determination is whether upon this statement of facts, as to which there is no dispute, the status of Huddle was that of an independent contractor or an employé of Parsons as found by the commission.

We are unable to distinguish the facts in the case from those presented in that of Donlon Bros. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 173 Cal. 250, 159 Pac. 715, the decision in which was approved in Fidelity & Trust Co. v. Brush, 168 Pac. 890, in both of which it was held that the status of the injured party under a like contract for cutting cordwood was that of an independent contractor. In the Donlon Case the contract to cut wood at $4.50 per cord was let to Katioaka, whose subcontractor's subcontractor was injured, and the award made to him was set aside upon the ground that the relation of Katioaka to Donlon was that of an independent contractor, who, by reason of such status, could not recover for injuries, and since the relationship extended to the subcontractor injured, he likewise was not entitled to compensation for the injury sustained. While Katioaka, whose status as to Donlon was precisely the same as that of Huddle to Parsons, was not an applicant for an award for injuries received, nevertheless, it appears from the opinion that the decision was based upon principles which if applicable are determinative of the case at bar. In the Brush Case, as in this, respondent sought to distinguish it from the Donlon Case, but the court upon facts substantially the same as those here involved held, as in the Donlon Case, that one who agrees with the owner of land to cut wood thereon at a stipulated price per cord without any agreement as to the hours of work nor the methods to be pursued in performing the work is an independent contractor. There is nothing said by respondent justifying a departure from the principles enunciated in these cases. We are unable to perceive any distinction between the status of one who upon an agreement for a stipulated price per unit and out of raw materials furnished by the owner builds one or more houses of a specified character and that of one who for a specified price per cord converts standing timber into one or more cords of wood. The contract in each case without regard to the means employed therefor contemplates the result to be accomplished. In each case the contractor is performing a service in the course of an employment conducted free of control or supervision of the owner whose will he represents only as to the result and not as to the means whereby it is accomplished. The fact that the contract was indefinite in specifying the number of cords to be cut, or that the employment might be terminated at the will of either party, in which event Huddle would be entitled to the agreed price per cord for each cord of wood cut, made the engagement none the less an independent contract.

The award is annulled.

JONES v. TITLE GUARANTEE & TRUST CO. (L. A. 4237.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 3, 1918. Rehearing Denied July 2, 1918.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑511(2)—Bill of Exceptions—Service.

A bill of exceptions, though not served in time, will be considered, where plaintiff, upon serving his proposed bill, served and filed a notice of intention to move to be relieved from default, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, and the court granted the motion and settled the bill after considering affidavits supporting motion and opposing motion; there being no abuse of discretion.

2. Partnership 🔑11—What Constitutes.

An agreement between plaintiff and real estate brokers that plaintiff was to pay the amount necessary for the purchase of a lease, and that the profits remaining after repayment to plaintiff of all advances were to be divided equally, did not constitute plaintiff and the brokers partners; there being no arrangement for sharing losses.

3. Brokers 🔑106—Authority to Change Escrow Agreement—Evidence.

In an action against defendant trust company for its alleged disregard of instructions, under which there had been deposited with it as escrow holder plaintiff's check and certain notes, signed by him and two real estate brokers, held, under the evidence, that broker who signed escrow instructions had no authority, actual or ostensible, to change the instructions; the agency being special.

4. Escrows 🔑14(1)—Unauthorized Delivery—Damages.

Where plaintiff's property, deposited with defendant in escrow, was disposed of without compliance with the instructions given, plaintiff was entitled to recover such damages as he suffered through defendant's unwarranted act.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by E. Conde Jones against the Title Guarantee & Trust Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. G. Van Pelt and Wilbur Bassett, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. E. W. Sargent, W. G. Cooke, and Tanner, Odell, Odell & Taft, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of the defendant. The purpose of the action was to recover damages from the defendant, a trust company, for its alleged disregard of certain instructions under which there had been deposited with it, as escrow holder, a check for $2,000 and three promissory notes. The appellant contends that the evidence does not support the findings upon which the court gave its judgment against him.

[1] The respondent makes a preliminary objection to the consideration of the bill of exceptions upon the ground that the proposed bill was not served in time. That there was a delay beyond the period specified in the Code is conceded. But the plaintiff, upon serving his proposed bill, served and filed a notice of intention to move to be relieved from his default under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Affidavits supporting and opposing the application were presented and considered, and the court granted the motion, and settled the bill. That relief may be granted from delay of this kind is well settled. Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 33, 29 Pac. 332; Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 414, 53 Pac. 935. This court has always looked with favor upon orders excusing defaults and permitting controversies to be heard upon their merits. Such orders are rarely reversed, and never "unless it clearly appears that there has been a plain abuse of discretion." O'Brien v. Leach, 139 Cal. 220, 72 Pac. 1004, 96 Am. St. Rep. 105. It cannot be said that there was an abuse of discretion here, and we proceed therefore, to a consideration of the merits of the appeal.

The transaction in controversy arose out of negotiations for the acquisition by the plaintiff of the unexpired term of a lease on certain real property in the city of Los Angeles. R. L. Tatum and H. C. Wood were real estate agents. They had brought to Jones, the plaintiff, a proposition for acquiring the lease, which was owned by the Spring Street Investment Company. The understanding, as between Jones, Tatum, and Wood, was that Jones was to pay the amounts necessary for the purchase of the lease, and that any profits remaining after the repayment to Jones of all advances made by him were to be divided equally between Jones, Tatum, and Wood. Brown Bros. Company were the brokers representing Spring Street Investment Company. The purchase price, consisting of plaintiff's check for $2,000 and promissory notes for $5,000 additional, signed by plaintiff, Wood, and Tatum, were deposited with the defendant, a trust company, on August 27, 1913, under written instructions. The escrow instructions accompanying the deposit were signed in the name of "Frances Griffes, by H. C. Wood." Miss Griffes was not really a party to the transaction, but it was understood that her name should be used, and that it should be signed by Wood. The instructions declared that the signer handed the check, etc., to the defendant to be subject to the order of Brown Bros. Company on the following conditions: Brown Bros. Company were to secure the contemplated lease on given terms; to secure for the signer a reliable tenant for the north 16 feet of the property for five years at a given rental; and also to secure a reliable tenant for the balance of the property for three or five years at a prescribed rental. The form of the lease was to be subject to the approval of E. Conde Jones, the plaintiff, who was also to pass upon the title to the property. A few days later Wood handed to the defendant an amended letter of instructions, which eliminated the conditions requiring Brown Bros. Company to procure subtenants for the proposed purchaser of the lease, and provided that the form of the lease and the title to the property were to be subject to the approval of Frances Griffes. This second paper, like the first, was signed by Wood in the name of Frances Griffes.

The conditions of the amended instructions were performed, and the defendant delivered the check and notes to Brown Bros. Company. There was, however, no compliance with the provisions of the original instructions requiring the lease to be approved by Jones, nor, apparently, with the requirement that subtenants should be obtained. The real controversy, therefore, narrows itself down to the question whether the plaintiff was bound by the amended instructions, or whether, as he claims, he was entitled to stand upon the instructions as originally given. The court found that the plaintiff and Tatum and Wood delivered to the defendant the original instructions, and that afterwards, and within ten days, they also delivered to the defendant the amended instructions; such delivery being made through Wood acting as agent for the plaintiff and Tatum. The appellant disputes the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings.

[2] The evidence shows that the plaintiff was present with Tatum and Wood in the office of the defendant when the first paper of instructions was signed and turned over to the defendant by Wood. He was not present when the amended instructions were given, and there is no evidence to show that he had any knowledge of them. He was not bound by the alteration in the terms of the escrow deposit, unless he conferred actual or ostensible authority upon Wood to make the change. We think the evidence was not such as to support the claim, which is one of those made by the respondent, that Jones, Tatum, and Wood were partners in the transaction, and that each therefore had authority to bind the others. The uncontradicted evidence shows that the deal was being made by Jones; that he was furnishing all the money; and that there was no arrangement for a sharing of the losses. Tatum and Wood were merely rendering services as real estate agents or brokers, and for these services they were to receive a compensation measured by a proportion of such profits as might be realized. Such a venture does not constitute a partnership (Coward v. Clanton, 122 Cal. 451, 55 Pac. 147), and there was certainly nothing in the facts of which defendant had cognizance to make it appear that such a relation existed.

[3] Apart from the question of partnership, there can be no ground for a claim that Jones in fact authorized Wood to modify the terms of the first escrow paper. Nor, we think, did the evidence warrant an inference of ostensible authority to make the change. Both papers were signed by Wood. It is conceded on all sides that Miss Griffes, in whose name he signed, had no real connection with the transaction. So far as the questions here arising are concerned, the situation is the same as if Wood had signed the papers in his own name. The testimony on behalf of the plaintiff tended to show that the defendant was informed, at the time of the deposit, that Jones was the real party in interest, and that the obtaining of the subleases was a material part of the consideration upon which he agreed to pay for the lease. There was, to be sure, a conflict on this point. L. W. McAtee, escrow clerk of the defendant, who handled the transaction in its behalf, testified that Jones said nothing regarding his being principal in the deal. But all the testimony is to the effect that Jones, Wood, and Tatum came to the office of the defendant together, and that the original instructions were signed and presented in the presence of all three. That Jones was in some way interested in the deal was apparent to McAtee, not only from this circumstance, but from the fact that Jones was the maker of the check deposited, and was also one of the signers of the promissory notes. The court was, no doubt, authorized to infer that the conduct of the plaintiff was such as to bind him to the terms of the original deposit. For the purposes of this transaction Jones made Wood at least his ostensible agent. But the agency was a special one, and there was nothing to justify an assumption on the part of the defendant that Wood's authority went any further than to make and consummate the contract by which the papers were first deposited. "Presumptively an agent is employed to make contracts, not to rescind or modify them, to acquire interests, not to give them up, and no power to cancel or vary an agreement is to be inferred from a general power to make it, nor has the agent any implied power to waive or give up rights or interests for his principal, nor to increase his obligations and liabilities for the mere benefit of third persons, unless the principal knew or approved of such modifications by the agent." 31 Cyc. 1387, 1388, and cases cited. When Jones authorized Wood to make a certain contract for him, and deposited his check and notes to be turned over in accordance with such contract, he did not thereby authorize Wood or the defendant to dispose of the check and notes under a different and less favorable contract. Certainly it would not be contended that Wood had ostensible authority to so change the terms of the deposit as to substitute for the lease originally contemplated a lease of other property upon other terms. No more can it be said that Wood had ostensible authority to alter the material provision regarding the obtaining of subleases. If these views be correct, the finding that the delivery of the amended instructions was made through Wood "acting as agent for the plaintiff" has no support in the evidence.

[4] If plaintiff's property, deposited with the defendant upon certain conditions, was disposed of without compliance with those conditions, the plaintiff was, of course, entitled to recover such damages as he may have suffered through defendant's unwarranted act. The defendant contends that the plaintiff showed no damage. But this claim is obviously without merit. There is evidence that plaintiff's check for $2,000 was cashed, and the money paid out by the defendant under the amended instructions. Apart from any question of the notes, it needs no argument to show that the plaintiff suffered damage by being deprived, without his authority or consent, of the money represented by his check.

PALADINI et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT et al. (S. F. 8697.)

1. FISH 🔑9—REGULATION—VALIDITY OF STATUTES.

St. 1917, p. 1673, § 26, providing for the licensing of fishermen and those who sell fish, and authorizing the state market director to fix wholesale and retail prices of fish, is not in violation of Const. art. 1, § 25, providing that the people shall have the right to fish upon and from the public lands of the state and in the waters thereof, and that no land owned by the state shall ever be sold without reserving in the people absolute right to fish thereon, provided that the Legislature may provide for the season when, and the conditions under which, the different species of fish may be taken; the legislative power of the state to alienate what it owns on such terms as it chooses to impose not being modified by the constitutional provision.

2. FISH 🔑9—STATE REGULATION—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Const. art. 4, § 25½, authorizing the Legislature to divide the state into fish and game districts and to enact such laws for the protection of fish and game as it may deem appropriate to the respective districts, being intended to remove the restriction of article 4, § 25, subd. 33, prohibiting the enactment of a local law where a general law can be made applicable, in no wise limits the sovereign power of the state over fish and game or of the Legislature to legislate concerning it.

3. FISH 🔑9—NATURE OF PRIVILEGE TO FISH—CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS.

The right to fish is a privilege granted by the state, and may be taken away in the exercise of its police power, and a proceeding in deprivation of such right is not in its nature criminal, so as to make an order to produce papers against the owner thereof unconstitutional.

4. SEARCHES AND SEIZURES 🔑7—REGULATION OF FISH—UNREASONABLE SEARCHES AND SEIZURES.

An order by the superior court to fish sellers to produce their records of the purchase and sale of fish before the state market director does not violate Const. art. 1, § 19, Const. U. S. Amend. 4, prohibiting unreasonable searches and seizures, such records not being private since St. 1917, p. 1673, § 26, providing for the licensing of fishermen and fish sellers, and authorizing the state market director to fix prices; the obtaining of a license and engaging in the business by fish sellers being a consent to the inspection of their books.

5. FISH 🔑11—REGULATION OF PRICE—PRODUCTION OF RECORDS.

An order by the superior court to fish dealers to produce their books before the state market director under St. 1917, p. 1673, § 26, empowering him to fix the price of fish and to investigate concerning all matters relating to the act, does not require any proceeding for the revocation of the dealer's license in order to give him jurisdiction.

6. STATUTES 🔑64(2)—PARTIAL INVALIDITY—EFFECT—REGULATION OF FISH.

St. 1917, p. 1673, § 8, authorizing the state market director to reduce the price of fish if in his judgment the supply is excessive or abnormal, if unconstitutional, does not render the whole law unconstitutional; the provision merely recognizing the well-known law of supply and demand.

7. FISH 🔑11—REGULATION OF PRICE—PRODUCTION OF BOOKS.

An order by the superior court to fish dealers who are engaged in selling fish at wholesale and licensed to do so and are also licensed to fish, to produce before the state market director "the sales records and ledger accounts with your customers, covering the period from the 20th of February to the 28th of February, 1918," is too broad, and beyond the jurisdiction of the market director and the superior court; it not being confined to the production of books and documents relating to the fish business.

In Bank. Proceedings for writ of prohibition by A. Paladini and another against the Superior Court of the State of California, etc., Hon. George A. Sturtevant presiding, and Harris Weinstock, State Market Director, to prevent the execution of an order for the production of books, and to prohibit the superior court from punishing the petitioners for contempt in failing to comply with the order. Writ issued.

H. I. Stafford, W. E. Stafford, and James A. Devoto, all of San Francisco, for petitioners. Sapiro, Neylan & Ehrlich, of San Francisco, for respondents. Milton Marks, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ.

WILBUR, J. Petitioners seek a writ of prohibition to prevent the carrying out of an order of the superior court, requiring them to produce before the respondent, Harris Weinstock, state market director, their ledger and sale account for the week February 20 to 28, 1918, and to prohibit the superior court from punishing petitioners for contempt of court in failing to comply with said order.

The respondent, Harris Weinstock, as state market director, is attempting to carry out the procedure provided in the law enacted by the Legislature of this state in 1917 (chapter 803, p. 1673, § 26), providing for the licensing of fishermen and those who sell fish, and authorizing the state market director to fix wholesale and retail prices of fish. It is first contended that the statute is unconstitutional and void as being in violation of section 25, article 1, of the Constitution. This section reads as follows:

> "The people shall have the right to fish upon and from the public lands of the state and in the waters thereof, excepting upon lands set aside for fish hatcheries, and no land owned by the state shall ever be sold or transferred without reserving in the people the absolute right to fish thereupon; and no law shall ever be passed making it a crime for the people to enter upon the public lands within this state for the purpose of fishing in any water containing fish that have been planted therein by the state; provided, that the Legislature may by statute, provide for the season when and the conditions under which the different species of fish may be taken."

[1] The petitioners claim that by this section "the people are given the constitutional right to fish in the navigable waters of the state." If there were no such constitutional provision, petitioners state the rule thus:

> "The fish belong to the people of the state of California. This is conceded. It must be so, that what they own, they may give away absolutely, or conditionally, with or without reservation."

The rule with reference to the private ownership of fish and game is thus stated in the late case of Frank Phœdovius, 170 Pac. 412:

> Fish and game "can only become the subject of ownership in a qualified way, and which can never be the subject of commerce except with the consent of the state and subject to conditions which it may deem best to impose for the public good."

See, also, Ex parte Bailey, 155 Cal. 472, 101 Pac. 441, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 534, 132 Am. St. Rep. 95; Ex parte Fritz, 86 Miss. 210, 38 South. 722, 109 Am. St. Rep. 700; Ex parte Kenneke, 136 Cal. 527, 69 Pac. 261, 89 Am. St. Rep. 177. It is therefore evident that what the people of the state own they can alienate on such terms as they choose to impose, and that this power of regulation continues so long as such fish or game are the subject of trade or transfer. This legislative power was in no wise modified by the addition of section 25, article 1, supra, to the Constitution. It is apparent that the principal purpose of this amendment, as stated in the Matter of Application of Parra, 24 Cal. App. 339, 141 Pac. 393, "was to preserve to the people the right to fish upon the public lands of the state, and to require that grants of land by the state should not be made 'without reserving to the people the absolute right to fish thereon.'" The proviso in the section authorizing the Legislature to fix "the season when and the conditions under which the different species of fish may be taken" was evidently intended to leave the matter exactly as it was before the adoption of this amendment in November, 1910, except as it restricted the power to alienate public land without such reservation, or to create private fisheries thereon. This section gave no right to the people which they did not already have. We conclude, therefore, that the Legislature had the right to provide a system for fixing the wholesale and retail prices for the sale of fresh fish, allowing "a reasonable compensation or profit to those engaged in the catching or selling of fish," as in the act provided.

[2] Amicus curiæ calls attention to the new section of the Constitution (section 25½, art. 4) adopted in November, 1902, to wit:

> "The Legislature may provide for the division of the state into fish and game districts, and may enact such laws for the protection of fish and game therein as it may deem appropriate to the respective districts" —and claim that the effect of this provision is to limit the power of the Legislature to the "protection of fish and game." The obvious purpose of this amendment was to remove the former restriction of article 4, § 25, subd. 33, which prohibited the enactment of a local law "where a general law can be made applicable," and in no wise limits the sovereign power of the state over fish and game, or of the Legislature to legislate concerning the same. On the contrary, it increases the legislative discretion by authorizing local laws on the subject.

[3] Petitioners claim that the right to fish is a property right, granted by license; that to take away such license is to deprive the petitioners of a property right, and therefore a proceeding looking to that end is in its nature criminal, and that to require the petitioners to produce papers containing evidence against themselves in such a criminal action is unconstitutional. It is sufficient to say that the license to fish is a privilege granted by the state, and may be taken away in the exercise of its police power. See Hevren v. Reed, 126 Cal. 219, 222, 58 Pac. 536; Littleton v. Burgess, 14 Wyo. 173, 82 Pac. 864, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 631. See, also, Lanterman v. Anderson, 172 Pac. 625, wherein a petition for a hearing in this court was denied. The proceeding before the state market director is not criminal in its nature, and the order compelling the petitioners to produce their books before the state market director was not in violation of the constitutional provision, which prohibits a court or officer from requiring a defendant in a criminal case to furnish evidence against himself.

[4, 5] It is also claimed that the order to produce petitioners' books violates the constitutional provision prohibiting unreasonable searches and seizures. Article 1, § 19, Const. of Cal.; Fourth Amendment, U. S. Const. Books and papers containing a record of the purchase and sale of fish, made since the above law of 1917 went into effect, are no longer private. They contain a record of the purchase and sale of the property of the state, by those having a qualified or conditional interest therein. By engaging in the fish business and applying for a license therefor petitioners, in effect, consented to the inspection of their books as in the law provided. To require the production of such books is not a violation of the constitutional provision in question. It is next claimed that before the state market director can take evidence on the question of the revocation of the petitioners' license to fish it was essential that some proceeding should be pending before him for the revocation of such license, and that it should be alleged in some such petition so filed that the petitioners herein had violated the law in regard to the sale of fish at prices not authorized, and that until some such proceeding is filed the state market director had no jurisdiction to proceed, and that therefore the subsequent procedure by application to the superior court falls for lack of jurisdiction in the first instance. The law purports to give the state market director the right to inspect the books of all persons engaged in the business in which the petitioners are engaged. It also provides for the production of such books by subpœna. The purpose of such procedure is to enable the defendant Weinstock, as state market director, representing the people of the state of California, to ascertain the conditions under which fish are being sold, not only for the purpose of determining whether or not there have been violations of his orders fixing the price of fish, but also to ascertain what prices should be fixed.

[6] As already stated, the petitioners, by engaging in the business of dealing in fish caught in the waters of the state, in effect consented to the inspection of their books by the state market director, as in the law provided, and the procedure here adopted for securing the presence of said books at the time of the examination of the question as to whether or not the petitioners had violated the provisions of the law with relation to the prices at which fish were sold was in strict accordance with the letter of the law, and there is no reason for interpolating into the law by construction provisions not found therein. Petitioners also claim that "too much power is delegated to this state market director, and a power which cannot be delegated," but the only specific power pointed out under this head is that "section 8 provides that if the supply of fish in the judgment of the state market director is excessive or abnormal, the state market director may reduce the price of fish." This section seems merely to recognize the well-known law of commerce, the law of supply and demand, by which, in theory, at least, all prices are fixed. This provision, however, would not, in any event, render the whole law unconstitutional, and therefore it is unnecessary to pass on this point.

[7] Petitioners claim that the order to produce is not sufficiently definite, and is too broad in its terms. It is alleged by petitioner A. Paladini that he is engaged in the business of selling fish at wholesale in California, and licensed so to do, and also that he is licensed to fish. If the order and subpœna to produce books complained of had been confined to books containing record of transactions in such fish business, between the dates specified, the same would have been sufficiently definite and certain, and in full compliance with the law. The order and subpœna, however, directs the petitioners herein to produce "the sales records and ledger accounts with your customers covering the period from the 20th of February, 1918, to February 28, 1918." The order and subpœna are therefore entirely too broad, and beyond the jurisdiction of the state market director and of the superior court. The order should have been confined to the production of books and documents relating to such fish business.

Let the writ issue.

WAITE v. SAN FERNANDO PUB. CO. et al.

(L. A. 4231.)

1. Libel and Slander 🔑88—Pleading — Sufficiency.

Complaint alleging malicious publication of false and defamatory articles to plaintiff's injury stated cause of action notwithstanding further allegation that plaintiff "has had and now has a wide circle of business, financial, social, and political friends"; the last allegation not being sufficient to establish that plaintiff was not damaged.

2. Libel and Slander 🔑107(1)—Evidence—Admissibility.

In action for libel, plaintiff could say what was the age and sex of his children, as bearing on the mental suffering which might be increased by plaintiff's consciousness of the fact that the members of his family would suffer by reason of the disgrace.

3. Libel and Slander 🔑104(1)—Evidence—Admissibility.

In action for libel, conversation after publication of article with certain defendants concerning the article and the defense they meant to interpose was admissible to show actual knowledge of the article and approval of its publication.

4. Libel and Slander 🔑6(1)—Qualified Statements.

A defamatory article which would be libelous per se, if its matter were directly stated, does not lose such quality because it is couched in form of an interview with another person or because it states that the defamatory matter is reported, or asserted, or believed to be true.

5. Appeal and Error 🔑996—Scope of Review.

Arguments on appeal as to the evidence and deductions to be drawn therefrom will not be considered; such matters being for the jury.

6. Libel and Slander 🔑88—Damages — Exemplary Damages.

In action for libel, where plaintiff asked $20,000 damages without expressly praying for exemplary damages, an award of $1,000 exemplary damages was not erroneous, if supported by the evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by George E. Waite against the San Fernando Publishing Company and others. Judgment on verdict for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hass & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, and J. J. Wilson, for appellants. Spencer Thorpe and Erwin W. Widney, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action for libel, alleged to have consisted in the publication in a certain newspaper owned and controlled by the defendants of a certain article defamatory of the plaintiff's character. The jury returned a general verdict of $3,000 damages against the defendants, and in response to special interrogatories found compensatory damages in the sum of $2,000 and exemplary damages in the sum of $1,000. From the judgment entered upon such verdict the defendants prosecute this appeal.

[1] The appellants' first contention is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This claim is predicated upon that portion of the complaint in which the plaintiff avers:

> That he "was at all the times herein mentioned, and now is, a citizen of the state of California of good name and reputation," and that "he has had and now has a wide circle of business, financial, social, and political friends, and was at all the times herein mentioned, and now is, engaged in conducting his private business affairs and in building up his personal reputation and business standing in the community in which he lives."

The appellants urge that these averments of the plaintiff's complaint show that he was in no way damaged by the publication complained of, and hence had no cause of action. But the complaint goes much further in its averments as to the plaintiff's injury than the foregoing excerpts would show. It sets forth in terms a publication which, both directly and inferentially, charges that the plaintiff deliberately took advantage of and overreached a widow recently bereaved and in ill health in a business transaction involving the sale of a crop of olives, and then proceeds to state that such a person is unworthy to be elected to an office of public honor and trust, to which he aspires. The article was clearly and unmistakably libelous per se. The complaint proceeds to allege:

> "That the publication of said article has caused, and does now cause, plaintiff great humiliation, pain and suffering, has injured and is injuring plaintiff's reputation in the community where he lives and throughout the territory covered by the circulation of said newspaper, and has injured, and is injuring, plaintiff personally, financially, politically, and socially throughout said territory, and tended to, and tends to, destroy plaintiff's personal, financial, political, and social standing throughout said territory."

It requires no argument to show that the complaint read as a whole, constitutes a cause of action.

[2] The next contention of the appellants is that the trial court erred in overruling an objection to the following question asked plaintiff while testifying as a witness in support of the averments of his complaint: "Q. What is the age of your children and the sex of each?" A similar inquiry was held proper in the earlier cases of Rhodes v. Naglee, 66 Cal. 677, 6 Pac. 863, and Dixon v. Allen, 69 Cal. 527, 11 Pac. 179, while the question in almost its precise form was held to be permissible in the case of Cahill v. Murphy, 94 Cal. 29, 30 Pac. 195, 28 Am. St. Rep. 88, wherein the court, after citing the foregoing cases, stated that the rule rests upon the principle that, as mental suffering entitles a plaintiff to compensation in cases of this character, such suffering may be increased and the damages consequently enhanced by his consciousness of the fact that members of the plaintiff's family would suffer by reason of the disgrace visited upon him by the slanderous charge. It follows that the trial court was not in error in its ruling in the instant case.

[3] The next contention of the appellants is that the court erred in permitting one of plaintiff's witnesses to testify to a certain conversation after the publication of the article, had with the defendants Wilson, Hille, and Eigholz, concerning the publication of the article and the defense they meant to interpose in the action. The purpose of this inquiry was that of showing that these defendants had each actual knowledge of the fact and contents of the published article, and that, after such notice, they not only took no steps to have its charges withdrawn, but expressly approved its publication. This was for the purpose of showing actual malice on the part of these defendants in making and persisting in the defamatory charges which the article contained. The conversation sought to be elicited was entirely competent and proper for these purposes. Preston v. Frey, 91 Cal. 107, 27 Pac. 533.

[4] The next several contentions of the appellants have reference to a number of instructions which the court gave, or which it refused to give at the defendant's request. Some of these contentions are predicated upon the assumption that the article in question was not libelous per se. This contention has already been disposed of, but it might be added that a defamatory article which would be libelous per se, if its matter was directly stated, does not lose its quality in this regard because it is couched in the form of an interview with another person, or because it seeks to avoid its otherwise obvious character as a libel per se by the statement that it is reported or asserted or believed to be true. Gilman v. McClatchy, 111 Cal. 606, 44 Pac. 241; Edwards v. San Jose, etc., Soc., 99 Cal. 431, 34 Pac. 128, 37 Am. St. Rep. 70; Wilson v. Fitch, 41 Cal. 363.

The appellants' criticism of the other instructions given or refused have not sufficient merit to require separate consideration. The instructions of the trial court, taken as a whole, very fully and fairly stated the law of libel applicable to the case at bar.

[5, 6] The appellants' final contention is that the verdict of the jury was contrary to law, in so far as it undertook to assess punitive damages against the defendants for being actuated by actual malice in making the publication complained of. Much of the argument addressed to this point is occupied with a discussion of the evidence and the deductions to be drawn therefrom, but these were matters for the jury. The complaint charged the defendants with express malice and with the malicious intent of injuring plaintiff's reputation. There is sufficient evidence in the record to have justified the jury in finding these averments to be true. The plaintiff, it is true, did not expressly pray for punitive damages in so many words, but he did ask for a general verdict for damages in the sum of $20,000. This was sufficient to have justified the jury in making its award of the sum allowed for exemplary damages. We find no merit, therefore, in the appellants' contention in this regard.

No error appearing in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

BRICKER v. ROLLINS & JARECKI et al.

1. HIGHWAYS 🔑113(5)—CONTRACTS—BONDS—"SUPPLIES."

Rentals for use of horses and tools used in highway construction are "supplies," if not "materials," within St. 1897, p. 201, requiring contractors on county projects to give bond to pay for materials and supplies furnished for the performance of the work.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Supply.]

2. HIGHWAYS 🔑113(5)—CONTRACTS—BONDS—"SUPPLIES."

Flour, meat, butter, barley, hay, and like articles, consumed by the men and horses, and powder, caps, and fuse, all actually used in advancing highway work, were "supplies" within St. 1897, p. 201, requiring county contractors to furnish bond to pay for supplies.

3. HIGHWAYS 🔑113(5)—CONTRACTS—BONDS—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER—LIABILITY OF SURETY.

Since a receiver appointed by the court to take charge of the affairs of a county contractor is the official representative of such contractor, a surety on the contractor's bond under St. 1897,

p. 201, is responsible for his obligations in purchasing materials and supplies.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Wellborn, Judge.

Action by W. J. Bricker against Rollins & Jarecki and others, the County of Los Angeles, a municipal corporation, and the American Surety Company of New York, a corporation; also consolidated causes. Judgments for plaintiffs against the Surety Company, and the latter appeals. Affirmed.

Bicksler & Smith, of Los Angeles, for appellant. M. M. Meyers, J. C. Craig, Walton J. Wood, and W. W. Clary, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This was an action arising out of a contract entered into between the defendants Rollins & Jarecki and the county of Los Angeles for the furnishing of the materials and performing the work necessary to the proper construction of the Santa Susanna Pass highway in said county. The defendant and appellant American Surety Company of New York furnished the bond of said contractor for the due performance of the terms of said contract. After the work had proceeded for some time the members of the firm of contractors became involved in disputes among themselves, as a result of which Jarecki brought an action against Rollins, and in said action caused a receiver to be appointed, who took charge of the affairs of the partnership and attempted to proceed with said work, but after a few months abandoned it, and the county of Los Angeles completed the work. Several suits were filed by various persons to recover upon claims for materials and supplies furnished in the earlier stages of said work to the contractors and to the receiver, the American Surety Company of New York being made a party to these suits, and recovery being brought against it upon its bond. In these suits there were a number of interventions on the part of other claimants, but the suits were finally consolidated and tried together. The court rendered judgment against the said American Surety Company of New York upon certain of these claims, and from such judgment it prosecutes this appeal. Before considering the nature of the several claims involved in this appeal it would be well to notice the language of the statute providing for such work and of the bond required by it upon which the rights of the several claimants to recover must be predicated. The statute provides that every contractor to whom is awarded a contract for doing any mechanical work by a county shall give a bond conditioned that, if the contractor "fails to pay for any materials or supplies furnished for the performance of the work contracted to be done, or for any work or labor done thereon of any kind, that the sureties will pay," etc., and further provides that "any materialman, person, company, or corporation, furnishing materials or supplies used in the performance of the work," etc., whose claim has not been paid by the contractor, must file his claim within 90 days with the governing body by whom the contract was awarded, and must begin his action upon the bond within 6 months thereafter. St. 1897, pp. 201, 202, §§ 1, 2. The bond in the cases before us was conditioned that:

> "If said principals as contractors in said contract fail to pay for any materials or supplies furnished for the performance of the work contracted to be done in and by said contract, or for any work or labor done thereon of any kind, said surety will pay the same," etc.

[1] The first contention urged by the appellant, American Surety Company of New York, is that the trial court was in error in rendering any judgment against it and in favor of several of said claimants for the hiring of mule teams let by them to the contractor or to the receiver for use by either of them in connection with the work. In making this contention the appellant chiefly relies upon the case of Wood, Curtis & Co. v. El Dorado Lumber Co., 153 Cal. 231, 94 Pac. 877, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 585, 126 Am. St. Rep. 80, 15 Ann. Cas. 382. That case, however, arose out of an attempt to enforce a mechanic's lien claimed to have been created under section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it read prior to its amendment in 1911, when it did not by its terms provide for liens in favor of teamsters or draymen, but was limited in its application to mechanics, materialmen, and all other persons and laborers performing labor or furnishing materials to be used or consumed in the structure. The court in that case held that the plaintiff by letting his horses to the contractor at a stipulated price per month could not be held to have bestowed labor upon the structure so as to entitle him to a lien for the rental of such horses under the terms of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it then read. On the other hand, respondent insists that this case is to be governed by the doctrine announced in the case of French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 Pac. 92, which involved an action upon a bond given under the provisions of the act of 1897 as was the bond in this case, and in which this court held that a plaintiff had furnished the contractor, a teamster, two horses and a scraper at an agreed price per day for the doing of the work to be performed under his contract. The court there held the rental of the team to be a proper charge to be recovered in an action on the bond. In its most recent rulings as to the construction to be placed upon the above-quoted terms of the statute under which the public work involved in the instant case was to be done the courts have adopted the views expressed in the case of French v. Powell, supra, and have amplified somewhat upon the reasoning which sustains these views. In the case of Associated Oil Co. v. Commary-Peterson Co., Inc., 32 Cal.

App. 582, 163 Pac. 702, in which a rehearing has been denied by this court, it was held that a plaintiff furnishing gasoline to a contractor for the doing of certain construction work upon the state highway under the provisions of the act of 1897, for the price of which he brought an action upon the bond, which was in the precise form of the bond involved in the instant case, was entitled to recover therefor. The court in that case held the motive power applied by the use of gasoline in the operation of the trucks which hauled the gravel, cement, etc., to be used in the construction of the highway was thus inseparably connected with and used in the performance of the work provided by the contract to be done and by the bond to be paid for; and the court cites numerous other cases arising under similar statutes where action for the recovery of the price of various forms of motive power and energy expended in the performance of like work have been upheld. The court also differentiates between cases brought under the mechanic's lien law prior to the amendment of the statute of 1897. We are unable to perceive any distinction in principle between the case at bar and the foregoing cases of French v. Powell, supra, and Associated Oil Co. v. Commary-Peterson Co., supra. In the case of the rental of animals or of machinery applying motive power to the performance of the work to be done under the contract it is the energy of the instrumentality for which the price is paid, and that energy, whether in vital or mechanical or fluid form, is the thing which is supplied for and used in the work. It may not, in the strict sense, be embraced in the definition of the word "materials," but we think it may fairly be included within the meaning of the more comprehensive word "supplies." In the adoption of these views we are not without persuasive authority from other jurisdictions. These cases are referred to and discussed in the case of Sherman v. American Surety (L. A. 4167) 173 Pac. 161, filed May 15, 1918, and the conclusions in that case arrived at are hereby approved. The foregoing reasoning applies also to the rental of tools, the use of which contributed to the performance of the work. It was the use of the tool, and not the tool itself, which formed the basis for the claim of recompense. Our conclusion is, therefore, that the appellant's contention as to those claims which involve the rental of mules or tools for use in the performance of the work cannot be sustained.

[2] The next contention of appellant has reference to the alleged error of the trial court in giving judgment in favor of those claimants who furnished provisions and merchandise, such as flour, meat, butter, barley, hay, and like articles sold to the receiver and consumed by the men or teams during the progress of the work, and also for powder, caps, and fuse used by them in connection with said work. As to this class of claims a less difficult question is presented, arising out of the broader meaning to be given to the word "supplies," as used in the statute and bond. The ordinary meaning of this term in its general and accepted use is such as to include goods, wares, and merchandise of almost every kind and nature, whether used in the household or on the farm, or in any sort of productive or constructive work requiring the labor or service of men or animals or machinery. In the instant case they were furnished to be used and were actually used in advancing the work to be done under this contract, and in that sense entered into and became a component part of it and of the thing produced by it. This being so, we are of the opinion that as to the above classes of claims the trial court was correct in their allowance. Brogan v. National Surety Co., 246 U. S. 257, 38 Sup. Ct. 250, 62 L. Ed. —; People v. Pullman Car Co., 175 Ill. 125, 51 N. E. 664, 64 L. R. A. 366; Wright v. Walton, 56 Miss. 1; Gibbons v. The Fanny Barker, 40 Mo. 253; Conner Co. v. Littlefield, 79 Tex. 76, 15 S. W. 217.

[3] The appellant, however, contends that, even if it be conceded that the appellant would be liable upon its bond for supplies furnished for the work and labor performed for the contractor, it is not to be held liable for either or any of these things furnished to the receiver of the contracting firm. There is no merit in this contention. The receiver appointed by the court to take charge of the property and affairs of the firm and to carry on the work which was required to be done in the performance of said contract was the official agent and representative of the firm in all that he did in these respects, and his acts and obligations in so doing were the acts and obligations of the principals upon this bond, and for these the surety on the bond is as much responsible as though the principals had themselves incurred these liabilities in the performance of the work. A case very much in point upon this subject is that of Abbott v. Morrissette, 46 Minn. 10, 48 N. W. 416.

The contention of appellant that certain of the claims upon which some of the suits were brought were not filed in time is without merit. The time for filing such claims prior to the institution of actions thereon under the original act of 1897 providing for public work of this character was enlarged by the amendment of the statute in 1911, and under the terms of said amendment all of the claims for which these suits were brought were filed in time.

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

FLEISHHACKER v. MORAN et al.

(Civ. 1850.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 13, 1918. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 11, 1918.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT 🔑152(4)—LEASES—REPAIRS—CONSTRUCTION.

A stipulation in a lease that the premises are in good condition and to be kept so by the lessee is binding on the tenant as respects a latent defect, in the absence of showing that such defect might not have been discovered before making the stipulation.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by M. Fleishhacker against James Moran and another, individually and as copartners, and August F. Meyer and another, individually and as copartners, under the firm name of the Anchor Brewing Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Leon Samuels and Joseph L. Taaffe, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Lilienthal, McKinstry & Raymond, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In this action for rent, plaintiff leased certain premises to the defendants, Moran and Nelson, to be used as a saloon, defendant brewing company being surety on the lease. One of the clauses of the lease reads as follows:

> "It is further agreed that the premises are now in a tenantable and good condition, and are fit for the purposes for which they are hereby leased, and that they shall be kept in good condition by and at the expense of the lessees, during the term of this lease. * * *"

The answer did not deny that the rent sued for was due, but alleged the existence of a latent defect in the premises which was not known to the defendants at the time that the property was leased. There is absolutely no showing in the answer that the defect referred to might not have been discovered prior to the making of the stipulation above quoted, and there is no attempt in the pleadings to reframe the lease on the ground of mistake or fraud. Under these circumstances it is clear that the defendants are bound by their stipulation, and that the lower court properly gave its judgment for plaintiff on the pleadings.

Judgment affirmed.

CRITTENDEN et al. v. MURPHY et al.

(Civ. 2327.)

PARENT AND CHILD 🔑13(1)—DRIVING AUTOMOBILE—LIABILITY OF PARENT.

Under Motor Vehicle Act of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 406) § 19, providing that no person shall allow a motor vehicle owned by him or under his control to be operated by any person "in violation of the terms of this act," where a minor son, driving his parent's automobile with their permission, drove it so recklessly as to strike plaintiff, standing on the sidewalk, the parents were liable for injuries so caused.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Fanny Crittenden and husband against Joseph A. Murphy and Kate J. Murphy. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Julian H. Biddle, of San Francisco, for appellants. Wm. A. Kelly, of San Francisco, for respondents. Jesse H. Steinhart, of San Francisco, and Lawrence L. Levy, of New York City, amici curiæ.

ZOOK, Judge pro tem. Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment for defendants after demurrer sustained to their amended complaint. The action is one for damages for personal injuries suffered by Mrs. Crittenden as a result of her being struck by an automobile driven by Thomas C. Murphy, the minor son of defendants. The negligent driving of the automobile by the son, the happening of the accident, and the consequent injury to plaintiff are properly alleged in the complaint, and the sole question on this appeal is the sufficiency of the complaint to charge the parents with liability for the son's tort. These allegations are in substance as follows: That defendants are the owners of the automobile in question; that the same was purchased for the pleasure, comfort, and enjoyment of defendants and their said minor son, and not for business purposes; that the son was at all times authorized and permitted by defendants to drive the automobile for himself and for defendants; and that at and immediately prior to the time of the accident the son was driving the automobile with the consent, knowledge, and permission of defendants, and was "acting in furtherance of, and not apart from, the service and control of these defendants, and within the purposes for which said automobile was purchased."

The question whether or not under the facts above set forth the parents are to be held liable for the negligence of their minor son has never been decided in California, although there have been a number of decisions upon the subject in other jurisdictions. See note to Griffin v. Russell, L. R. A. 1916F, 223. It is conceded in all of the cases that, under our system of jurisprudence, the mere fact of parentage alone does not render a parent liable for the torts of his minor child, unauthorized and unratified by the parent, and that the liability, if any, must rest upon a showing of agency and the doctrine of respondeat superior. In those cases in which it appeared that at the time of the accident the son was engaged in carrying the parents or other members of the family in the machine the courts are practically unanimous in holding that the son was the agent of the parent; but, where the son was alone in the machine, and not engaged in performing some act expressly for the parent, the courts have divided on the question. The reasoning of those cases which hold the parent liable is well expressed by the following quotation from the case of Birch v. Abercrombie, 74 Wash. 486, 133 Pac. 1020, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 59:

> "The daughter was using the machine for the very purpose for which the father owned it, kept it, and intended that it should be used. It was being used in furtherance of the very purpose of his ownership, and by one of the persons by whom he intended that purpose should be carried out. It was in every just sense being used in his business by his agent. There is no possible distinction, either in sound reason, sound morals, or sound law, between her legal relation to the parent and that of a chauffeur employed by him for the same purpose. The fact that the agency was not a business agency, nor the service a remunerative service, has no bearing upon the question of liability. * * * In running his vehicle, she was carrying out the general purpose for which he owned it and kept it. No other element is essential to invoke the rule respondeat superior. * * * It seems too plain for cavil that a father who furnishes a vehicle for the customary conveyance of the members of his family makes their conveyance by that vehicle his affair, that is, his business, and any one driving the vehicle for that purpose with his consent, express or implied, whether a member of his family or another, is his agent. The fact that only one member of the family was in the vehicle at the time is in no sound sense a differentiating circumstance abrogating the agency. It was within the general purpose of the ownership that any member of the family should use it, and the agency is present in the use of it by one as well as by all.
> "Any other view would set a premium upon the failure of the owner to employ a competent chauffeur to drive an automobile kept for the use of members of his family, even if he knew that they were grossly incompetent to operate it for themselves."

We are satisfied that the rule thus laid down is the correct one, not only because of the fact that the use of the machine by the son for his own pleasure was contemplated when it was purchased, but also because of the very nature of the automobile itself. While it is true that the automobile is not in itself a dangerous instrument, nevertheless it demands a very high decree of care and skill in its management upon the highway; and it must be recognized that, in the hands of an incompetent or reckless youth, it has immense potentiality for harm to others. Therefore the owner owes the duty to the traveling public to see to it that his car, when driven on the streets with his permission and for the purposes for which the car was purchased, should be driven carefully and with due consideration to their rights; and the owner should not in good conscience be allowed to disclaim his responsibility on the ground that the use thus contemplated and authorized by him is permissive only. When, as is alleged in the complaint in the case at bar, the son, with his parents' permission, takes the car out and drives it so recklessly as to cause it to run off the highway and to strike plaintiff, standing on the sidewalk, it is in effect the negligence of the parents in permitting the reckless son to drive that is the real cause of the injury. And we find this principle recognized in the statutes of California, for section 19 of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 406), which was in effect at the time of the accident, provides as follows:

> "No person shall allow a motor vehicle owned by him or under his control to be operated by any person who has no legal right to do so, or in violation of the provisions of this act."

The complaint in the case at bar certainly shows an utter disregard by defendants' son of the rules of the road laid down in the act in question. And in 1917 the Legislature went a step further, in an amendment to section 24 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1917, p. 407, § 18), where it is provided that no minor shall in any event operate any automobile without a license, and that as a prerequisite to obtaining such license the parent or guardian of such minor must join in the application therefor; and it is there further provided "that any negligence of a minor, so licensed, in operating or driving a motor vehicle upon the public highway, whether as chauffeur or operator, shall be imputed to the person or persons who shall have signed the application of such minor for said license, which person or persons shall be jointly and severally liable with such minor" for any damages caused by such negligence. It may be noted that the provision just quoted makes the parent liable even though he neither owns nor controls the machine driven by the minor, and to that extent it creates a new liability; but, for the reasons above set forth, we are satisfied that under the law as it stood at the time of the accident in the case at bar the complaint herein stated a good cause of action against the defendants.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment be reversed, with directions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Patrick J. Walsh against M. Flatland. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Peirce Coombes, of San Francisco, for appellant. W. F. Stafford and W. M. Stafford, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This case presents the same question of law as was raised in Crittenden v. Murphy, 173 Pac. 595, this day decided by this court. The lower court took the same view of the law as did this court in Crittenden v. Murphy, and found on ample evidence that at the time of the injury the son was driving defendant's automobile with his father's implied consent, and further found that the son did not have the license to operate an automobile required by the Motor Vehicle Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 638), which act contained a provision identical with that quoted in Crittenden v. Murphy. Accordingly the court gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

Certificate of protest and certificate of notice of protest are to be considered together in determining whether protest is so complete, under Pol. Code, § 795, as to make it prima facie evidence of certain matters.

2. BILLS AND NOTES ⇨410—PROTEST—ADMISSIBILITY OF CERTIFICATES.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Actions by T. C. Whitcomb against W. O. Huse and George H. Woodruff, and against C. O. Middleton and George H. Woodruff. Judgments for plaintiff, and George H. Woodruff appeals. Reversed.

Clyde C. Shoemaker and George H. Woodruff, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Valentine & Newby, and Nathan Newby, all of Los Angeles, and Hugh A. McNary, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. The questions arising on these two appeals are identical. References to the facts and to the parties will be according to the record in Whitcomb v. Huse, Civ. No. 2157. The action was brought to recover on two promissory notes, Huse being sued as a maker and Woodruff as an indorser. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and Woodruff appeals.

[1] It is contended by the appellant, among other things, that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence the notary's certificates of protest of the notes sued upon and also his certificates of notice of protest. The ground of the contention is that the documents failed to comply with the terms of section 795 of the Political Code, which provides that protests, stating certain facts, including "the reputed place of residence" of the party to a bill or note and of the party to whom it was given, "and the post office nearest thereto," are prima facie evidence of the matters stated in them. Both of the instruments which were received in evidence are to be considered together in determining whether the "protest" is so complete in its subject-matter, under section 795, as to make it prima facie evidence of the matters stated in it (Kellogg v. Pacific Box Factory, 57 Cal. 327, 329); although, strictly speaking, but one of those instruments was the protest. Taking them both together, however, they make no showing as to the reputed place of residence of either Huse, the maker of the paper, or of the appellant, the payee. They show, only, as far as address is concerned, the location of the "office" of Huse, except that they show that the notice of protest was mailed to Huse at that address and to the appellant at a certain designated room in the "Merchants' National Bank Bldg., Los Angeles, Cal." Notwithstanding this state of the "protest," the respondent insists that the documents were admissible in evidence upon the authority of Kellogg v. Pacific Box Factory, supra. In the opinion in that case it was said, at page 330:

> "It [the protest] does not state the place of residence of the party to the note, nor the post office nearest thereto; and, because it does not, the respondents contend that it was inadmissible as evidence. It does, however, state that everything which is certified to have been done and served was done and served at San Francisco. The letters containing notice of the protest of the note were delivered at the respective places of business of the respondents, and in each instance to a person of discretion having charge thereof. As that was done at San Francisco, the respondents' places of business must have been there, and it was not necessary to state that the San Francisco post office was nearer than any other post office to San Francisco. A delivery of the notice at each of respondents' places of business to some person of discretion in charge thereof obviated the necessity of delivering it at or sending it by mail to the respective residences of the respondents; and therefore it was unnecessary to state where said residences were, or the post office nearest thereto."

In order properly to determine the applicability of the Kellogg Case to the present question, it is necessary to refer to section 3144 of the Civil Code, which was, at the time that case was decided, and now is, in the following language:

> "A notice of dishonor may be given: (1) By delivering it to the party to be charged, personally, at any place; or (2) by delivering it to some person of discretion at the place of residence or business of such party, apparently acting for him; or (3) by properly folding the notice, directing it to the party to be charged, at his place of residence, according to the best information that the person giving the notice can obtain, depositing it in the post office most conveniently accessible from the place where the presentment was made, and paying the postage thereon."

[2, 3] It will be noted from the text of the Kellogg Case that notice of dishonor was there given, under the alternative allowed by the second subdivision of section 3144, by a delivery at the places of business of the indorsers; and that the doctrine of the case is really based upon that fact. The ruling amounts to nothing more than a statement that the language of section 795 of the Political Code requiring a statement of the reputed place of residence and of the post office nearest thereto need not be followed where notice of dishonor is given by delivery of the notice at the place of business. Here, however, the situation is quite different. Notice of protest was given by mail, and notice may be given in that manner only pursuant to the provisions of the third subdivision of section 3144, which permits a mailing to residence alone. In such a case the statement of reputed residence and of the nearest post office is most material, and such a statement is of the very essence of the "protest." It is our opinion that a "protest" is prima facie evidence of the matters stated in it only when it contains a recital of all the facts material to the case in which it is offered in evidence and which are mentioned in section 795. The section makes the "protest" prima facie evidence of things of which it ordinarily would be no evidence at all. It allows a departure from the usual rules of evidence, and those who would avail themselves of its provisions must therefore bring themselves clearly within its terms.

The judgments are reversed.

PITT v. PENSINGER. (Civ. 2267.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 10, 1918.)

APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑757(1)—BRIEFS—SUFFICIENCY.

On appeal by the alternative method, part of record not printed in the brief, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, will not be considered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Milton T. Farmer, Judge.

Action by Nellie Pitt against J. H. Pensinger. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. J. Emmons and H. E. Johnstone, both of Bakersfield, for appellant. T. F. Allen, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The appeal in this case is taken from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff. The appellant in the preparation of his record on appeal has made use of what is known as the alternative method. However, in the preparation of the brief of appellant the provisions of section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, have not been observed. By that statute it is required that the parties shall print in their briefs such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the appellate court. Where they fail to do this it follows that the appellate tribunal will not look into the typewritten transcript to ascertain whether the points urged as ground for reversal are well made. The brief here presented on behalf of appellant does not contain sufficient of the record in printed form to enable us to say that there is any merit in the appeal. This same question has been considered in a number of cases which are cited in Barker Bros. v. Joos et al., 171 Pac. 1085. For want of any showing of error, it follows that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

CATLETT v. BENNETT et al. (Civ. 1842.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES 🔑262 — OVERFLOW—DAMAGE TO LEVEE—LIABILITY.

If reclamation district trustees altered canal so as to throw waters against levee which gave way and their negligence contributed in any way to the damage, it was immaterial what portion of the water thrown on the levee was so thrown by the change in the canal due to their negligence.

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES 🔑263 — OVERFLOW — MEASURE OF DAMAGES — LOSS OF CROPS.

Where plaintiff's crops were damaged by negligence of reclamation district trustees causing overflow, the measure of his damages was to be determined by finding value of the probable yield and the market value of the crop had it not been damaged, less the cost of producing and marketing the crop.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by J. R. Catlett against F. H. Bennett and others, Trustees of Reclamation District 1000. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for appellants. M. E. Sanborn and Laurence Schillig, both of Yuba City, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for damages to crops caused by the flooding of plaintiff's land in January, 1914. The gist of the complaint is shown by these allegations:

"That defendants did, during the early part of the year 1913, excavate and cut a canal and build a levee (describing it). That said canal and said levee cut through a high ridge running in an easterly and westerly direction. That said high ridge had always heretofore protected the lands and crops of plaintiff from the overflow waters of Pleasant Grove creek and from the flow of waters on the southeasterly side of said high ridge. That plaintiff is informed and believes, and upon such information and belief states, that said canal and levee was a part of a scheme of the defendants to build a system of levees and canals for the purpose of constructing a by-pass between reclamation district 1000 and reclamation district 1001 for carrying off the drainage and overflow waters of the adjacent country and the overflow from Pleasant Grove creek." (It may be stated here that defendants were and are the trustees of said reclamation district No. 1000.)

"That when defendants had excavated said canal and built said levee between the points aforesaid they ceased and abandoned their work on their said scheme to construct the by-pass and did not complete their plan and failed to complete the canal and levee in question or to build other canals or levees to take care of the overflow waters of Pleasant Grove creek and the country lying on the southeast side of said high ridge. That the canal so constructed by defendants was constructed with a pitch that caused the waters from the overflow of Pleasant Grove creek and the waters from the country on the southeast side of said high ridge to flow directly towards and against the lands and levees of plaintiff in addition to the waters that usually flowed against said levees; and that the levee so built by defendants helped to divert and cause to flow into said canal as aforesaid the overflow waters from Pleasant Grove creek and the waters from country on the southeast side of said high ridge. That defendants left said canal and levee incomplete, and said canal open and unobstructed. That by reason of the foregoing acts of defendants the overflow waters from Pleasant Grove creek and the waters from the vicinity lying southeast of said high ridge did, on or about the 1st day of January, 1914, flow through the said canal and against the levee surrounding the land of plaintiff and augmented the water ordinarily flowing against said levees to such an extent that said levees were broken down and destroyed. That if said canal had never been excavated, or said levee never been built, or if said scheme of defendants had been completed, said overflow waters from Pleasant Grove creek and from the vicinity lying northeast of said high ridge would never have been added to the waters ordinarily flowing against the levees surrounding plaintiff's lands and caused them to break down to his damage as aforesaid."

Appellants in their brief contend for three propositions:

"(1) The evidence is insufficient to prove that the damage to plaintiff's crop was caused by any of the acts of defendants or for that matter from any waters coming thereto from the south of plaintiff's land; that is to say, from the direction of reclamation district 1000. (2) There is no evidence to prove any loss of plaintiff in connection with his levees. (3) Errors of law committed by the lower court in adopting what we claim to have been an incorrect method of computation."

Of these contentions, the only one concerning which there can be any serious controversy is the first one. As to this, from a reading of the entire record, the conviction arises that the evidence is not very persuasive. However, we think it cannot be said that the finding adverse to appellants is entirely unsupported. The only particular omission urged by appellants is that the evidence does not show that the levee protecting plaintiff's land was broken by the waters flowing from the south in the canal constructed by the defendants.

As to the construction of the canal itself by defendants, its condition as described in the complaint, and the fact that it caused a large volume of flood water to be thrown against the land of plaintiff, there is no serious controversy, and these considerations need receive no further attention. The other point is not so clear by reason of the fact that quite a volume of flood water was precipitated against plaintiff's said levee through a waterway called King creek coming from the north, with which, admittedly, appellants had no connection. As to this appellants claim:

"There is no dispute whatever in the testimony that the waters of King creek alone would have done all the damage claimed to have been suffered by plaintiff; and, while there is some evidence to the effect that where these breaks occurred certain waters from the south and east passed through these breaks commingling with the waters of King creek, yet we claim that the damage had been done independent of any action of these waters, and that even as to those a large portion came from the east and only a relatively small portion of the waters from the south ever reached either of these breaks. We claim there is no evidence in the record which tends to show by anything which may be called substantive proof that these breaks were not caused solely by the action of the waters of King creek, and then, after these breaks had thus been caused, the amount of contribution to any possible damage by waters which reached plaintiff's land from and through this intercepting canal to the south was so insignificant as not to amount to a material contributory cause."

[1] In reference to this contention, however, it may be said that, if the levee had held, no damage would have been done to the land. This appears clear enough from the testimony. We think, also, that it is not an unreasonable inference that the levee would not have given way if the additional water had not been projected against it by reason of the negligence of appellants in constructing said incomplete canal. This is not a matter capable of demonstration. It rests somewhat on opinion based upon a consideration of the surrounding circumstances. There was no attempt at a technical exposition of the strength of said levee or of the pressure upon it caused by the waters coming from the north or from the south; but witnesses testified substantially that it had before withstood the impact of a larger volume of water from said King creek, and that when the break occurred more water was being thrown against it through the said canal constructed by defendants than through said creek, and hence we may say it was not an unreasonable deduction drawn by the trial judge "that the negligence of defendants was a proximate contributory cause of the injury." If the negligence of defendants contributed to the breaking of the levee, then, manifestly, it would be unimportant what part of the water that overflowed the land came from said King creek and what part from the canal. However, as to this there is testimony that the larger part came from the canal.

Of the $832.15 awarded as damages, the court allowed the sum of $100 for the destruction of the levee. There is direct testimony that it would cost that amount to repair it, and therefore it cannot be said that the finding in that particular is unsupported.

[2] The third objection of appellants is based upon the fact that the court in determining the damage to the crops adopted the rule of ascertaining the probable yield and market value of the crop had it not been damaged, deducting therefrom the cost of producing and marketing the same. It is admitted by appellants that the course was sanctioned by the Supreme Court in Teller v. Bay & River Dredging Co., 151 Cal. 209, 90 Pac. 942, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 267, 12 Ann. Cas. 779, and by this court in Dennis v. Crocker-Huffman, etc., Co., 6 Cal. App. 58, 91 Pac. 425. They claim, however, that the rule is not correct and think those cases should be overruled. We are, however, entirely satisfied with those decisions and desire to add nothing to the consideration therein advanced.

Under the familiar rule as to the province of appellate courts, we think the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

MERCHANTS' COLLECTION AGENCY v. ROANTREE et ux. (Civ. 2317.)

BILLS AND NOTES 🔑104—EXECUTION—"MENACE."

Under Civ. Code, § 1569, defining duress, and section 1570, defining "menace," where defendant executed with his wife a promissory note to his employer to cover alleged overdraft of salary because of threats by the employer's attorney that the employer would have defendant arrested for embezzlement if he did not pay the sum claimed, the note could not be enforced, since its execution was obtained by means of menace.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Menace.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Action by the Merchants' Collection Agency, a corporation, against James D. Roantree and wife. From a judgment for plaintiff, and a denial of new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Leon Samuels and Jos. L. Taaffe, both of San Francisco, for appellants. E. H. Wakeman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. This action was brought to recover the balance due on a promissory note in the sum of $3,950, executed by the defendants in favor of Gilmartin Company, a corporation, plaintiff's assignor, upon which the amount of $1,125 had been paid. The defense offered by both defendants was lack of consideration for the note and duress in obtaining it. The trial court found against these defenses, and awarded plaintiff judgment as prayed. This appeal is from the judgment and an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

James Roantree was employed before the San Francisco fire of April 18, 1906, as bookkeeper for the Gilmartin Company, a printing concern, and received for his services $125 a month. The printing establishment was totally destroyed in that fire, and in the month of July thereafter the company undertook to re-establish its business. Roantree was reemployed, and acted in the various capacities of bookkeeper, salesman, solicitor, assistant manager, and at times sole manager, and as such devoted more time and was burdened with more arduous and responsible duties than formerly. No salary was formally fixed for him by the officers of the company, but he drew from time to time during each month as he needed it sums which at the end of 4½ years aggregated an amount which would represent payments to him of $290 a month. These sums so received by Roantree were drawn openly, and were all duly entered upon the books of the concern, either by himself or an assistant bookkeeper. In December, 1910, Roantree, having accepted a position with another printing establishment, gave notice of his intended resignation from the Gilmartin Company, and asked the president, James Gilmartin, for an adjustment of certain money invested by him in the company. Gilmartin then charged Roantree with having drawn from the funds of the company some $5,000 more than he was entitled to, and demanded restitution thereof. Roantree denied that he owed anything, claiming that all moneys drawn by him were in payment of salary. The matter was placed in the hands of the company's attorney, and a demand made upon Roantree for the sum of $4,100, this amount being arrived at as a balance claimed to be due from Roantree for money drawn as above stated after crediting him with $150 a month as salary for the first six months after his re-employment, and $200 a month for the remainder of the period down to December, 1910.

The evidence showed that the attorney for Gilmartin Company threatened that the company would have Roantree arrested for embezzlement if he did not pay the sum which they claimed Roantree had overdrawn his salary. In their answer the defendants alleged that Roantree was not indebted to the Gilmartin Company in any sum of money whatsoever, and that the execution of the note was obtained by duress, in that the Gilmartin Company threatened to institute criminal proceedings against Roantree unless himself and his wife executed the note, and that by reason of these threats, and to avoid the threatened criminal proceedings, they did execute it. The court found against defendants on these issues of their answer. The only real question here is whether the finding of the court that the note was not executed because of these threats is sustained by the evidence.

Mrs. Roantree testified that she signed the note only because of the threats. Roantree's testimony as to the reason for his signing the note was the same. That the attorney for the Gilmartin Company had threatened Roantree with criminal proceedings unless he signed the note is admitted by him.

The facts of this case bring it fairly within the rule declared in the case of Morrill v. Nightingale, 93 Cal. 452, 28 Pac. 1068, 27 Am. St. Rep. 207, where it is said:

> "The consent of a party to a contract must be free, and it is not free when obtained through duress or menace. Section 1569 of the Civil Code declares duress to consist in the 'unlawful confinement of the person of the party' or 'of the husband or wife of such party,' etc., or 'the confinement of such person, lawful in form, but fraudulently obtained.' Section 1570 provides menace consists in a threat of the duress above specified, or of a threat of injury to the character of any such person. In this case there was no arrest and confinement; hence no duress; but the history of the transaction, as disclosed by the findings, clearly indicates threats of imprisonment upon a charge of embezzlement, which, in effect, necessarily were threats of injury to the character of defendant Nightingale, and consequently a menace."

The doctrine of the case just quoted has been very recently reiterated and affirmed by the Supreme Court in the case of People v. Beggs, 172 Pac. 152, in support of the declaration that:

> "The law does not contemplate the use of criminal process as a means of collecting a debt. To invoke such process for the purpose named is, as held by all authorities, contrary to public policy"

—and by way of emphasis the Supreme Court in the case of Beggs supposes a situation based upon circumstances which are not materially different from the facts in the instant case, thus:

> "If, instead of paying the $2,000, Da Rosa [the complaining witness in the Beggs Case], under the circumstances shown to exist, had given his note and a mortgage securing the same, then, under the authority of the case cited (Morrill v. Nightingale, supra) payment thereof could not have been enforced, the reason therefor being that the execution of the security was procured by the wrongful use of fear, induced by the threat to prosecute him for the crime out of which the indebtedness arose."

Upon the authority of that case it is clear that the execution of the note in suit was obtained from the defendant by means of menace, and therefore no recovery should be had thereon.

Pursuant to the reason and authority of these cases it must be held that the finding of the court above referred to, to the effect that this note was not obtained by the threats of criminal prosecution, was not sustained by the evidence, and, as the finding was vital to the judgment, the case must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

Appeal and Error 🔑158(1)—Dismissal of Appeal—Moot Questions.

Where judgment went for plaintiff and defendant appealed, questions became moot, where defendant paid the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; H. T. Dewhirst, Judge.

Action by Charles E. Hurt and another against F. J. Bauer. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

C. Franklin Baxter, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Wm. M. Bowen, Benjamin E. Page, and Arthur C. Hurt, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an action for the recovery of money, judgment having gone for the plaintiffs, and the defendant having appealed. At the time set for the oral argument, the respondent was granted leave to file a certified copy of a satisfaction of judgment said to have been filed in the action in the office of the clerk of the trial court. The certified copy has been filed since, and it shows a satisfaction of the judgment in full. By the payment of the judgment the questions presented upon the appeal have become moot.

The appeal is dismissed.

Costs 🔑199 — Entry on Minutes after "Decision."

Where findings of fact are waived, an entry on the minutes of the court, directing judgment for one or the other of the parties, constitutes the "decision" of the court, and the time for serving and filing memorandum of costs commences from the minute entry date, or the date of notice, to the party claiming costs, of such minute entry.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by F. D. Collins against R. O. Belland. From an order striking out the cost bill filed by him, defendant appeals. Order reversed.

Waldo, Root & Dysert, of Los Angeles (Floyd L. Anderson, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. A. P. Michael Narlian, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. The defendant, being the successful party at the trial had herein, appeals from an order of the superior court striking out the cost bill filed by him. The ground of the motion to strike out the bill was that it had been filed before decision had been made by the court. It is shown by the minutes of the superior court that trial of this action was had on July 20, 1916. The concluding portions of the minutes of the court are as follows:

> "Cause submitted without argument. Thereupon it is ordered that judgment be ordered for defendant. Findings were waived."

It is made further to appear by the record that on the day following the defendant served and filed his memorandum of costs and disbursements. It further appears that on the 26th day of July a form of judgment was presented to the judge, who signed the same, and the clerk filed and entered the judgment so made, leaving blank that portion of it which provided for the recovery of costs to the defendant. On the 27th day of July, five days having elapsed after the filing and serving of the memorandum of costs, and no objections having been made thereto, the clerk filled in the blank, inserting the total of defendant's costs as shown by his memorandum. The sole question presented is as to whether the entry on the minutes of the court, findings being waived, directing judgment for the defendant, constituted a decision of the court in the case. Section 1033, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that the party in whose favor judgment is rendered, and who claims his costs, must deliver to the clerk and serve upon the adverse party, within five days "after the verdict, or notice of the decision of the court or referee" a memorandum of the items of his costs and disbursements. The section in conclusion provides:

> "By the decision of the court, or referee, herein referred to, is meant the signing and filing of the findings of fact and conclusions of law."

No question is made but that the plaintiff had actual notice and legal notice of the making of the minute order directing judgment for the defendant. The question is: Under section 1033, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that the memorandum of costs and disbursements must be filed within five days after the signing and filing of findings of fact and conclusions of law, does the time for the filing of such memorandum, where no findings of fact are made, commence to run before the entering of judgment? If it may be said that there is no decision in such a case until the judgment has been entered, then the position of respondent must be sustained. If, on the other hand, where findings of fact and conclusions of law are waived, a minute entry, directing judgment for one or the other of the parties constitutes the decision, then the time for the serving and filing of the memorandum of costs would commence from the minute entry date or the date of notice to the party claiming costs of such minute entry. In Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 26 Pac. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491, it is said:

> "But under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, whenever findings are required, there can be no 'rendition of the judgment' until they are made and filed with the clerk. Findings of fact, however, are required only 'upon the trial of a question of fact,' and they may in all instances be waived. Whenever they are waived or are not required, the entry of its decision in the minutes of the court constitutes the 'rendition of the judgment' in the same manner as it did under the former system."

And in San Joaquin L. & W. Co. v. West, 99 Cal. 345, 33 Pac. 928, it is said:

> "The decision of the court referred to in these sections, when filed, amounts in law to a rendition of the judgment."

We think that where the findings of fact are waived, as they were in this case, an entry on the minutes of the court, directing judgment for one or the other of the parties, constitutes the decision of the court. The opinions which hold that the oral views of the court as expressed from the bench do not constitute a decision in any case are not in point.

The order appealed from is reversed.

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑65(1) — GRADING STREETS—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

Under San Francisco City Charter, art. 6, c. 1, § 22, and chapter 2, § 9, subds. 9 and 10, providing that private contracts for street grading shall be under the direction and to the satisfaction of the board of public works, and that such satisfaction shall be declared by resolution, limitation does not start to run against the contractor until the board of public works adopts such work and shows its satisfaction by resolution.

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑65(1) — GRADING STREET—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

The requirement of article 6, c. 1, § 22, of such charter, that private contracts for grading streets must contain a "provision" to the effect that materials, etc., must be to the satisfaction of the board of public works, applies to oral contracts as well as written contracts, as far as the question of accrual of such cause of action is concerned.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑281(1) — GRADING STREETS—PERMITS.

Under San Francisco City Charter, art. 5, person actually performing work under a private contract for grading streets need not have a permit; it being sufficient if a permit has been issued to some one.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by James J. Flinn and others against Edwin R. Zion. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for appellant. Fabius T. Finch and Paul F. Fratessa, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action brought to recover the sum of $341 for grading and sewering Forty-Ninth avenue, San Francisco, in front of the defendant's property. The contracting firm of Raish & Clark had a private contract for doing this work signed by all the property owners except defendant. This firm assigned its contract to plaintiffs herein to do the work, and defendant contracted with the assignees for his frontage. Judgment was rendered against the defendant for the sum sued for, and defendant appeals.

Two grounds are urged for reversal: First, that the action is barred by the statute of limitations; second, that the contract is unlawful for the reason, it is claimed, that the work was done without a permit from the board of public works. We do not consider there is merit in either contention.

[1, 2] With reference to the first, while it appears that the physical work was completed on March 11, 1914, it was not until April 13th following that a resolution was adopted by the board of public works accepting the work. Suit was filed March 24, 1916, which was in ample time. The claim of appellant that the statute commenced to run from the actual completion of the work and not from the date of the acceptance cannot be maintained. This contention is based upon the assumption that the contract being a private one, no acceptance of the work was required; the charter containing no provision for the acceptance of such contracts. We do not so read the act. Its provisions with reference to street work are to be found in article 6 thereof. Subdivisions 9 and 10 of section 9, chapter 2, of that article deal with the performance of private contracts for grading and other characters of street work. It is true that nowhere in these subdivisions is there any express provision made for acceptance by the board for work done thereunder. Section 22 of chapter 1, however, provides that all work performed under article 6 must be done under the direction and to the satisfaction of the board of public works, and that the materials used must be in accordance with specifications, and also to the satisfaction of the board, and that all contracts provided for under article 6 must contain a provision to that effect. The section further provides that when work shall have been completed to the satisfaction and acceptance of the board it shall so declare by resolution, and thereupon deliver to the contractor a certificate of acceptance.

Counsel for the appellant seeks to avoid the force of this section by claiming that it applies only to public written contracts where an assessment is made, and that his contract being a private and oral one the section does not apply to it. In this behalf it is argued that the section, by requiring that contracts contain a provision that the work be done under the direction and to the satisfaction of the board, indicates by the use of the word "provision" that a written contract was intended. The section does not admit of such a construction. By the adoption of this section the manifest intention of the framers of the charter was to have the charter provisions in relation to street work form a part of all contracts for street work, public as well as private, and to place the performance of such contracts under the supervision and control of the board of public works. The contract under which the work in question was performed is not before us, but appellant agreed with the contractor to pay for his proportion of the same, and the work having been performed, upon its acceptance by the board a right of action accrued against him, and he became liable for the amount agreed upon.

[3] The claim that the contract is unlawful is based upon the assumption that no permit to perform the work was ever obtained from the board. The record shows that a permit was obtained by Raish and Clark before the work commenced, and thereafter and before its completion a renewal in modified form was had. The charter nowhere provides that the person actually performing the work must himself obtain a permit, the only requirement being that such permit be obtained. This was done.

From what we have said, it follows that the judgment should be and it is hereby affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Action by Sherman Harding against F. H. Dam and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. H. Dam, of San Francisco, for appellants. Richard Belcher, of Marysville, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of foreclosure of a mortgage dated June 27, 1913, alleged to have been executed by the defendant F. H. Dam in favor of the plaintiff to secure payment of a promissory note of the same date for $8,507.68, payable to the plaintiff on or before two years thereafter, and alleged to have been made by both of the defendants.

The conclusion we have reached on the merits of the case renders a consideration of the preliminary motion made by plaintiff to dismiss the appeal unnecessary.

Briefly stated, the history of the case is this: In the year 1904 defendant F. H. Dam purchased a parcel of real property from the plaintiff, giving in payment therefor his promissory note for $5,200 secured by mortgage on the property. Three years later, Dam having failed to pay any portion of the principal thereof or interest thereon, he gave to plaintiff a new note for $6,074 and a new mortgage. Six years later, Dam still having paid nothing on his said indebtedness, plaintiff demanded payment, and notified him that unless a settlement was made foreclosure proceedings would be commenced. Thereupon Dam sent to the plaintiff a new note and mortgage in the amount of the principal and interest then due. This note was unsatisfactory to the plaintiff and he refused to accept it. Later, after considerable negotiation, plaintiff agreed with Dam that he would accept a note executed by him and his mother, secured by a mortgage on the property described in the complaint. Thereafter, having secured the signature of his mother to such a note, Dam sent it together with the mortgage to one Ray Manwell, who was the attorney for plaintiff, with instructions to deliver them to the plaintiff upon receipt by him for Dam of the outstanding note and a duly acknowledged satisfaction of the mortgage which had been given to secure the same. These instructions, however, it seems were not strictly carried out by Manwell, with the result that while plaintiff received the present note and mortgage Dam has never received back the prior note, nor was the satisfaction of mortgage which he did receive acknowledged.

Upon these facts the defendants allege in their answer, and now contend, that there was no delivery of the note and mortgage in suit, and that the same are wholly without consideration.

[1, 2] While it appears, as just stated, that Manwell was the attorney for plaintiff, nevertheless it must be held upon the facts related that he was also in effect the agent of the defendants for the purpose of making delivery of the note and mortgage; and the record failing, as it does, to show that plaintiff ever knew or was advised of the condition under which Manwell was to make delivery of the documents, we entertain no doubt that the breach of the condition by Manwell, defendants' agent, is no defense to the action under the circumstances of this case. The record is silent as to why the previous note was not returned, and no reason or object has been suggested why plaintiff should have retained it. Its retention was probably an inadvertence, as doubtless was a clerical error in the satisfaction of mortgage, and the failure to acknowledge the same. Moreover, although Dam must have known that the present note and mortgage had been delivered, it appears that he made no serious complaint concerning the failure of the plaintiff to return the prior instruments until the present note became due and this action was commenced. We are of the opinion that the delivery of the documents was valid, and, taken with the acceptance thereof by the plaintiff, amounted under the attending circumstances to an extinguishment of the prior obligation for which they were given in renewal, and that such extinguishment constituted a valuable consideration for the present note and mortgage.

There is no merit in defendants' position that plaintiff obtained these instruments through fraud or deceit, or in the claim that the findings of the court do not respond to the issues framed by the pleadings.

HARDING v. DAM et al. (Civ. 2406.)

1. Stipulations 🔑14(12)—Sale of Property—Agreement of Counsel.

Correspondence between defendant and counsel for plaintiff in a mortgage foreclosure action held to constitute an agreement to refrain from proceeding with the sale of property only pending the necessary steps to perfect defendant's appeal, and the fixing of stay bond, and not to stay execution for a period longer than necessary therefor.

2. Mortgages 🔑529(10) — Foreclosure — Sale of Property — Adequacy of Price — Evidence.

Notwithstanding the testimony of one witness that the mortgaged property was sold at an inadequate price, evidence including the fact that it was sold at a public and advertised execution sale held sufficient proof that the sale was for a fair and adequate price.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Action by Sherman Harding against F. H. Dam and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion to set aside a sale of the mortgaged premises, and the deficiency judgment, defendants appeal. Order affirmed.

F. H. Dam, of San Francisco, for appellants. Richard Belcher, of Marysville, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by defendants from an order refusing to vacate a sale of mortgaged premises and a deficiency judgment, and to recall a certificate of sale and an execution, in a foreclosure suit.

Prior to April 29, 1916, a judgment of foreclosure had been entered against the defendants, and on that date defendant F. H. Dam, contemplating an appeal, and being himself an attorney, wrote on that day to Richard Belcher, attorney for the plaintiff, advising him of his intention to take an appeal from such judgment, and added:

> "I expect to file my stay bond at the same time that I file my notice of appeal, and in the meantime to bring on a hearing to fix the amount of the stay bond. My understanding is that it was verbally stipulated between us that execution pending the foregoing proceedings will be stayed."

This letter was answered by Belcher on May 1, 1916, as follows:

> "I am in receipt of yours of the 29th, inclosing a copy of order extending time and notice requesting the preparation of transcript of the record. It would be useless of course for me to advertise a sale while these matters were pending, and I shall not do so."

On this same day, May 1st, Dam, evidently not having received this reply to his letter of April 29th, wrote Belcher as follows:

> "From our verbal understanding in court on the day of the hearing of a motion for a new trial I have been assuming that there is no notice of sale now running in the case of Harding v. Dam, but it just occurs to me that I had better ascertain definitely if such is the fact. If notice of sale is now being published, please wire me to-morrow, at my expense, the name of the newspaper and date noticed for the sale, and also please mail me a printed slip containing copy of the notice."

To this letter no reply was deemed necessary, nor was any made, and at the time no notice of sale was being published. Thereafter, on June 2, 1916, upon notice and hearing the court fixed the amount of the undertaking staying execution at $2,000. Twenty-eight days later, on June 30th, no undertaking having been filed by the defendants, the commissioner theretofore appointed by the court commenced the publication of notice of sale, and made a sale of the property on the 25th day of July, 1916. Plaintiff was the only bidder at the sale, and purchased the property for the sum of $9,500. This being $2,000 less than the amount of the judgment against the defendants, a deficiency judgment for $2,000 was entered at once, whereupon execution was issued and levied upon certain property belonging to the defendants. On August 3d the defendants filed an undertaking on appeal in the amount specified by the court in its order of June 2d. Thereafter, on the 14th day of August, 1916, defendants filed an application to set aside the sale of the mortgaged premises and the deficiency judgment, and to recall the certificate of sale and execution. This application was heard, and on the 14th day of September the court made an order staying the execution of the judgment, but denying the motion to set aside the sale of the mortgaged premises and the deficiency judgment.

On this appeal the defendants contend that under the facts narrated they were lulled into a sense of false security by the letter from Belcher, and that the plaintiff bought the property at a grossly inadequate price.

[1] Assuming that the application was properly made, it appears plain from the correspondence referred to, we think, that all that Belcher agreed to do at the most was to refrain from proceeding with a sale of the property pending the taking by defendants of the necessary steps to perfect their appeal and the fixing by the court of the amount of a stay bond. Therefore, when, 28 days after the amount of the stay bond had been fixed by the court, no such bond had been filed, and the indebtedness upon which the suit was brought having accumulated during a period of 12 years, during which time no payment by defendants of any kind had been made, the latter were entirely without grounds for anticipating that the plaintiff would voluntarily and without request extend any further courtesy. However that may be, it is certain that plaintiff proceeded strictly within his rights, and the situation of defendants is due entirely to their own inadvertence.

[2] With respect to the claimed inadequacy of price for which the property was sold, it is true that their contention in this behalf is sustained by the testimony of one of their witnesses; but it is clear that the court did not follow the opinion of this witness, but upon consideration of the facts appearing in the case, among which was the pertinent one that upon a public, advertised sale of the property it brought only the sum of $9,500, reached the conclusion that this price was fair and adequate. Its conclusion in this regard is based upon ample evidence, and with it we have no power or disposition to interfere.

The order is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court Denying Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. In denying the petition for transfer we wish also to express our surprise and our disapprobation of some of the language used by appellants' counsel in his reference to the learned author of the opinion. He refers to the "so-called history of the case thrust to the front" by the justice who wrote the opinion, and characterizes that history as being "quite as unjust as it is irrelevant." In another part of his petition counsel asserts that "the case narrated" by the learned author of the opinion "is not the case which arose between the parties," and he concludes the petition with the sentence: "Are we not entitled to have the truth told about our case?"

Even the zeal of advocacy can scarcely excuse such language, yet we are unwilling to believe that counsel intended to reflect upon the sincerity and integrity of a member of the District Court of Appeal. For this reason we are not citing counsel for contempt, but are recording and reprehending his indiscretion as a warning to him and to others of the profession who, in the disappointment of defeat, may be tempted to forget the proprieties and the decencies of practice and to give vent to unjust reflections which in calmer moments they should not think of harboring or uttering.

KELSEY CO. v. SPEARS et al. (Civ. 1844.)

1. JUDGMENT 🔑386(8)—VACATION—TIME.

Where defendants appeared in court and formally made their motion to set aside judgment within six months after rendition, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, that the further consideration of the motion was postponed until after expiration of six months would not deprive the court of jurisdiction or defendants of any rights.

2. JUDGMENT 🔑388—ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE—NOTICE.

Where adverse party made his appearance in court at time fixed for hearing motion to set aside judgment and had an opportunity to do all that he could do under any circumstances, whether there was a formal order to show cause or notice of the order was not material.

3. JUDGMENT 🔑346—SETTING ASIDE—MISTAKE.

Although defendants' attorney was vested with general authority in the action, and defendants agreed to a compromise judgment, and authorized him to prepare a judgment according to the terms and conditions of the compromise, defendants to be permitted to examine judgment before it should be entered, where defendants did not understand or appreciate the effect or significance of the compromise judgment as explained to them by their attorney, and were not permitted to examine the judgment before it was entered, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting motion to set aside.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by the Kelsey Company against Mrs. Miriam Spears and others. From an order granting defendants' motion to set aside a judgment and decree, plaintiff appeals. Order affirmed.

F. W. Henderson and H. K. Landram, both of Merced, for appellant. F. W. Reeder, of Oakdale, for respondents.

HART, J. The appeal is by the plaintiff from an order of the superior court of Merced county entered on the 17th day of March, 1916, granting defendants' motion to set aside a judgment and decree entered on the 10th day of May, 1915. The proceeding is founded on section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The controversy arose over rights of the respective parties to the use of water for domestic and irrigation purposes. It appears from an affidavit of defendant Mrs. Spears, sworn to on November 3, 1915, that the complaint in the action was filed on September 4, 1912; that she employed F. G. Ostrander as her attorney, and an answer to the complaint was filed; that, on May 10, 1915, a decree and judgment was filed in said action, wherein it was set forth that "the parties to the foregoing action have in open court stipulated that findings of fact be waived in the foregoing action, and that judgment in said action be made and entered as herein provided"; that said defendant never at any time or place gave to said Ostrander, or any other person, authority to waive findings or stipulate to have judgment entered; that said Ostrander exceeded his authority and acted without deponent's consent in so stipulating; "that deponent did agree with F. G. Ostrander that judgment might be entered on certain conditions, that is to say, before judgment was entered a copy of said judgment was to be submitted to defendant for her approval and if not satisfactory to her the judgment was not to be filed but the trial of the case was to proceed under the pleadings; that defendant instructed F. G. Ostrander that the judgment must provide for water for domestic use at all times, also that deponent was to have all necessary water for the irrigation of all vegetables or small fruits that might be raised on deponent's said land whenever she wished to use same, also that the water flowing in the irrigation ditches of plaintiff's lands was to be allowed to flow to defendant's land when the same was not being used by plaintiff; that said decree does not provide for either or any of the above stipulations and conditions; that deponent is taken by surprise, and a great wrong and irreparable injury will result to deponent if said decree is permitted to stand; that no copy of said decree was ever submitted to deponent by her attorney or any other person until after said decree had been filed; that deponent has made repeated efforts to have her attorney, F. G. Ostrander, amend said decree to conform to deponent's stipulations and conditions," but that said Ostrander has failed and refused so to amend said decree.

On the 4th of November, 1915, the present attorney for defendants served and filed a notice of motion to set aside said judgment and decree, said notice specifying the 15th day of November, 1915, as the date upon which said motion would be made. The motion was duly made on the ground that F. G. Ostrander "exceeded his authority in having said decree entered, and that defendants are taken by surprise."

At the hearing of the motion the foregoing affidavit of Mrs. Spears, and also an affidavit of defendant Leonard Spears, containing substantially the same matters, were presented. Counter affidavits were filed, and also oral testimony presented in opposition to the motion. Among the facts brought out by the plaintiff was that, after Mrs. Spears registered her objection to the decree with her attorney, Judge Ostrander, the latter and the attorney for the plaintiff entered into a stipulation agreeing to an amendment of the decree in such manner and to such extent as that Mrs. Spears would be entitled to the use of a certain specifically named number of inches of water during the time that the decree awarded to the plaintiff the "exclusive use of the said water in said north or main ditch."

Appellant first insists that the court was without jurisdiction to set aside the decree for the reason that the application was not made within six months after the rendition of the decree, as required by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The record discloses that the decree was entered on the 10th day of May, 1915, and, on November 4, 1915, defendants filed and served their notice of motion. Thus it will be noted that the notice was filed and served six days before the expiration of the six-month period within which, under the statute, such a motion must be made. It is the contention, however, that the notice stated that the motion itself would be made on November 15, 1915, five days after the six-month period elapsed, and it further appears that the motion was not in fact made or brought up for consideration by the court until said 15th day of November, 1915.

Counsel for the appellant contend: (1) That section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure contemplates that a motion to set aside a judgment for any of the reasons set forth in said section must not only be filed and served within the period of six months after the rendition of such judgment, but that it must also be pressed to a hearing or made to the court within that period of time; (2) that the court must make an order on the adverse party to show cause on a day fixed why the motion should not be granted; (3) that the opposing party must be duly notified of such order. As to the merits of the controversy, it is contended that, under the general authority of an attorney, the attorney for the defendants was authorized to stipulate that judgment might be entered against his clients and to waive findings of fact; that an attorney is not precluded from consenting to the entry of a judgment against his client except in those cases where his authority is expressly limited by the client to do certain specific acts in the litigation; that there is no showing here that the attorney for the defendants was restricted by the latter to the performance of certain acts, or was without the general authority of an attorney in this action.

[1] 1. It is conceded by counsel for the appellant that the defendants appeared in court, and formally made their motion within the statutory time, but it appears that, after reading the motion, counsel asked that the further consideration thereof be postponed to a later date, to wit, the 15th day of November, 1915, which was after the expiration of the six-month period within which the defendants were authorized to make their application to be relieved from the consequences of the decree. The date for the hearing of the motion having accordingly been fixed for a date beyond the statutory period within which the relief sought might be asked for and granted, the result followed, so counsel for the appellant contends, that the court was divested of jurisdiction, and thus the defendants lost any right they otherwise might have had to be relieved. A sufficient and, indeed, a complete answer to this proposition may be found in the comparatively recent case of Brownell v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 703, 709, et seq., 109 Pac. 91, 94. In that case, the motion was filed and served a few days prior to the expiration of the six-month limitation, and the court made an order that the motion be heard on October 4, 1909, which was some 12 or 13 days subsequent to the date of the expiration of the period of limitation. There, as here, it was contended that the court lost jurisdiction of the motion because it was not pressed to a hearing within the statutory period of six months after the entry of the order from the effect of which relief was therein sought. Through Mr. Justice Shaw, the court held that:

> "It is the application which is to be made within the six months. A motion is an application for an order. The letter as well as the spirit of the law is fulfilled where the party appears and moves the court for the relief within that period, and thereupon the court makes an order on the adverse parties to show cause on a day fixed why the motion should not be granted, and they are duly notified thereof."

[2] 2. Thus we are brought to the consideration of the second and third propositions, as above stated, and which also involve the challenging of the authority of the court to make the order appealed from. There is, it is true, no showing in the record that the court, upon the presentation of the motion, made an order requiring the appellant to show cause, on the 15th day of November, 1913, which was the date fixed for the hearing of the motion, why said motion should not be granted, nor does the record show that a notice of any such order was served on the appellant. But it seems to us that a sufficient reply to the point thus sought to be made lies in the fact that, on the 15th day of November, 1915, the date fixed by the court for the hearing of the motion, appellant and its counsel were in court and took part in the procedings upon the motion and resisted the allowance of the application by filing counter affidavits and introducing oral testimony tending to impeach the showing made by the defendants in support of the application. Obviously, the sole purpose of an order to show cause and notice thereof to the party adversely affected by the motion as to which such order is made is to inform such "adverse party" of the time and place of the hearing of the motion, and where, as here, the "adverse party" has made his appearance in court at the time fixed for hearing the motion, and has had an opportunity to do all that he could under any circumstances do to overcome the effect of the showing made in support of the motion, it would seem that whether the court did or did not make a formal order to show cause, or whether the adverse party was or was not formally notified of the order, becomes a matter of no material importance. While we do not hold that a formal order to show cause should not in such a case be made, yet it is in point of fact true in effect that the order fixing a date for the hearing of the motion is an order to the other party to show cause. Of course, it will not be contended that the failure formally to notify the appellant of the order to show cause, if any was formally made, is of any material importance, since it is true that it had ample opportunity to defend against the allowance of the motion, it having evidently before the date fixed for the hearing procured and prepared counter affidavits and subsequently filed the same, and it having been represented by counsel in court at the time of the hearing and introduced oral proof in opposition to the allowance of the motion.

[3] 3. As to the merits of the motion, we remark that, while the proofs seem to indicate that the attorney for the defendants was vested with general authority as such in the action out of which the present controversy arises, and probably, therefore, had the authority to consent to a judgment in said action, and while, furthermore, it appears that the defendants agreed to a compromise judgment and authorized their attorney, Judge Ostrander, to prepare a judgment according to the terms and conditions of the compromise, yet there are other considerations presented by the record upon which the court could justly have concluded that the interest of justice justified the order setting aside the decree.

It is clear that the court, if it believed the testimony presented by the defendants in support of the motion, as evidently it did, was justified in finding that the defendants did not understand or appreciate the scope and effect or significance, in its practical operation, of the compromise judgment as it was explained to them by their attorney. The latter undoubtedly acted in good faith with the defendants, and honestly advised them as to the extent to which they were, under the facts as he had learned them, entitled to the use of the water flowing in the main ditch; but the defendants, as the proofs clearly enough show, in good faith supposed or believed, from the explanation made to them by the lawyer, that they were, under the compromise, to be awarded a greater quantity of water or a greater use thereof than the decree as entered allowed them. It also appears that it was understood between the defendants and their attorney that the former should be shown the decree and permitted to examine it before it should be entered, and that this was not done. Under all these circumstances, we cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the motion. We do not believe that a litigant should be bound by a compromise made by his attorney where, as here, the facts upon which the compromise was effected were not understood by the litigant, or where the latter obtained a misapprehension or an erroneous impression of the effect and scope of the compromise as the same was explained to him by his attorney. The court in this case, having examined and fully considered the testimony presented both for and against the motion, obviously reached the conclusion that the defendants did not in point of fact consent to the compromise of which the decree as entered stood as evidence; that the defendants were not given, but should have been given, an opportunity to examine the decree before it was entered, and so allowed an opportunity to determine for themselves whether the decree corresponded with the terms of the compromise as they understood and intended them; and that, therefore, in the interest of justice, the decree should be set aside and the defendants given an opportunity to have the respective rights of themselves and the plaintiff tried and adjudicated. We repeat that we can see no abuse of discretion in the action of the court in granting the motion.

It is true that the proofs show without conflict that, upon objection being made by the defendants to the decree as filed, respective counsel for the plaintiff and the defendants agreed to an amendment to the decree which it appears would make more specific and award to the defendants greater rights in the water involved in the controversy than did the original decree. But the defendants deny that they consented to the amendment, and declare that they do not now agree to it. It may be observed that the fact of the agreement to the amendment by the appellant is evidence of the fact that it conceded that the original decree failed to give the defendants their full rights in the use of the water, and in a measure supports the conclusion that the court below did not abuse its discretion in making the order appealed from.

The order is affirmed.

SKELLY et al. v. COWELL et al. (Civ. 2393.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 13, 1918.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⚿152(6) — RIGHTS IN WATER—PRESCRIPTION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In action for admeasurement of waters of creek between riparian proprietors, burden to establish all elements of prescriptive right rests on defendants, claiming prescriptive title to water.

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⚿137—PRESCRIPTIVE RIGHT—CHARACTER OF USER.

Where riparian owner used water of creek, or a large part of it, when he needed it, but not regularly, sometimes letting it go down the creek, his user was not such as to establish a prescriptive right.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by James D. Skelly and others against S. H. Cowell and others and E. N. Torello. From the judgment, which was but partially in their favor, Cowell and others appeal. Affirmed.

Mastick & Partridge, Peter F. Dunne, and W. I. Brobeck, all of San Francisco, for appellants. H. A. Van C. Torchiana and Wm. A. Kelly, both of San Francisco, for plaintiffs-respondents. John F. Davis, of San Francisco, and Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for defendant-respondent.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. The parties to this action own lands riparian to Dennison creek, a small stream rising on the western front of the Santa Cruz mountains in San Mateo county, and flowing westward through the lands of the parties to the ocean. The appellants' lands—which we will call the Cowell properties—lie below those of the respondent Torello and above those of the plaintiffs on the stream. The action was begun by plaintiffs and respondents John D., A. G., and Edward D. Skelly, Mrs. Skelly Therkoff, Mrs. Josephine Valencia, Debenedetti, and Deneri against the defendants Torello and the Cowells to have the waters of Dennison creek admeasured between the parties according to their respective rights thereto as riparian proprietors. The parties stipulated that the minimum flow of the stream was 62 miners' inches, and the court, basing its decision upon the respective riparian acreage capable of irrigation owned by each of the parties, adjudged that the Cowells have 14 inches of this water, and divided the remaining 48 inches among the other parties.

[1] The Cowells claim all the water in their pleadings, basing their claim upon prescription arising out of an adverse user, which they are asserted to have exercised for a period of 15 years before the beginning of this action. The court found against this claim and determined that during three years only preceding the action had the Cowells diverted more than their legitimate respective part of said water onto their said riparian lands. The court also found against the claim of the Cowells that their user of the water was open, notorious, continuous, and adverse. The question whether these findings are sustained by the evidence is the only question in this case. A statement of the Cowells' present contention makes this clear. They now contend that they are entitled, first, to 11 inches of the water by reason of their riparian rights, and, second, to a prescriptive title to 20 inches additional. Their claim to 11 inches as riparian owners is not disputed, and the court awarded them this part of the water in the judgment. Their claims of a prescriptive title are disputed. The burden of establishing by evidence all the elements of a prescriptive right rests upon the Cowells, of course, and if they have not established such prescription by a preponderance of the evidence then these findings must stand.

[2] It is undisputed that during some 15 years preceding the beginning of this action the Cowells and Henry Cowell, their predecessor in interest, maintained a bedrock dam in Dennison creek by which water was diverted to the Cowell properties for use in irrigation. The witnesses on behalf of the Cowells testified varyingly that by means of this dam from one-half to three-quarters of the stream was taken out, and that the remainder of the water continued down the creek. One of them stated that at times all the water was taken. This water was not taken out continuously, but was used when needed. On the other hand, James D. Skelly testified that for 36 years himself and his family had been using the water, and that during the year immediately preceding the beginning of the action there was a shortage of water due to the people above, Torello and the Cowells, using nearly all of it. Mrs. J. A. Valencia testified that for 25 years she had used water from the creek to irrigate her land, and that during only the year or two before she gave her testimony was there a shortage of water for her use. Debenedetti testified that he had been deprived of the water for three or four years, and before that had always had plenty of water. Other witnesses for the plaintiffs gave similar testimony, and some of the Cowell witnesses testified under cross-examination that Cowell used some of the water pretty much every month but not regularly; that sometimes he used it when he needed it, and sometimes he let it go down the creek. The fact seems to be that Henry Cowell used the water or a large part of it, when he needed it, but never in such a way as to deprive his neighbors lower on the stream of the use of it according to their rights.

These facts above recited show no necessary conflict of the evidence in this case. It may be possible to so construe it as to make it appear to be conflicting, but a fair interpretation of the evidence, reading the whole voluminous record with care, discloses nothing that to the open mind is a contradiction in the facts to which the witnesses testify; nor do these facts establish the elements necessary to support a prescriptive right to this water in accordance with the contention of the Cowells. There was nothing in the manner in which Henry Cowell used this water which would put his neighbors upon notice that he claimed to be using the water in such a way as to interfere with their rights. To be more specific, Cowell's conduct was not such as to indicate that he claimed all the water of this creek or 14 or 20 miners' inches of it, continuously, and adversely to the rights of his riparian neighbors.

The facts above set forth would not have sustained, in our view, findings other than the findings which the court made upon them. Indeed, it seems to us, from a review of the circumstances of this case, that the able and experienced trial judge who heard it could not have reached a more equitable and just conclusion than that set forth in the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

FEST v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR SONOMA COUNTY et al. (Civ. 1849.)

1. PLEADING 🔑11—EVIDENTIARY FACTS.

While some of the alleged facts may be evidentiary, it was proper for petitioner to state such facts as he deemed to constitute the waiver relied on in his petition.

2. MANDAMUS 🔑172—PARTIES—MISJOINDER.

Misjoinder of justice's court and justice thereof and superior court and judge thereof need not be considered, where justice was not served and did not appeal, and the matter may properly be heard concerning only the superior court and judge thereof.

3. MANDAMUS 🔑57(2)—ACTS AND PROCEEDINGS OF COURTS.

Mandamus was available as one of the means of determining whether the superior court was justified in dismissing petitioner's appeal from justice court for failure of sureties on undertaking on appeal to justify as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 978a.

4. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE 🔑159(13)—UNDERTAKING ON APPEAL — JUSTIFICATION OF SURETIES—WAIVER.

Where an undertaking on appeal from justice court was duly filed and notice thereof duly served, and plaintiff demanded that the sureties justify, but before day for justification stipulated that defendant appellant might justify at a time unauthorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 978a, requiring justification within five days after notice to justify, the superior court should have treated the stipulation as a waiver of justification and entertain the appeal on assumption that a sufficient undertaking had been filed.

Application for writ of mandate by Rubin Fest, prayed to be directed against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Sonoma, the Honorable Thomas C. Denny as Judge thereof, and the Justice's Court of Sonoma Township, and Joseph L. Small as Justice of the Peace of said Township. Granted.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for petitioner. C. C. Cowgill, of Sonoma, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Mandamus. Alleging the official capacity of defendants, the petition sets forth the following facts: That on December 24, 1917, in the said justice's court of Sonoma township, Sonoma county, a judgment was made and entered in an action wherein J. H. Murray was plaintiff and Rubin Fest, petitioner herein, was defendant, in favor of said plaintiff Murray and against petitioner herein for the sum of $86, claimed by said Murray to be due him as costs in an action pending wherein he was performing the duties of constable. That on January 18, 1918, petitioner duly filed and served notice of appeal, together with a sufficient undertaking on appeal, and did duly perfect an appeal from said judgment to the superior court of said county. That on January 21, 1918, said judgment creditor served notice upon petitioner that the sureties on said bond would be required to justify before said justice, and immediately thereupon petitioner notified said judgment creditor that said sureties would justify before said justice, within five days after the receipt of said notice requiring justification, to wit, on the 26th day of January, 1918, at the hour of 11 o'clock a. m. That on January 22, 1918, and after service of notice requiring justification, C. C. Cowgill, Esq., attorney for said Murray in said action, "wrote to W. F. Cowan, attorney for petitioner, stating that he would be engaged in the trial of an action in San Francisco on the 25th day of January, 1918, and thereafter in a communication over the telephone, owing to the uncertainty of whether Mr. Cowgill would return to Sonoma on the 26th day of January, 1918, to attend said justification, Mr. Cowgill thereupon consented that said justification might be continued until January 30, 1918, and pursuant thereto, said Mr.

Cowgill on the 26th day of January, 1918, caused to be filed in said justice's court a stipulation extending the time for said justification to January 30, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m. That pursuant to the provisions of section 978a of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, justification by the sureties on such an appeal bond is required to be made within five days after the service of notice requiring such justification and this petitioner and said sureties, had not said stipulation been made, were ready, able, and willing to justify within the five days required, to wit, on January 26, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m. in said court pursuant to the notice theretofore given to that effect, and would have so justified had not said stipulation been signed, and this petitioner alleges that by reason of the signing of said stipulation and the filing thereof by said judgment creditor, his right to require a justification of said sureties within said five days was waived." That petitioner did not justify at the time specified in said stipulation because said court would have no jurisdiction to entertain said matter after a period of five days had expired, "but petitioner, however, did in good faith and in an attempt to comply with said stipulation, file a bond on appeal executed by a reliable and solvent surety company" (this bond was filed January 28, 1918). That on or about February 11, 1918, said Murray moved the said superior court for an order dismissing said appeal "on the ground solely that the sureties on the original undertaking on appeal in said action had not justified within five days or within the time required by section 978a of the Code of Civil Procedure," and thereafter said Thos. C. Denny, judge of said superior court, made an order dismissing said appeal. That said court and said judge "do now refuse to proceed with the hearing of said trial or to hear or determine the same upon its merits."

There are averments in the petition to the effect that said justice of the peace threatens to issue execution on said judgment and cause the same to be levied on the property of petitioner. But the writ was not served upon said justice of the peace and he has not answered or appeared.

Respondent Judge Denny appeared and moved to strike out the averments of the petition relating to the filing of said stipulation on the ground that they are evidentiary and not ultimate facts. He also interposed a demurrer on the grounds: (1) That there is a misjoinder of parties; (2) that several causes of action have been improperly united; (3) that the petition is ambiguous; (4) that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

In his answer, respondent Denny admits most of the averments of facts. As to the alleged stipulation, "alleges that C. C. Cowgill, attorney for plaintiff at the request of W. F. Cowan, attorney for defendant and not otherwise, signed said stipulation; but denies that by reason of said stipulation or otherwise or at all, plaintiff waived the justification of the sureties on said undertaking." On information and belief, denies the averments of the petition that said sureties were ready, able, and willing to justify as alleged in the petition and denied that they would have appeared and justified but for said stipulation; alleges "that on the 27th day of February, 1918, defendant Hon. Thos. C. Denny, as judge of said superior court, duly made an order dismissing defendant's appeal to said superior court in the case of J. B. Murray v. Rubin Fest, and said order has not been modified, set aside or repealed, but remains in full force and effect."

[1] The matters sought by the motion to be stricken from the petition were the averments of facts on account of which the waiver mentioned in the petition is claimed. While some of the alleged facts may be evidentiary, we think it was proper to state such as might in petitioner's view constitute a waiver.

[2, 3] The misjoinder of parties alleged as ground of demurrer need not be considered. The justice of the peace named as a defendant was not served with the writ and has not appeared. The matter may properly be heard as concerning only the superior court and the judge thereof. We think mandamus was available to petitioner as one of the means by which the question may be determined. Clay v. Superior Court, 32 Cal. App. 190, 162 Pac. 416.

The points urged by respondent, in support of his general demurrer, are so closely related to his argument upon the merits that we think it best to dispose of the case on its merits as disclosed by the facts.

[4] Did the stipulation to fix the date on which to justify on the bond have the effect to waive justification? The stipulation signed by the attorney of plaintiff in the action reads as follows:

> "It is hereby stipulated and agreed that the defendant and appellant herein may have until and including January 30, 1916, in which to justify on the bond on appeal given herein."

Section 978a of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

> "The undertaking on appeal must be filed within five days after the filing of the notice of appeal and notice of the appeal and notice of the filing of the undertaking must be given to the respondent."

Admittedly this was done. The section also provides that:

> "The adverse party may except to the sufficiency of the sureties within five days after the filing of the undertaking, and unless they or other sureties justify before the justice or judge within five days thereafter, upon notice to the adverse party, to the amounts stated in their affidavits, the appeal must be regarded as if no such undertaking had been given."

It has been held that justification of the sureties must be made within five days after notice served, otherwise the superior court has no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal. Crowley v. Superior Court, 10 Cal. App. 342, 101 Pac. 935; Coker v. Superior Court, 58 Cal. 177. It has also been held that the party excepting to the sufficiency of the sureties may waive his objection, but the waiver must be made within the five days required for the justification. Crowley v. Superior Court, supra; Budd v. Superior Court, 14 Cal. App. 256, 111 Pac. 628; Fletcher Collection Agency v. Superior Court, 31 Cal. App. 193, 159 Pac. 1049; Clay v. Superior Court, 32 Cal. App. 189, 162 Pac. 416. As we understand the Crowley and Budd Cases, the justification must be made within five days after notice of exception to the sureties on appeal bond has been filed in the justice's court, but not within five days after notice of appeal and filing of the undertaking. In the present case, the notice excepting to sureties was filed December 21, 1916. December 26, 1916, was therefore the last day on which the sureties could justify. Justification was not effected on that day, and, the record so appearing when the motion to dismiss the appeal was made, the judge of the superior court granted the motion on the ground of lack of jurisdiction to try the case.

The contention of petitioner is that, in stipulating that the justification would be made at a date when it would have been futile and of no effect, plaintiff in the action waived justification. The argument is thus stated by petitioner:

> "It is apparent that appellant would have caused justification thereof to be made had not respondent consented that it be made at another time and place. Respondent was the only person who could require justification and he was the only person who could forego justification. Respondent in effect said to appellant, you must justify in the manner required by law, but before that time had expired, by virtue of his stipulation he in effect said, you need not justify in the manner required by law but you can justify at another time and place, to wit, a time and place over which the court had no jurisdiction. * * * At the time of filing the stipulation, respondent had the legal right to waive the justification and when he stated to appellant that he need not justify (which is the effect of the stipulation) it certainly must be construed as a waiver."

Respondent, quoting from volume 28, Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 526, says:

> "Waiver is usually a question of intent, and knowledge of the right and an intent to waive it must be made to appear plainly, and this is to be determined usually from the declarations and conduct of the parties."

It is quite likely that plaintiff's attorney did not intend to waive justification. His appearance at the office of the justice of the peace on December 30th, in accordance with the stipulation would seem to indicate such to be the fact. Still he was the moving party in the matter for whose convenience the delay was asked and it was upon his stipulation filed in the case that the date was fixed at a time when justification would have been a nugatory act and the superior court would have been authorized and it was its duty to disregard it and look only to the date when the bond was in fact filed and notice thereof given. The stipulation fixed a time when it was legally impossible to justify, and it seems to us was in legal effect a waiver and that defendant had the right to treat it as a waiver of plaintiff's right to require justification.

To put the matter briefly as it was before the superior court and as the record shows: An undertaking was filed on its face in due form and duly executed and notice thereof served; plaintiff demanded that the sureties justify; before the day arrived for justification, plaintiff filed a stipulation that defendant might justify at a time unauthorized by the statute. Such being the facts, the superior court could not do otherwise than to treat the stipulation as a waiver and entertain the appeal on the assumption that a sufficient undertaking had been filed.

Let the writ issue commanding the said superior court to set the said cause of Murray v. Fest for trial on its merits and proceed with the trial thereof.

PENRYN LAND CO. v. AKAHORI.

(Civ. 1835.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑957(2)—REVIEW OF ORDER VACATING DEFAULT JUDGMENT.

Appellate courts are strongly inclined to uphold an order of the trial court vacating its default judgment on the ground of mistake and excusable neglect of defendant if there be found in the record any legal justification for the action of the trial court.

2. JUDGMENT 🔑143(1) — VACATION OF DEFAULT—INNOCENT PURCHASER.

When the orderly processes of law have been followed, and default judgment regularly obtained, there must be some substantial evidence received to excuse, in a legal sense, the inaction of defendant before the court will set it aside, especially where an innocent purchaser, relying on the judgment, has acquired the property involved for a valuable consideration.

3. JUDGMENT 🔑143(3) — VACATION OF DEFAULT—MISTAKE OR EXCUSABLE NEGLECT.

Where defendant administrator, served with summons in an action to quiet title to his decedent's realty, being very busy, merely glanced at the paper, and, seeing that it pertained to decedent's estate, placed it on the desk of the attorney for the estate, there was no mistake or excusable neglect on the part of the administrator justifying vacation of default judgment against him.

4. JUDGMENT 🔑143(10) — VACATION OF DEFAULT—MISTAKE OR EXCUSABLE NEGLECT OF ATTORNEY.

In the absence of showing of mistake or negligence, excusable or otherwise, on the part of the attorney for the estate, on whose desk the summons was left, the presumptions being that he was capable and honest, and gave his attention to the business, and after consultation with defendant administrator was convinced there was no valid defense to the action, there was no justification for setting aside default judgment against the administrator on the ground of the mistake or excusable neglect of the attorney.

5. JUDGMENT ⚷143(3) — VACATION OF DEFAULT—FAILURE TO STATE FACTS TO ATTORNEY.

Where an administrator was served with copy of the complaint and summons in an action to quiet title to his decedent's realty, and gave the papers to the attorney for the estate, but failed to state the facts to him, such failure was inexcusable negligence on the part of the administrator, in the absence of any satisfactory explanation of his conduct, though he never consented to entry of a default, and intrusted the entire matter to the attorney.

6. JUDGMENT ⚷143(10) — VACATION OF DEFAULT—MISTAKE.

That an attorney was mistaken in his judgment that it was useless to make a defense to the action is not the kind of a mistake for which a default judgment can be set aside under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, though it might be the basis for an independent action for damages against the attorney.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by the Penryn Land Company, a corporation, against M. B. Akahori, as administrator of the estate of M. Mukai, deceased. From an order vacating default judgment for plaintiff, it appeals. Reversed.

Ben P. Tabor, of Auburn, for appellant.
Tuttle & Tuttle, of Auburn, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. [1, 2] The appeal is from an order vacating a judgment quieting plaintiff's title to certain real estate. The order was made upon the ground of "the mistake and excusable neglect" of the defendant. Appellate courts are strongly inclined to uphold such an order if there be found in the record any legal justification for the action of the lower court. It is desirable, of course, to have causes tried and determined upon their merits, and, no doubt, this consideration was the determining factor with the lower trial judge herein. However, when the orderly processes of law have been followed and a judgment regularly obtained, there must be some substantial evidence received to excuse, in a legal sense, the inaction of the defendant before the court will be justified in setting at naught its prior determination, especially in a case where, as here, an innocent purchaser, relying upon the validity of said judgment, has acquired the property for a valuable consideration.

We may say that the first application was denied, but respondent was allowed to renew it. The latter application was based largely upon the same evidence as the first. The two affidavits of respondent herein, however, differ somewhat. As the only evidence tending to show mistake or excusable neglect is found in said affidavits, we herewith set them out. The first is:

"I am and was at all times mentioned the duly appointed, qualified, and acting administrator of the estate of M. Mukai, deceased; that on or about the 2d day of December, 1915, I was served with a paper by the sheriff of Sacramento county; that I was in the courthouse in Sacramento at the time, and very busy; that I glanced at said paper, saw it was pertaining to the estate of M. Mukai, deceased, and took it to the attorney for said estate, Lee Gebhart, and, as he was very busy at the time, left it on his desk; that I did not open said paper or look at its contents, and did not know that it was a complaint to quiet title to the property of the estate of M. Mukai, deceased; that I never knew such an action was pending until Nakamoto, of Penryn, rang me up after the judgment was made and informed me of the fact; that I would have defended said action if I had known that it was pending."

Then follows the statement that he has a good defense to the action.

[3] It is quite apparent that the foregoing affords no legal justification for setting aside the default. Nothing in the nature of mistake or excusable neglect is disclosed. If either existed, it must have been on the part of the defendant or of his attorney. As to the former, the only semblance of mistake relates to his ignorance of the nature of the document placed in his hands and of the fact that a judgment was entered against him. But there is no contention that he did not understand English; and, if he failed to read the summons he cannot urge that as an excuse for his failure to defend the action. That circumstance would constitute negligence rather than mistake, and, assuming it to be negligence, it would be inexcusable, and no attempt was made to excuse it. In fact, however, he did what might be expected under the circumstances; he placed the papers in the hands of his attorney. This was, no doubt, because he had faith in his attorney, and that fact does not afford any evidence of mistake or negligence.

[4] Was there any mistake or negligence, excusable or otherwise, on the part of the attorney? There is no showing to that effect. To the contrary, the presumptions are all that the attorney was capable and honest; that he gave his attention to the business in hand, that after consultation with his client he was convinced that there was no valid defense to the action, and that no additional expense should be incurred. If there had been any showing that the client was deceived or defrauded by his attorney, or that the latter did not act in good faith, it might be that a court in a proceeding like this could nullify his action, but the case thus far is one entirely devoid of any element of fraud, mistake, negligence, or surprise in the legal sense, and we see no reason for the application of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[5] Is the situation changed by virtue of the second affidavit of the respondent? The only additional averment contained therein bearing upon the question before us is:

"That at all times since my appointment to said office Lee Gebhart has been my attorney and handled the legal matters pertaining to said estate; that I had the utmost confidence in said Lee Gebhart, and, not being versed in legal procedure in this country, intrusted all matters to him to handle as he deemed best; that I never did talk over the above case with Lee Gebhart as he deposes, and never consented to the entry of the default in said case, and as soon as I heard that a default had been entered in said case, I procured other counsel to move to have the default set aside."

In this there is no additional fact tending to show any mistake on the part of respondent or any negligence, except, possibly, in one respect to be hereafter noticed. Neither is there anything to disclose a mistake on the part of the attorney or any negligence that can be corrected in a proceeding like this. In fact, he exculpates himself on the ground that he intrusted the entire matter to his attorney. That circumstance, of course, does not evidence negligence or mistake on his part. It was, indeed, justified by his confidence in his attorney. And as far as the latter is concerned, there is nothing to indicate that he was unworthy of that confidence, unless it be implied in the statement in reference to the conversation with said attorney and as to the consent to have a default entered. As to the conversation, Mr. Gebhart deposes:

"On or about the 2d day of December, 1915, and while acting as attorney for said Akahori in the matter of the estate of Mukai, said Akahori brought to my office a copy of the complaint and summons in the above-entitled action, which he said had been served upon him. I read the complaint and summons, talked with Akahori about the matter, and advised him, after learning the facts of the case, that in my opinion it was inadvisable to defend the action. Subsequently, and before default was entered in the case, Mr. Tabor, the attorney for plaintiff in said action, called at my office, and I informed him that no defense would be made to the action."

It is to be observed that respondent's denial of this is somewhat equivocal. He does not specifically aver that he had no conversation whatever about the case with his attorney, but that he did not have the conversation as Mr. Gebhart deposes. This denial would be consistent with the position that the conversation occurred substantially as stated by Mr. Gebhart. However, conceding full effect to the denial, and ignoring the improbability that a client, under such circumstances, would have no conversation with his attorney about the case, it must follow that the failure of respondent to state the facts was inexcusable negligence on his part, in the absence of any satisfactory explanation of his conduct.

The averment that "he never consented to the entry of a default" is of no avail in view of the fact that he admits that he intrusted the entire matter to his attorney, involving, as it would, the question of discretion as to whether any defense should be made.

We repeat, if there was any mistake or negligence in the case, it was that of the attorney, and not of the client, except as to the single fact of the failure to explain the defense, and this has not been excused.

[6] But there is nothing to show that the attorney did not have full information from other sources as to the alleged defense of respondent, or that he did not act with the utmost good faith for the advantage of his client. In fact, there is no averment from which the inference can be drawn that the attorney's conduct in the premises was the result of "mistake, inadvertence. surprise, or excusable neglect," as contemplated by said section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. At most, it may be implied that he was mistaken in his judgment that it was useless to make a defense to the action. This, however, is not the kind of a mistake for which a judgment can be set aside, although it might be the basis for an independent action for damages against the attorney. Lally v. Kuster, 171 Pac. 961.

To recapitulate, the whole showing made by respondent amounts to this: An action was brought against him to quiet title. He placed the matter in the hands of his attorney. There is nothing to impeach the character or ability of said attorney. There is no evidence that either he or his attorney was deceived or misled. The only circumstance of which complaint could be made by respondent is that his attorney's judgment was at fault in concluding that he had no valid defense. But this, manifestly, is not sufficient ground for setting aside the judgment. Otherwise, every suit that is lost through the error or mistake of an attorney would be subject to the operation of said section 473. For further elucidation of the legal principles involved, we may refer to Porter v. Anderson, 14 Cal. App. 716, 113 Pac. 345; Redding, etc., Min. Co. v. National Surety Co., 18 Cal. App. 488, 123 Pac. 544; Shearman v. Jorgensen, 106 Cal. 483, 39 Pac. 863; Alferitz v. Cahen, 145 Cal. 397, 79 Pac. 878.

If we look into the showing made by appellant we find additional reasons for upholding the judgment. Not only is the theory of the application of said section of the Code strongly combated, but it is shown, as before indicated, that the rights of an innocent purchaser, who relied upon the integrity of said judgment, would be jeopardized if the order is allowed to stand.

Respondent may have a remedy if he has been wronged, but it does not appear that he is entitled to the one which he has invoked.

The order is reversed.

PARK et al. v. PACIFIC FIRE EXTINGUISHER CO. et al. (Civ. 2329.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 1, 1918. Rehearing Denied June 27, 1918; Denied by Supreme Court June 27, 1918.)

1. Statutes 🔑123(3)—Titles of Acts—Subjects Embraced—"Work."

Const. art. 4, § 24, providing that every act shall embrace but one subject which shall be embraced in its title, is not violated by St. 1911, p. 730, entitled an act to provide for work upon streets, where section 79, subd. 2 thereof, defines "work" as including all work mentioned in the act and it was intended to include street lighting systems.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Work.]

2. Municipal Corporations 🔑266 — Improvement Acts—Repeal by Implication.

The Improvement Act (St. 1911, p. 730), relating alone to improvement of streets and places within incorporated cities, was not repealed by implication by Public Utilities Act (St. 1913, pp. 421, 429), covering the acquisition of public utilities.

3. Municipal Corporations 🔑272—Streets—Lighting Systems—Procedure.

Where a city has not provided a complete procedure for the creation of a street lighting system as empowered to do by its charter, it may proceed under Improvement Act (St. 1911, p. 730), providing for street improvements.

4. Constitutional Law 🔑289—Due Process—Taking Private Property for Public Use.

A local improvement for installation of electroliers and a conduit system for the purpose of lighting, cost to be charged on property within district, providing for temporary physical connection with a public utility company's lines, does not violate Const. U. S. Amend. 14, § 1; it not becoming the property of the utility company.

5. Municipal Corporations 🔑293(2) — Streets — Improvements — Resolutions — Sufficiency.

A resolution of intention for improvement not naming the streets to be improved, providing work to be done according to certain designated specifications which do not name such street but refer to plans attached thereto which bear a legend designating colors by which proposed improvements can be located, does not comply with St. 1911, p. 733, § 3, providing that the resolution of intention shall refer to the streets to be improved by official or popular name.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Joe M. Park and others against the Pacific Fire Extinguisher Company, the City of Berkeley, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Richard B. Bell, of Berkeley (R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. Wilson & Haines and Frank D. Stringham, all of San Francisco, and B. D. Marx Greene, of Berkeley, for respondents.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. In this case the plaintiffs resist the action of the city of Berkeley in ordering the improvement of certain streets of that city by the construction and installation of electroliers and a conduit system for the purpose of lighting its streets. The specific relief sought is injunction pendente lite against the performance of a contract let for the above purpose, and a final judgment that this contract is void. The judgment of the trial court was for the defendants, and this appeal is from that judgment on the judgment roll consisting of the complaint, answer, findings, and judgment.

The work was to be done under the improvement Act of 1911 and its amendments (St. 1911, p. 730) and in accordance with specifications previously adopted by the city council generally covering such work. A resolution of intention, adopted by the council on December 3, 1915, provided that 232 electroliers be installed within the limits of a district fully described, the cost of the improvement to be made a charge upon the property within the district, and that the electroliers be wired and connected by the underground system of conduits with the electric distributing system used for the lighting of the streets of Berkeley, the work to be done in accordance with the specifications above referred to and adopted by a resolution of the council. These specifications were referred to in the resolution of intention by number, and were by the language thereof specifically incorporated therein and made a part thereof; and the resolution also provided that the work be done in accordance with the Improvement Act of 1911 and its amendments, as above stated. The specifications described the work to be done more definitely and more at length than the resolution of intention, but they do not add anything to its provisions except that they provide for the connection of the lighting system of the city with the Pacific Gas & Electric Company's lines.

The findings were in accordance with the complaint, determining the foregoing facts as therein alleged except as to the posting of notices of the improvement and the affidavit of posting, which in the view we take need not be noticed.

The trial court held the contract valid.

[1] The first objection relied upon by the appellants is that the improvement described in the resolution of intention is not authorized by the Improvement Act of 1911 as amended.

Section 2 of that act, under which the city of Berkeley undertakes to do this work, if valid, empowered the city council to order the construction or reconstruction upon its streets of poles, posts, wires, pipes, conduits, lamps, and other suitable or necessary appliances for the purpose of lighting its streets. This, it is claimed, is repugnant to the provisions of section 24, art. 4, of the Constitution to the effect that every act of the Legislature shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be embraced in its title. The specific ground of the objection under consideration is that the act describes all the work therein contemplated as street work, and that the work provided for by this resolution of intention is neither street work nor street improvement. The title of that act in so far as it is involved here is this: "An act to provide for work in and upon streets," etc.; and if the word "work" as used in the act does not include this species of improvement the contract in issue here must be held invalid. Counsel cites a number of cases in some of which at least it is held that street work does not include the installation of a lighting system. Typical of those cases is Electric Light Co. v. San Bernardino, 100 Cal. 348, 34 Pac. 819, wherein it is held that the term "street work" is a phrase in common usage and has a well-defined meaning, and, says the court in that case, "the words mean exactly what they indicate upon their face, namely, work upon a street, work in repairing or making a street"; and it was there held that the installation of an electric lighting system, differing considerably, however, from the system in question here, was not street work within the meaning of those words. The case did not arise under the statute of 1911, but under the general Municipal Incorporation Act as amended in 1891 (Stats. 1891, p. 54).

The other cases cited by appellants are of similar import. None of them, however, arose under the act of 1911; indeed, they were all decided before that year. We do not think it necessary to analyze and distinguish these cases, although this might conceivably be done, for the Legislature has in effect in the act of 1911 defined what it meant by the words in the title thereof. In subdivision 2 of section 79 of said act (Stats. 1911, p. 766) is the following provision:

> "The words 'work,' 'improve,' 'improved' and 'improvement,' as used in this act shall include all work mentioned in this act, and also the construction, reconstruction and repairs of all or any portion of said work."

Read in connection with the provisions of section 2 of the act, this provision shows clearly that the Legislature had in mind the inclusion of everything contained in section 2 thereof when it used the word "work" in its title. The purpose of section 24 of article 4 of the Constitution is to protect the members of the Legislature as well as the public against fraud from deceitful and misleading titles; and, if the title is of such a character as to mislead the public or the members of the Legislature as to the subject embraced in it, then section 24 applies. But it is not necessary that the title of an act should embrace an abstract or catalog of its contents; and, where the title of an act is not misleading, the act will not be held void simply because of the fact that its title does not so catalog or schedule every item contained therein.

These propositions are so well settled as to need no citation of authority, and indeed are quotations from numerous cases decided by the Supreme Court. That the Legislature was not misled by the use of the word "work," but intended to include a provision in the act for the installation of a street lighting system, is quite apparent from the language above quoted. The Legislature had the authority to so define the words used in the title if it chose to do so; and therefore, as it has done so and it is apparent that it had these matters in mind, the court will not hold this act unconstitutional because the Legislature did not itemize a lighting system as a part of the street work. Indeed, a lighting system is as necessary to the convenient use of streets in the present age in a city the size of Berkeley as is the pavement of the street itself; and the tearing up of the streets to place conduits therein for the purpose of laying wires for conducting electricity for lighting purposes is quite as much street work, it seems to us, as any other work upon a street.

[2] It is next contended that the Improvement Act of 1911 has been suspended by the Public Utilities Act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, pp. 421, 429). The act of 1911 covers street improvement alone. That of 1913 covers the acquisition of public utilities. As these two purposes are intimately connected with each other, the provisions of the latter statute overlap the former, but they are not so inconsistent with it as to repeal it; and they are certainly not so repugnant that it must be held that the Public Utilities Act of 1913 repealed the Improvement Act of 1911 by implication. There is, indeed, a strong reason for concluding that the Legislature had no such intention when it enacted the Public Utilities Act, for in that act it expressly repealed the Improvement Act of 1905 (St. 1905, p. 564), and at the same time failed to mention the Improvement Act of 1911. It must therefore be concluded that the Legislature intended to repeal the act of 1905, but did not intend to repeal the act of 1911.

The appellants next contend that the city of Berkeley had exclusive authority to provide for the lighting of its streets as a municipal affair under charter provisions, and that therefore the Improvement Act of 1911 does not apply to that city.

[3] Street lighting is a municipal affair; but the charter of the city of Berkeley, while conferring power upon the city to adopt a complete procedure for the creation of a system of street lighting, does not contain such a procedure. This is conceded. The city has power to provide such general scheme; but, not having done so, it is governed by general law in that respect, and may in this case follow the provisions of the Improvement

Act of 1911. Fragley v. Phelan, 126 Cal. 383, 58 Pac. 923.

[4] The next objection to this proceeding is that the proposed assessment for the improvement described in the resolution of intention, if made, would violate the Constitution of the United States. It is claimed that it will constitute a part and parcel of the public utility now owned and controlled by a public service corporation, namely, the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, mentioned in the resolution of intention. But this does not appear to be so. It seems to us that the proposed improvement will become the property of the city of Berkeley, and that the only connection that it has with the Pacific Gas & Electric Company is a physical connection with that company's lines for temporary convenience. We do not see that this in any way violates section 1 of article 14 of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

[5] The final attack upon this contract and the proceeding upon which it is based is grounded upon the following considerations: It is provided in section 3 of the Improvement Act of 1911 that before ordering any work to be done or improvement made the council shall pass a resolution of intention so to do, "referring to the street by its lawful or official name, or the name by which it is commonly known." This resolution does not name or refer to the streets to be improved; but it is contended by the respondents that the specifications and plans for the work referred to therein do so, and that this fulfills the requirement in question. The reference relied on is in these words:

> "All the work to be done in accordance with the specifications contained in resolution adopting specifications No. 317 N. S. for the construction of single lamp or electroliers and conduit system."

The specifications do not contain the names of the streets nor any reference to them, unless the provision of the specifications that the "plans attached hereto, sheets Nos. 1, 2 and 3, are to be considered with and are hereby made a part of these specifications," are sufficient to comply with the statute. These plans are engineering prints, and are marked "Lighting District No. 1, showing location of electroliers and conduits, Berkeley, California," and they contain a legend explaining the colors by which the location of the electroliers, conduits, and other details of the work are shown.

In construing this portion of the proceeding, the purpose of the provision that the streets shall be named in the resolution of intention must be taken into account. That purpose seems to be the giving of information to the property owners as to the intention of the city council to improve the street in front of their property, or some other streets, the expense of which will be made a burden upon their property by taxation. Section 6 of the act provides that any owner of property liable to be assessed for the work may make written protest against the proposed work, or against the extent of the district to be assessed, or both, and provides the method by which such protest shall be made to the council. The method which the property owner must follow under this proceeding as above outlined in order to ascertain whether his property is to be made liable for this street improvement is first to examine the resolution of intention, which would advise him that the property within a certain district was to be taxed for a certain improvement upon certain streets; but these streets were not named in the resolution of intention, and therefore he must look further in order to ascertain upon what streets the improvement is proposed to be made. Accordingly he must consult the specifications, and in the specifications he would find nothing except a reference to a map or plan, and this map or plan is an engineering plan; while in this case, simple and comparatively easy to understand by a person in the least accustomed to reading such documents and interpreting them, it would not be easy, and perhaps would not be possible, for many persons who might own property within a district such as this in which improvements upon the streets were to be made, to ascertain by an inspection of the plan exactly what particular streets were to be improved. Indeed, this plan only purports to show the approximate location of certain portions of this work, namely, the feeder risers; and if it can be held that the reference herein is sufficient, and that these plans in themselves were notice of the points at which this improvement was to be made, a plan approximating the location of all the work might be sufficient to fulfill the measure of the statutory requirement.

With the contention that this is so we cannot agree. We think that the city council should mention the streets to be improved by their lawful or official names or the names by which they are commonly known, in the resolution itself; or, at the very least, should plainly state in the specifications the names of the streets to be improved so that, without the trouble of inspecting engineering plans, the property owner might know exactly for the improvement of what streets his property is to be assessed. It seems to us that there is no excuse for not following this simple requirement of the statute; and, further, that the rule adopted in construing the Vrooman Act (St. 1885, pp. 160, 161), by which a reference in the resolution of intention to plans and specifications on file for the purpose of supplementing the general description of the work in the resolution itself, would be unduly stretched by permitting such a reference as was attempted here.

We have thought proper to consider all the points raised in view of the fact that the city council of Berkeley may still wish to proceed with this work under a resolution of intention sufficient in form for that purpose within the views herein expressed.

The judgment is reversed.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑278(1)—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—EVIDENCE.

In an action for the death of defendant's employé through fire in an asphalt shed communicated thereto by burning oil, evidence held to show actionable negligence of defendants in discharging the liquid contents of a gas seal into a ditch running near certain furnaces, whereby the oil was ignited.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑179, 204(1)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—SAFE PLACE TO WORK.

Where plaintiff's decedent lost his life by fire in defendant's asphalt shed, wherein he was employed, due to burning oil negligently poured into a ditch, without being responsible for the fire and without contributing to the accident, defendant was liable for failure to maintain a safe place to work, regardless of the origin of the fire; assumption of risk and fellow servant's negligence having been abrogated by statute.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑971(1)—DISCRETION—HYPOTHETICAL QUESTIONS.

The trial court has large discretion as to the form of hypothetical questions to experts, and the appellate court will place great reliance upon his decision in passing upon a sufficiency of the facts narrated.

4. EVIDENCE 🔑553(3, 4) — HYPOTHETICAL QUESTIONS.

A hypothetical question on which the opinion of an expert is to be based must include only such facts as are in evidence, but may include any state of facts which the evidence tends to prove and which the jury might reasonably find to be proven.

5. EVIDENCE 🔑553(4)—ACTION FOR PERSONAL INJURIES—HYPOTHETICAL QUESTIONS.

In an action for wrongful death of employé by fire in defendant's asphalt shed, communicated by burning oil negligently poured from a gas seal into a ditch and filtering through a trap, hypothetical questions as to whether inflammable oil would be condensed and formed on the water in the gas seal and as to the results if such burning oil entered the trap, held supported by the evidence.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiffs bring the action as heirs at law of Warren Graves, deceased, who was burned to death while employed by defendant and through the alleged negligence of defendant. The appeal is from the judgment on the verdict in favor of plaintiffs.

The cause of action is identical with the case of Hallawell v. Union Oil Co. (No. 1767) 173 Pac. 177, decided by this court April 3, 1918. Both Hallawell and Graves lost their lives at the same time and under identical circumstances. Each case was tried before a jury and in each plaintiffs had the verdict. The judgment in No. 1767 was affirmed. The facts and circumstances surrounding the accident causing Graves' death are fully set forth in the opinion in cause No. 1767, and need not be here repeated. The testimony of witnesses in the present case is not, nor was it at all likely to have been, literally the same as when given by the same witnesses in the Hallawell Case. But obviously, if the testimony was substantially the same in both cases and was deemed sufficient to support the verdict in favor of plaintiff in the Hallawell Case, a like verdict in the present case must also be held to have support, and the judgment should be affirmed unless some error of law crept into the case at the trial of sufficient gravity to require a reversal.

The contention of appellant here, as it was in the Hallawell Case, is: (1) That there is no proof of negligence in connection with the asphalt shed; (2) that there is no showing of causal connection between the fire in front of the stills and the fire at the asphalt shed; (3) there is no showing of negligence upon the part of defendant in connection with the fire in front of the asphalt stills. But one assignment of error is relied upon, namely, that the court erred in permitting answers to the hypothetical questions put to the witness Cooper. The present case was tried some time after the trial in the Hallawell Case, and was conducted without change of attorneys on either side. It is not likely that plaintiffs would fail to make as strong a showing in support of their contentions in the second trial as they did in the first. We think in some respects the showing is stronger.

[1] As to appellant's first point, we thought the evidence in the Hallawell Case, and we think the evidence in this case, was sufficient to establish actionable negligence in discharging the liquid contents of the gas seal onto the ground in a way to cause it to run along the ditch in front of the stills and over the ground around and near the trap and so as to quickly take fire as it did from the furnaces under the stills. This was the initial act of defendant's negligence which we held in the Hallawell Case and which we think in the present case was shown to have caused the fire at the asphalt shed. There was evidence in the present case that the inflammable oil in this fluid was seen burning within two or three feet of the trap, a foot nearer than appeared in the Hallawell Case. It was shown, too, that the temperature of this fluid was raised after it left the gas seal, as was also the water flowing in the ditch which came from the condensers, by the heat from the furnaces and by the burning oil on the surface of the fluid which came from the gas seal, and that this increased temperature would cause inflammable vapor to rise from the trap, become ignited by the flame near the trap, and thus ignite the oil in the trap on its way down to the asphalt kettles through the eight-inch pipe. We do not think it necessary to recite the evidence. In our opinion it strengthened rather than weakened the showing in the Hallawell Case.

We think, too, that the evidence tending to show a causal connection between the fire at the asphalt shed and the fire in front of the stills was equally satisfactory, if not more convincing than at the first trial. There was no evidence upon which any rational theory could be predicated that the fire started at the asphalt shed otherwise than by the burning oil carried through the eight-inch pipe. That there was negligence on the part of defendant shown in connection with the fire at the asphalt shed appeared even more strongly than at the Hallawell trial. It will be recalled that this shed was an open wooden building of size 130x150 feet, with a wooden floor, and that the asphalt kettles were at the side of the part of the building called a "lean-to"; the asphalt was drawn from the kettles through long metal nozzles into barrels; to facilitate the drawing off of the asphalt which became cooled, particularly in these spouts, the practice was to build fires of old barrel staves under these spouts and feed the fire with distillate brought in buckets—cans nailed to sticks; these fires gave off large quantities of black smoke which caused inflammable soot to fasten itself on the posts, roof, rafters, and other parts of the building, though most of these surfaces were covered with galvanized iron; the barrels, when filled, were wheeled across the floor to the platform on the west side of the building or were stored in the building; it was the custom to cover the floor with sand to absorb the asphalt spilled in moving barrels or which came from leaking barrels; this covering was often saturated with asphalt and would then be removed and fresh sand supplied in its place; around the kettles inflammable material was allowed to accumulate. The second story was used both as a workshop and for storage of barrels and barrel material, as fully described in the Hallawell Case. The rapidity with which the building was enveloped in flames and the upper story filled with suffocating smoke caused by the accummulated soot was very convincing evidence of the dangerous character of the building.

[2] We have nothing to add to what was said in our former opinion as to the unsafe place in which deceased was placed to work. Our conclusion was, and still is, that these two men lost their lives by reason of conditions with which defendant caused them to be surrounded while at work and which defendant could have avoided by the exercise of ordinary care. This conclusion may be reached in the present case, regardless of the origin of the fire, since the deceased was in no degree responsible for the fire, in no degree contributed to the accident which caused his death, and since under existing statutory law the defenses of assumption of risk and fellow servants' negligence have been abrogated.

[3] There remains to notice the alleged error of the court in permitting expert witness Cooper to answer certain hypothetical questions. There were several of these questions, and to ascertain whether or not the court erred in its rulings one must read more than 100 pages of the typewritten record. It will be observed in doing so that the court took an active and, we think, an impartial part in an endeavor to make the questions conform to the rules governing this class of testimony. In some instances alleged facts were eliminated as not proven; in other instances facts deemed essential were by leave of the court proven and afterward incorporated in the questions. Throughout this prolonged examination of the witness, defendant's objections were not only clearly made but were supported by such reasons as defendant's counsel deemed pertinent or necessary to advance, to all which the court gave attentive consideration. The court showed entire familiarity with the facts testified to, and its rulings showed a purpose to allow no question that was not fairly deducible from facts proven. The trial judge is in a position to have the circumstances far more clearly before him than the appellate court can have them. A large discretion relating to the form of the question must necessarily rest with the judge. Where many facts and circumstances, as in this case, are made the basis of the question, the appellate court is justified in placing much reliance upon the decision of the trial court in passing upon the sufficiency of the facts narrated in the question.

[4] We have given this part of the record such attention as satisfies us that no prejudicial error was committed by the court by any of its rulings upon these hypothetical questions. The rule is that:

> "A hypothetical question on which the opinion of an expert is to be based must include only such facts as are supported by evidence; but it may include any state of facts which the evidence tends to prove and which the jury > might reasonably find to be proven." 11 R. C. L. p. 575.

> "The evidential facts are usually in dispute; neither counsel nor witness knows what the jury will find to be the actual facts proven, and the witness cannot be allowed to give an opinion based on hearsay or on his own idea of what constitutes evidence. Nevertheless, each party has the right to lay before the jury the scientific inferences properly deducible from the facts which he claims to have proved, subject to the contingency that the jury shall find such facts to be as claimed. * * * The solution of this problem which has been worked out by the courts is to permit counsel to put to the expert, after his competency has been established, a question in which the things that counsel claims to have proved are stated as a hypothesis, and the witness is asked to state and explain the conclusion which, in his opinion, results. Then if the jury should find that the facts assumed in the question have been proved by the evidence, they may use the technical information and instruction obtained from the expert in determining the ultimate facts; but if they should find that the facts assumed in the question are not true, then of course the opinion based on them should be wholly disregarded." Id. 578.

Mr. Jones, in his Commentaries on Evidence, vol. 2, §§ 370, 371, says:

> "The facts are generally in dispute; and it is sufficient if the question fairly states such facts as the proof of the examiner fairly tends to establish. A question should not be rejected because it does not include all the facts, unless it thereby fails to present the case fairly. The truth of facts assumed by the question is in doubtful cases a question for the jury; and, if they find that the assumed facts are not proved they should disregard the opinions based on such hypothetical questions; and the court will so instruct them."

[5] We are quite convinced from an examination of the record that plaintiffs' counsel formulated and presented their hypothetical questions in good faith, and that they were based upon facts proven and fairly stated and upon inferences fairly deducible from the facts proven. It may be stated that the opinion of the witness, whose competency as an expert was not disputed, was sought to show whether, under the conditions stated in the question, inflammable oil would be condensed and form on the water in the gas seal. He answered it would. The contention of defendant was that no oil would be condensed in the gas seal for the reason that it was all condensed as it passed through the condensers; that witnesses had so testified; that one witness Del Monte testified that six months before the accident he had repaired the gas seal and found it necessary to empty the contents on the ground and he observed no oil. There was evidence that while the condensers were designed to precipitate practically all available oil in the gases passing into them from the stills, the process did not arrest all of it. The undisputed fact was that oil did accumulate in this gas seal after the gas had passed through the condensers, and when the contents of the gas seal ran into the trench and on the ground around the trap it quickly took fire. It was oil that burned, for the seal contained only water and gas, and there was no possible way for oil to be found there except by condensation of gases.

There was evidence that the liquid, negligently, as we think, poured on the ground out of the gas seal—60 or 70 gallons of it—ran down the trench in front of the furnaces and was seen while burning not far from the opening of the six-inch pipe which ran to the trap, and also around the trap and within two or three feet of it; that the flames rose up from the burning fluid two or three feet; that a high wind was blowing from the southeast across the furnaces and across the trap; the distance from the intake of this six-inch pipe to the trap and the slant or grade were shown, and that the outlet of this pipe was so placed at the trap as that the top of the pipe would always be about an inch under water in the trap; the construction of the trap was shown to be of brick and about eighteen inches square and was open at the top and flush with the surface of the ground; that an eight-inch pipe carried the contents of the trap down to the asphalt kettles; these and other facts and circumstances appeared, some of which are set forth in the opinion in the Hallawell Case. Subsequent hypothetical questions had to do with the result which would follow, assuming that the water carrying on its surface this burning oil in the trench in front of the stills, under the conditions mentioned in the questions, entered the six-inch pipe; and also as to what would happen on the assumption that oil on the water in the trap was ignited by the burning oil coming through the six-inch pipe or in some other manner. The testimony of the expert was that, from causes he fully explained, the oil would be forced through the six-inch pipe to the trap; that the oil at the trap would be ignited and pass on down quickly to the asphalt kettles through the eight-inch pipe; that at the admitted temperature of the water in the trench and in the trap, of 70 degrees Fahrenheit, the trap would give off inflammable vapors, and that these vapors being lighter than air, if no wind was blowing, would rise and spread out equally over the sides of the trap and if there was wind blowing these vapors would be carried with and in the direction of the wind and would be ignited by the nearby fire burning around the trap, and this fire would follow the burning vapors back to the trap and ignite the oil in the trap, and this burning oil would pass rapidly down the eight-inch pipe to the asphalt kettles.

We have given some of the facts, but by no means all, that were matters of evidence or were inferences deducible from evidence of facts, which the court deemed sufficient as a basis for the expert's testimony. Our conclusion is that the court did not err in permitting answers to the hypothetical questions above referred to.

(37 Cal. App. 101)

PEOPLE v. BROWN. (Cr. 587.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑1186(4) — Reversal — Technical Errors—Information.

Information alleging that between certain dates accused, "did then and there willfully and unlawfully take and entice" his victim "away from her home and usual place of abode and did on various dates and times induce" her "to accompany defendant to various hotels and rooming houses in the city of San Diego, and there occupy the same room and bed with defendant, and that said defendant did then and there have and accomplish acts of sexual intercourse with" her, was sufficient as against objection that the charge was barred by the statutory limitation of one year, in that all the acts might have been committed prior to November 2, 1916; the offenses being charged to have been committed between October 1, 1916, and October 1, 1917, and the information having been filed November 2, 1917, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, prohibiting reversal for defect in pleading unless there is a miscarriage of justice.

2. Indictment and Information 🔑119 — Conclusion—Surplusage.

Information charging that accused "did then and there willfully and unlawfully take and entice" his victim "away from her home and usual place of abode and did on various dates and times induce" her "to accompany defendant to various hotels and rooming houses in the city of San Diego, and there occupy the same room and bed with defendant, and that said defendant did then and there have and accomplish acts of sexual intercourse with" her, further alleging that accused induced the girl to so live as would cause and manifestly tend to cause her to become and remain a person coming within the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law of the state of California, was not objectionable because the further allegation was a conclusion of law, as it would be regarded as surplusage.

3. Infants 🔑20—Delinquent Children—Information—Sufficiency.

Information charging contributing to delinquency of 15 year old girl showing that surnames of accused and the girl were different, that she was 15 years of age, and that he enticed her from her usual place of abode and induced her to live with him at various hotels and rooming houses, was not insufficient for failure to allege that accused and the girl were not husband and wife.

4. Criminal Law 🔑1186(4) — Appeal — Harmless Error.

In view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, preventing reversal in the absence of miscarriage of justice, court on appeal from conviction for contributing to delinquency of girl need not consider alleged error in failing to compel election of offense or strike out testimony as to acts barred by the statute of limitations or excluding questions seeking to impeach the prosecutrix or in the alleged misconduct of the district attorney, where there is no miscarriage of justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Harry J. Brown was convicted of contributing to the delinquency of a 15 year old girl, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. L. Johnson, of San Diego, and Ralph F. Twombly, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. The appellant was charged with contributing to the delinquency of a 15 year old girl, the information having been predicated upon the terms of Juvenile Court Law (Stats. 1915, p. 1225; Deering's Gen. Laws, p. 766) § 21, which provides that:

> "Any person who shall commit any act or omit the performance of any duty, which act or omission causes or tends to cause or encourage any person under the age of twenty-one years to come within the provisions of any of subdivisions 1 to 13 inclusive of section 1 of this act, or which act or omission contributes thereto, or any person who shall, by any act or omission, or by threats, or commands, or persuasion, induce or endeavor to induce any such person, under the age of twenty-one years, to do or to perform any act or to follow any course of conduct, or to so live as would cause or manifestly tend to cause any such person to become or to remain a person coming within the provisions of any of subdivisions 1 to 13 inclusive of section 1 of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

Subdivision 8 of section 1 of the act provides that the act shall apply to any person under the age of 21 years "who habitually uses intoxicating liquors or habitually smokes cigarettes, * * *" and subdivision 11 of that section makes the law apply to any person under 21, "who is leading, or from any cause is in danger of leading, an idle, dissolute, lewd or immoral life." The evidence of appellant's guilt was directed to these two subdivisions. He was convicted, and was sentenced to two years in the penitentiary.

The testimony of the victim of the appellant was to the effect that she first met him at a dance; that they frequently saw each other from that time forward, and soon became engaged to be married; and that immediately after the engagement they began to indulge in sexual intercourse together, the acts being committed almost daily, over a considerable period of time, in the rooms of appellant in the several hotels and lodging houses at which he lived during the period. The landlady of one of the places at which appellant lived testified that on a certain occasion she became suspicious that appellant had a girl in his room; that she went to the room and rapped on the door, but that he refused to admit her or to open the door; that he later came down stairs in company with the girl whose testimony is stated above; that she, the landlady, then asked him what right he had to bring a girl into the hotel, to which he replied that he was not doing anything, that he was changing his clothes, whereupon she said to him that he had no right to receive the girl in his room and change his clothes; and that appellant responded that he would vacate the room. He did surrender the room that day. Two police officers who took the appellant into custody testified that he acknowledged to them that he had committed the sexual act with the girl. We shall refer specifically to the testimony of but one of these officers. He says that the appellant named the places where the sexual act had been committed between the two, the officer stating them from the stand and they being some of the places named by the girl in her testimony; that he had always intended to marry the girl; but that they had trouble at various times which prevented it. Practically the entire testimony of the prosecution above stated related to times within a year before the filing of the information against the appellant, that time being the period of limitation in such cases. The evidence of the prosecution showed without dispute that the appellant and the girl had never been married to each other.

In the evidence on the part of the defense there was no contradiction of any part of the testimony above stated, except that several witnesses testified that the girl's reputation for veracity was bad. At least three of these witnesses testified, however, on cross-examination, that they had seen the girl in the rooms of appellant at various times, and one of them said that she had "stayed with" the appellant.

Evidence was also introduced by the prosecution tending to show that appellant had induced the girl to drink intoxicating liquors; that he had compelled her, by persuasion, threats, and blows, to prostitute her body to the uses of other men; and that he had taken from her the money derived from such prostitution. As to all this evidence there was some contradiction in the testimony of the witnesses for the defense.

It is contended by the appellant that the trial court erred in holding that the information was sufficient in the face of an objection that the charge attempted to be made by it was barred by the statutory limitation of one year, the criminal acts of the appellant having been stated in the information to have been committed "on various dates and times" between October 1, 1916, and October 1, 1917, and the information having been filed November 2, 1917. It is insisted that the charge does not negative the possibility of all the criminal acts having been committed prior to November 2, 1916. It is to be noted that the crime of contributing to the delinquency of a juvenile may be of a continuing character; in fact, the offense is usually made of a series of overt acts or of a continuous chain of omissions. The information now before us plainly attempts to charge a crime of that character. There was no special demurrer to the information, but the claim that it was insufficient came in the form of an objection, at the trial, to the introduction of evidence in support of the charge, on the ground that, as to any offense charged in the information, "a greater portion of it is barred by the statute of limitations." The peculiar form of this objection made it practically meaningless, as it carried the inference, if not the assertion, that some portion of the charge was not barred. The objection was also made, at the same time, that the information did not charge a public offense. The point now before us seems to be within the rule announced in People v. Griesheimer, 167 Pac. 521. In that case the defendant was charged with collecting money from the prosecuting witness by means of false and fraudulent representations. The representations were to the effect that the defendant was authorized to solicit subscriptions on behalf of a certain publication, and that he had in fact collected such subscriptions from various persons. It was charged that the prosecuting witness relied on these false representations, and that he was thereby "induced to and did deliver * * * money to the defendant." There was a general demurrer to the information, which the trial court overruled. In passing upon the contention of the appellant that the ruling was erroneous, the Supreme Court said:

> "We are of the opinion that as against the defendant's general demurrer the information should be held sufficient on appeal. While there is no direct allegation that the money was paid to the defendant as a subscription or loan to the Fatherland Magazine, a reader of the information could hardly draw from it any other inference than that the payment was made for such purpose. It may be conceded that a direct allegation to this effect would have been more in accord with technical requirements. But what was intended to be charged in this connection is perfectly plain from the language in fact used, and no person of common understanding could fail to understand that it was substantially charged, by necessary inference at least, that the money was paid because of the alleged false representations, and for the purpose suggested thereby. Section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution provides that: 'No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted in any case, * * * for any error as to any matter of pleading, * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.' We are satisfied that to reverse the judgment on this ground would be to entirely ignore this provision of our Constitution."

[1] The information now before us alleges that, between the dates already mentioned, the appellant "did then and there willfully and unlawfully take and entice" his victim "away from her home and usual place of abode and did on various dates and times induce" her "to accompany defendant to various hotels and rooming houses in the city of San Diego, and there occupy the same room and bed with defendant, and that said defendant did then and there have and accomplish acts of sexual intercourse with" her. To a person of common understanding this language must plainly carry the meaning that the appellant continued his illicit acts from a time on or about the first date to a time on or about the second date mentioned in the information. The charge was sufficient as against the objections made by the appellant at the trial, in view of the constitutional provision mentioned in the quotation from the opinion in People v. Griesheimer.

[2] The appellant presents the further point that the trial court acted erroneously in holding the information to be sufficient over an objection that it stated but a conclusion of law in this respect, that it charged the appellant with having induced the girl "to so live as would cause and manifestly tend to cause" her "to become and remain a person coming within the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law of the state of California." This language is used in one part of the information, it is true, but the point which is attempted to be made concerning it is divested of all importance when we remember the very definite charge which is set out above and which specifically denounces the conduct of the appellant toward the girl at various times and at various hotels and rooming houses in San Diego. The general language inveighed against by the appellant may be treated as surplusage; for the charge against him is specifically and definitely stated in other parts of the information. The point is not well taken.

[3] The appellant contends that the information was insufficient to charge a public offense, in that it did not allege that at the time of the commission by the appellant of the acts of which complaint is made he and the girl were not man and wife. The information does show, however, that the surnames of the appellant and the girl were different; that she was but 15 years of age; and that he took and enticed her from her usual place of abode and at various times induced her to go to various hotels and rooming houses with him, where they were sexually familiar with each other. This language of the information brings the case within the terms of the opinion in People v. Griesheimer, from which quotation is above made. No person of ordinary intelligence could read the information without plainly understanding from its terms that the appellant was charged with committing the denounced acts upon one who was not his wife.

[4] The appellant contends that there was error in various other particulars in the proceedings of the trial court. It is asserted that the court erred in denying an application made by appellant at the trial to the effect that the prosecution be compelled to select and specify, by date, some particular act upon which reliance would be placed for a conviction; also in refusing to strike out certain testimony as to acts of defendant toward the girl, committed more than a year before the filing of the information; and, further, in sustaining objections to certain questions asked a witness for the purpose of impeaching the girl as to some of her testimony on the subject of her being led by appellant to indulge in the use of intoxicating liquors. In addition to these specifications of error said to have been committed by the court, the appellant insists upon a reversal because of alleged misconduct of the district attorney in the prosecution of the case. We do not find it necessary to consider the merits of any of these points, nor to state the argument by which the Attorney General meets nearly, if not quite, all of them. We need not consider these questions for the reason that none of them militate against nor minimize the fact that the appellant's guilt was established by the uncontradicted evidence stated above. Having regard to the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, we have made a careful examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, and we are of the opinion, from such examination, that no errors in the record, if any there be, have resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

CHAMBERS, Controller, v. GIBSON et al.

(Sac. 2579.)

TAXATION 🔑905(2) — INHERITANCE TAX — LIMITATIONS.

State controller's proceeding, under the act of 1905 (St. 1905, p. 374), to recover inheritance taxes on corporate stock, under Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 1, must be commenced within three years after death of donor, there having been gift, though the act of 1905 imposes lien on property in donees' hands.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Proceeding by John S. Chambers, as Controller of the State of California, against Mrs. J. S. Gibson and others, as trustees for N. C. Moore, and Mrs. J. S. Gibson and another, as trustees of Jozie S. Gibson. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

A. L. Shinn, C. L. Shinn, and C. G. Shinn, all of Sacramento, and Thomas Rutledge, of Colusa, for appellants. Robert A. Waring and J. Paul Miller, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in respondent's favor in a proceeding to recover certain inheritance taxes alleged to be due the state upon certain stock in a corporation known as J. S. Gibson Company, assigned and transferred by J. S. Gibson to the defendants and appellants herein in May, 1906. Said Gibson died on June 14, 1906. The defense to the action was the statute of limitations.

We are unable to perceive any distinction in principle between this case and the case of Chambers v. Gallagher, 171 Pac. 931, nor any reason for the application of a different rule than that therein applied. In the briefs of counsel for respondent filed since the decision of that case it is urged that such a distinction is to be found in the fact that in the Gallagher Case the action was against the executor of an estate in respect to whom no lien was created by the state upon the property which has passed through his hands, while in the instant case it is contended that by the act of 1905 (St. 1905, p. 374) under which the tax is sought to be collected a lien was imposed upon the property in the hands of the donees of the decedent, and that this is a proceeding to enforce that lien. The fact that the statute imposes such lien does not affect the application of the doctrine laid down in the former decisions; for it is there shown that in analogous cases when the law permits a personal action to be maintained for the collection of taxes upon property, which taxes are also a lien upon such property, the personal liability created by statute for such tax is a cause of action which, under section 338, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure, is barred after the expiration of three years from the time when the right of action accrued. The right of action in the present case accrued upon the death of the donor of the property claimed to be subject to this tax, and must therefore have been commenced within three years thereafter. San Diego v. Higgins, 115 Cal. 170, 46 Pac. 923; Los Angeles v. Ballerino, 99 Cal. 595, 32 Pac. 581, 34 Pac. 329; San Francisco v. Luning, 73 Cal. 610, 15 Pac. 311; Lewis v. Rothchild, 92 Cal. 625, 28 Pac. 805; Dranga v. Rowe, 127 Cal. 506, 59 Pac. 944; Clark v. San Diego, 144 Cal. 361, 77 Pac. 973. Upon the authority of these cases and of Chambers v. Gallagher, supra, the judgment is reversed.

CROCKER NAT. BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO v. BYRNE & McDONNELL.

(S. F. 7896.)

1. CORPORATIONS 🔑472 — BONDS — TITLE OF PURCHASER.

Under Civ. Code, § 3088, declaring that a negotiable instrument must be without any conditions not certain of fulfillment, etc., and section 3093, providing that negotiable instruments must not contain any contract other than those permitted by the chapter of which it is a part, corporation bonds and coupons thereon payable to bearer, but stating on their face that they were secured by trust deeds or mortgages, were not negotiable.

2. CORPORATIONS 🔑473—BONDS—TITLE OF PURCHASER.

The rule that the seller of ordinary property cannot transfer to the buyer a better title than he himself has applies to corporation bonds, which, though payable to bearer, do not possess the character of negotiable instruments.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Negotiable.]

3. CUSTOMS AND USAGES 🔑8—MODIFICATION OF STATUTE.

The Civil Code is a positive statute, and nothing can be established by custom contrary to its terms.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑70(1) — ENCROACHMENT ON LEGISLATURE.

The rule that custom cannot overcome the positive provisions of a statute, or make that a negotiable instrument which the Code declares shall not be such, is equally forceful to prevent the courts from creating exceptions not made by the Code, and which are contrary to its express provisions.

5. CORPORATIONS 🔑472 — BONDS—NEGOTIABILITY—STATUTES.

The language of Civ. Code, §§ 3088, 3093, defining negotiable instruments, permits of no exceptions in favor of a corporation bond nonnegotiable in form, whereby it may become negotiable after the first holder has sold it, or as against all persons other than the obligor.

6. CORPORATIONS 🔑472—BONDS—NEGOTIABILITY.

That some of the reasons which led to the exception of negotiable instruments from the general rule that a seller can give no better title than he himself has would apply with equal force to instruments payable to bearer, but not negotiable in form, is not sufficient excuse or reason for including such instrument within the exception provided by statute.

7. EVIDENCE 🔑65 — NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—PRESUMPTION.

The exception to the general rule that the seller can give no better title than he himself has having been confined to negotiable instruments, money, and currency, it is to be presumed that this is generally understood, and that the owners of such property guard the same with greater care.

8. CORPORATIONS 🔑472—BONDS—"NEGOTIABLE."

That title to a corporation bond payable to bearer may be passed by delivery does not make it "negotiable," within Civ. Code, §§ 3088, 3093, although such a bond is negotiable in the sense in which such word is often used.

9. BANKS AND BANKING 🔑113 — BONDS — RIGHTS OF PURCHASER.

The assistant cashier of a bank had authority to remove certain nonnegotiable bonds payable to bearer from its vaults to have the interest coupons detached, or for presentation for payment at maturity, but had no authority to dispose of them. He employed defendants to act for him as brokers in the purchase of stocks, and was required by them to keep a cash margin to cover possible losses. Being unable to raise the necessary funds for the margin, he took from the vaults of the bank certain of the bonds, and deposited them as security to cover possible losses on stock purchases and such advances as defendants should make for him from time to time. Defendants accepted the bonds in good faith, believing that they were, as stated by the cashier, owned by him. Held, that there was no estoppel in favor of defendants, and that the bank was entitled to recover, since the cashier was acting for himself, and told defendants that he was the owner.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Crocker National Bank of San Francisco against Byrne & McDonnell, an association of persons. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro and Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Harrison & Harrison, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff sued the defendants to recover the value of certain corporation bonds belonging to the plaintiff which had come into the possession of the defendants and had been by them converted to their own use. The bonds and the coupons thereon were payable to bearer, they stated on their faces that they were secured by trust deeds or mortgages, and they were in other respects in the same form as the mortgage bonds under consideration in Kohn v. Sacramento, etc., Company, 168 Cal. 1, 141 Pac. 626. The court below found in favor of the defendants, and rendered judgment accordingly, from which plaintiff appeals.

The defendants obtained possession of the bonds in the following manner: Baker was an assistant cashier of the bank, and his duties were of such a character that he necessarily had access to the vaults of the bank and to the bonds kept therein. He had authority to take them out of the vaults to have the interest coupons detached, or for presentation for payment at maturity, but he had no other authority to remove said bonds, and no authority to negotiate or dispose of the same. Byrne & McDonnell were stockbrokers in San Francisco. Baker employed them to act for him as brokers in the purchase of stocks for sale on the stock board of San Francisco and other cities. To carry on these operations he was required by Byrne & McDonnell to keep with them a cash margin to cover the possible losses on such stock purchases and such advances as they should make for him from time to time in the business. Being unable at all times to raise the necessary funds for this margin, he abstracted the bonds in question from the vaults of the bank, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, and pledged them with Byrne & McDonnell as security for his liabilities on the transactions with them as stockbrokers. Two of the bonds so pledged matured and were collected by the defendants, the proceeds being credited by them to their account against Baker, leaving a balance in their favor of $10,685.71. Upon discovering the fact that Baker had thus disposed of the bonds, the plaintiff demanded of defendants the return of all the bonds. The demand was refused, defendants claiming the right to the proceeds of the bonds that had been paid and the right to hold the remainder as security for the amount they claimed was due them from Baker. Plaintiff thereupon began this action for the value of all the bonds so taken and pledged to defendants. The court below found that Baker, at the time of pledging the bonds, represented to the defendants that he was the owner thereof, and that defendants accepted them as security in good faith, in the belief that said representation was true and without knowledge of, or reason to suspect, the fact that Baker had no title.

In Kohn v. Sacramento, etc., Company, supra, we held that bonds in the form of those here in controversy, though payable to bearer, and transferable by delivery, under our law are not negotiable instruments, as that term is defined in sections 3088 and 3093 of the Civil Code. The case attracted much attention, it was thoroughly argued, and was carefully considered by the court. Similar principles were declared in Meyer v. Weber, 133 Cal. 681, 65 Pac. 1110, Briggs v. Crawford, 162 Cal. 124, 121 Pac. 381, National Hardware Company v. Sherwood, 165 Cal. 1, 130 Pac. 881, and Taylor v. Jones, 165 Cal. 108, 131 Pac. 114. The transactions between Baker and the defendants occurred before the enactments of the amendments of 1915 changing the above sections so as to meet the decision in the Kohn Case. The doctrines laid down in the Kohn Case are therefore applicable to the present case. We see no reason for changing them. They apply, of course, to transactions made prior to said amendment of the Code.

[1] That decision establishes the proposition that these bonds were not negotiable instruments. The plaintiff invokes the well-known rules that the seller of ordinary property can transfer to the buyer no better title than he has himself, and that if such property has been lost by the true owner, or stolen from him, one who buys from the finder or from the thief, though he pays full value and buys in good faith, without notice, obtains no title as against the true owner.

[2] The decision in the Kohn Case and in Chase v. Whitmore, 68 Cal. 547, 9 Pac. 942, fully support plaintiff in the claim that these rules apply to bonds or notes payable to bearer which do not possess the character of negotiable instruments. The last-mentioned case is even stronger than the case at bar. Chase was the owner of a promissory note which was not negotiable because it provided for attorneys' fees in case of suit, a provision which the Code, prior to 1905, did not allow in a negotiable instrument (Civ. Code, § 3088), and also because at the time of the transaction involved it had lost its character as a negotiable instrument by reason of the fact that it was past due. It was made payable to order, and the payee had indorsed it in blank, thus making it transferable by delivery without further indorsement, and practically payable to bearer. In effect, therefore, it was of the same character as the bonds here involved. Chase became the owner of it and intrusted it to the possession of an agent, but gave him no authority to dispose of it. The agent sold it, as his own to Whitmore, who paid full value, was without notice of the want of title, and bought in good faith. It was held that the note did not come within the rule that the seller of a negotiable instrument can transfer a good title to a buyer, though he has no title himself; that for both reasons above stated it was not a negotiable instrument at the time of the transfer; that the seller, having no title in himself, could transfer none; that the mere possession by the seller was not evidence of authority from the true owner to sell it; that Chase was not by that fact estopped from reclaiming it from such buyer; and that the defendant Whitmore was liable to the true owner for the return of the note, or for its value, if he failed to return it on demand.

The respondent admits the rule to be that the seller of ordinary property can transfer no better title than he has himself, and that one who buys such property from a finder or from a thief obtains no title against the true owner. They seek to avoid the effect of the rule in this case under the claim that in this state bonds payable to bearer, but not negotiable instruments according to the definition of the Civil Code, pass by delivery alone, and that by the general usage and custom of trade they have came to be generally considered as negotiable instruments, and have acquired that character notwithstanding the fact that they violate the terms of section 3088, declaring that a negotiable instrument must be made payable in money only, without any conditions not certain of fulfillment. They further claim that even if such bonds are not negotiable instruments as against the obligor therein, they are such with respect to successive holders as to all matters which do not concern the obligor, and therefore are to be treated as negotiable instruments in any controversy between the plaintiff and the defendants concerning them. Evidence of the usage mentioned was introduced, the court below found that such usage existed, and held with the defendants on both propositions.

The two cases last mentioned hold to the contrary of the first of these propositions, and they are decisive on that subject. The English cases cited by respondents in support of the proposition that bonds similar to those here in dispute may, by usage, acquire the character of negotiable instruments, place the decision on the ground that in England negotiable instruments are not defined or declared to be such by statute, but became invested with their peculiar characteristics originally by the general custom of merchants, and that there was in that country no reason why such general custom could not also invest other instruments which pass by delivery with the same qualities and put them in the same class, and they declare that if there was a statute governing the subject, such custom could not enlarge the class created by the statute. Goodwin v. Robarts, L. R. 10 Exch. 337; Rumball v. Metropolitan Bank, 2 Q. B. D. 194; Bechuanaland, etc., Co. v. London T. Bank, 1898, 2 Q. B. D. 658; Edelstein v. Schuler, 1902, 2 K. B. D. 144. In the Kohn Case we said that custom "never overcomes the positive provisions of statutes" (168 Cal. 7, 141 Pac. 626), and the statement cannot be disputed.

[3] The Civil Code is a positive statute, and nothing can be established by custom contrary to its terms. The existence of such custom is therefore of no effect. The court below erred in admitting evidence thereof.

[4, 5] No authority is cited for the second proposition, and we think it is likewise in contravention of the Code. It is really nothing more than a claim that notes or bonds of a form which the Code declares cannot be deemed negotiable instruments may nevertheless become such under some circumstances. The rule that custom cannot overcome the positive provisions of a statute, or make that a negotiable instrument which the Code declares shall not be such, is equally forceful to prevent the courts from creating exceptions not made by the Code, and which are contrary to its express terms. The language of the Code defining such instruments permits of no exceptions in favor of a note or bond nonnegotiable in form, whereby they may become negotiable instruments after the first holder has sold them, or as against all persons other than the obligor. The courts cannot legislate, especially where the legislation proposed would, in effect, repeal or modify a statute.

We cannot assent to the claim that the rule by which negotiable instruments may be sold by a finder or a thief before maturity, so as to pass a good title to the buyer, should be, or has been, extended so as to include bonds or notes which, though not negotiable in form, are made payable to bearer, and to which title may be passed by sale and delivery. This is directly contrary to the decision in Chase v. Whitmore, supra. There, as we have said, the note was not negotiable, but it had been indorsed in blank by the payee, and by reason of that fact the title thereto could be passed by sale and delivery without further indorsement, and it was, in legal effect, thereafter payable to bearer, either before or after maturity. Chase had obtained it by sale and delivery after the first indorsement. Yet it was there decided that it was not a negotiable instrument as between Chase and Whitmore, and that the latter derived no title to the note by his purchase from one who had neither title nor authority from the true owner to sell it.

[6, 7] It may be that some of the reasons which led to the exception of negotiable instruments from the general rule that a seller can give no better title than he has himself would apply with equal force to instruments payable to bearer, but not negotiable in form. But this is not sufficient excuse or reason for including such instruments within the exception. The exception has been established from time immemorial, and it has hitherto been confined to negotiable instruments, money, and currency. It is to be presumed that this is generally understood; that the owners of such property guard the same with greater care for that reason, a care which the owners of other property need not exercise. It would be unjust and inadvisable as a matter of policy to extend the exception by a judicial decision. And besides, it would be judicial legislation, a thing forbidden to the courts. Moreover, in this state, the same cause would logically extend the exception to all personal property. The Code makes the title to all such property transferable by oral sale and delivery of possession, and where it so passes, the Code allows the buyer to sue in his own name to recover it, if a chattel, or to enforce it if it consists of a promise to pay money. We apprehend that even the respondents' counsel would shrink from these logical consequences of this part of their argument.

[8] It is further argued that every note or bond payable to bearer is negotiable by mere delivery, and is therefore a negotiable instrument, regardless of its form. The argument on this head is supported mainly by extracts from opinions of the courts of other jurisdictions in which the word "negotiable" is used in a sense different from that which it has in the phrase "negotiable instrument." Any contract to pay money the title to which may be passed by delivery alone, or by indorsement, is "negotiable," in the sense in which the word is often used. When the title has so passed, it is often said that the instrument has been "negotiated." But the fact that title may be so passed does not make it a negotiable instrument, within the meaning of the Civil Code, nor within the meaning of that term as used in the decisions which except negotiable instruments from the general rule regarding sales by a finder or a thief. This statement is well illustrated by reference to the case of an ordinary negotiable instrument made payable to bearer, or indorsed in blank by the payee and which has become past due. It is then negotiable, in the meaning above referred to, by mere delivery, the same as it was before maturity, but it is no longer a negotiable instrument, nor within the exception as to sales by a finder or thief. Chase v. Whitmore, supra.

Respondents cite Mohr v. Byrne, 135 Cal. 87, 67 Pac. 11. The case holds that the purchaser by assignment of a chose in action which is not a negotiable instrument takes it free from a secret trust, whereby a third person had acquired an interest in it not apparent on its face. A similar rule applies to all property. But there the prior holders were the lawful owners of the legal title. There was no sale by a thief or finder, and no such question as is here presented could have arisen. The application of the arbitrary exception respecting such sales of negotiable instruments was not involved or discussed. The case does not aid the respondents.

[9] There is nothing in the facts found which constitutes an estoppel in favor of the defendants. The transaction was not one in which Baker was assuming to dispose of the bonds in behalf of the bank, so that his position as assistant cashier might imply that he was authorized to do so. He was acting for himself, and he told the defendants that he was the owner. He merely had the possession of the bonds. His possession, for the purpose for which he took them, was wrongful. He had them without the authority, knowledge, or consent of his principal, who was the true owner, and in violation of his duty as an agent, or employé. The case is not as strong as that of Chase v. Whitmore, supra, where the agent had been expressly intrusted with the possession of the note which he wrongfully sold. Here the possession as well as the pledge thereof was wrongful. In that case the court held that there was no estoppel in favor of the buyer. It is decisive of the case at bar on this point also. See, also, Yamato v. Bank, 170 Cal. 351, 149 Pac. 826, to the same effect.

For these reasons, we are of the opinion that the court below erred in its conclusions of law, and in giving judgment for the defendants. It is unnecessary to consider the other objections urged in supporting the appeal.

The judgment is reversed.

(178 Cal. 406)

NORTH AMERICAN DREDGING CO. OF NEVADA v. OUTER HARBOR DOCK & WHARF CO. (L. A. 4195.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑347(1)—Time—Notice of Judgment.

Where a judgment was not actually entered until December 18th, notice of entry of judgment served December 7th on attorneys for appellant was premature and ineffectual for any purpose, and appellant, under the statutes regulating the procedure on appeal in effect prior to 1915, had six months from the date of the actual entry of the judgment in which to appeal.

2. Work and Labor 🔑22—Performance—Complaint.

In an action by a dredging company to recover on quantum meruit for work done under a contract with defendant dock company, the complaint, while indefinite and uncertain, held not so fatally defective as to be subject to general demurrer on the ground that it did not show that the work of filling on the dock company's property had been completed according to the terms of the contract, so far as to have entitled the dredging company to be paid the full rate of 24 cents per cubic yard for its work done during a particular month.

3. Contracts 🔑264—Rescission—Party in Default.

A party to an agreement may not rescind it while he himself is in default in respect to a material part.

4. Arbitration and Award 🔑8—Contract Requiring Arbitration—Invalidity.

Where a dock company's contract with a dredging company provided that in case of any disagreement respecting any matter under the contract for dredging the same should be settled and the rights of the parties determined by arbitration, the three arbiters selected as provided to hear all evidence offered, and to make an investigation of the facts, and the decision of the majority of the arbiters to be final and binding on both parties, such clause in the contract was not binding so as to require the dredging company first to have recourse to arbitration before either bringing an action on the contract or working its rescission and commencing action on quantum meruit, if otherwise entitled to rescind it; the arbitration clause being invalid as an attempted interference with the jurisdiction of the courts to decide controversies between parties to contracts.

5. Contracts 🔑262—Breach—Right to Rescind—Waiver by Accepting Payment.

Where a dock company, acting on the report and estimates of its engineers, offered to pay a dredging company doing work for it for the amount of its dredging work done during the month a sum calculated at the rate of 12 cents per cubic yard, and the dredging company, though insisting that they were entitled to be paid a sum calculated at 24 cents per cubic yard, nevertheless accepted the sum tendered by the dock company as partial payment, and continued its work, the dredging company waived and lost its right to rescind the contract for the dock company's failure to make full payment.

6. Work and Labor 🔑14(1)—Rescission—Date Character.

Where, when a dock company tendered to a dredging company doing work for it a sum for work done during a month calculated at the rate of 12 cents per cubic yard, insisting that the sum tendered was the whole sum due on that date according to the report and estimates of its engineers, so that the dredging company was fully informed of the exact nature and extent of the dock company's default, if any, in the fulfillment of the terms of the contract, which called for payments at 24 cents per cubic yard, but the dredging company not only accepted the sum tendered as a partial payment on the contract, but also went on with the work, which, under the contract, it was to perform during the following month, and continued with the performance of such work for nearly a month after the dock company's default, if any, and the nature, extent, and reasons thereof were fully known to it, and did not even then attempt to exercise its right of rescission for the dock company's claimed breach until nearly two months more had elapsed, and until the entire term within which the entire contract was to have been completed by it had expired, the dredging company's attempted rescission, if its right thereto ever existed, came too late to avail it as basis for its action on a quantum meruit.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by the North American Dredging Company of Nevada, a corporation, against the Outer Harbor Dock & Wharf Company, a corporation. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chase, Overton & Lyman and Overton, Lyman & Plumb, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Andrews, Toland & Andrews, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. [1] This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in the defendant's favor after its demurrer to the plaintiff's third amended complaint had been sustained; the plaintiff declining to further amend its pleading. Respondent urges a preliminary objection to the hearing of this appeal upon the ground that it was taken too late. On December 7, 1914, attorneys for the appellant were served with a notice of the entry of judgment in the action on December 3, 1914. The judgment was not, however, actually entered until December 18, 1914. Such notice was therefore premature and ineffectual for any purpose, since there could be no valid notice of the existence of something which did not in fact exist. This appeal was taken in February, 1914, prior to the changes in the statutes regulating the procedure on appeal enacted in 1915, and which dispensed with the requirement of notice of entry of judgment in order to set in motion the time for taking appeals. As the statute stood at the time this appeal was taken an appeal from a judgment was required to be taken within 60 days after notice of the entry of judgment, or in any event within 6 months after entry of the judgment. Foss v. Johnstone, 158 Cal. 119, 110 Pac. 294. In the absence of a valid notice of the entry of the judgment the appellant under the former state of the statute had 6 months from the date of the actual entry of judgment within which to take its appeal, and having taken it within such time its appeal is properly before this court.

The action was one upon quantum meruit for work and labor performed. The complaint alleged that the plaintiff and the defendant had upon March 29, 1912, entered into a written contract for the doing of certain dredging work adjacent to certain lands in the harbor of San Pedro, of which lands the defendant was in possession, and also the doing of certain filling upon said lands. The contract was made a part of the complaint. By its terms the plaintiff was to dredge certain channels, shown on a map attached to the contract, designated as the east and west channels and the north slip of the Watchorn basin. The east and west channels were to be completed to the 30-foot contour line within 5 months from date—by August 29, 1912. At least 150,000 cubic yards of dredged material were to be deposited on the property of the dock company each 90 days until the land was filled to a certain grade, and at least 30,000 cubic yards each month. All filling was to be completed by November 1, 1912, and a certain portion, the "outer mole," was to be completed within 90 days. All the work of dredging and filling was to be completed by December 31, 1912. The dock company was to construct in advance of the dredging, and to maintain all levees and bulkheads necessary to retain material excavated. The payment which the dredging company was to receive was based entirely on amount of material dredged, being 24 cents per cubic yard in certain cases and 29 cents in others. A partial payment of 12 cents per cubic yard is also provided for in certain cases. Payment was to be made on or before the tenth of each month for all work done the previous month; 10 per cent. being reserved until the next month as a guaranty for faithful performance. All work was to be estimated each month by the dock company's engineers, which estimates might be checked by the dredging company's engineers, but in making final settlement for any work such estimates were to be disregarded and the actual amount of material excavated was to control. All payments were to be made promptly when due. The dredging company was to prosecute all work diligently until completion. Time and minimum quantities of work to be done during a specified time were of the essence of the contract. In case of any disagreements between the parties, they were to be settled by arbitration.

The questions raised upon this appeal involve the sufficiency of the plaintiff's complaint viewed in the light of certain clauses of this contract and also of certain other exhibits, which it made by reference a part of it. The appellant contends that the averments of its complaint sufficiently show that it was not in default in respect to its performance of the contract at the time it undertook to rescind it, but that, on the other hand, the defendant was in default in respect to the payments to be made by it thereunder, and that in view of such default upon the defendant's part plaintiff had a right to stop the work, rescind the contract, and sue in quantum meruit for the reasonable value of the work and labor performed. The first point urged by the appellant under this general contention is that the defendant, having failed and refused on November 11, 1912, to pay at the rate of 24 cents per cubic yard for the material dredged during the month of October, such refusal constituted a violation of the contract which entitled the plaintiff to rescind it and bring and maintain this action. The specific answer made by the respondent to this contention is that the complaint does not sufficiently show that the defendant was in such default. The plaintiff avers in one of the paragraphs of its complaint that prior to November 1, 1912, to wit, on or about August 3, 1912, the former of said dates being that fixed in the contract for the completion of the work of filling to be done upon the property of the defendant, the plaintiff "fully performed and completed all filling of the property of the defendant as in said contract specified and provided." If this averment were the only one upon this subject in the complaint it would doubtless have sufficed to show plaintiff's performance of the terms of the contract as to the amount of filling to be done upon the defendant's property within the time stipulated in the contract, so as to have entitled it to the full payment of 24 cents per cubic yard for the work of dredging done by it during the months of September and October; but the complaint goes further and alleges that the defendant did a large amount of dredging during the month of September, 1912; that as to a portion of the material dredged during September "the plaintiff elected to dispose of it elsewhere than upon the fill provided for in said contract;" that on the 10th of October, 1912, the defendant presented to plaintiff the statement and estimates of its engineers in relation to the work done and payments due for September, which statement is attached to the complaint, marked Exhibit C, and made a part thereof. From such exhibit it appears that as to the portion of the material dredged during September which the plaintiff elected to dispose of elsewhere than upon the fill the defendant offered to pay at the rate of 12 cents per cubic yard and no more. No other conclusion can be drawn from this statement than that the defendant did not consider that the work of filling provided for in the contract had been fully performed. The complaint then proceeds to aver that the plaintiff refused to accept the sum tendered, and for a short time ceased work, but on October 19, 1912, accepted from the plaintiff a payment, which so far as the complaint discloses was based upon the estimate of 12 cents per cubic yard for the dredged material deposited elsewhere than upon the fill; but that the plaintiff accepted said sum under an alleged mutual agreement between the parties to the contract "that each party should, and then and there did, expressly agree to waive any and every default of the other party, but plaintiff did not agree to waive its rights to claim on final settlement full remuneration for all work performed."

These averments in the complaint, to say the least of them, shed grave doubt upon the question as to whether or not the amount of filling required by the contract had been fully done prior to the 10th of October, 1912; but the complaint does not stop here, but goes further in the way of increasing this doubt by proceeding to aver that the plaintiff desired to place all of the material dredged during the month of October on the defendant's fill and offered to do so, but that the defendant refused to allow the plaintiff to deposit any more material upon its fill, and that for that reason it deposited its dredged material for that month elsewhere. Notwithstanding this alleged fact, which would seem to indicate that the plaintiff did not at that time consider its work upon the fill completed, the complaint shows that the defendant's engineers, on November 10, 1912, in their statement of the work done during October, and of the sum due thereon, again estimated the amount to be paid by the defendant for such work on the basis of 12 cents per cubic yard, and that the defendant presented such statement and estimate to the plaintiff on said day and tendered the amount so estimated to be due upon said basis. This report and estimate is also made a part of the complaint. The only theory upon which such estimate could have been prepared and presented on the part of the defendant is that the defendant did not then consider that the work of filling provided for in the contract had been fully performed. The complaint proceeds to allege that, while the plaintiff then demanded payment for the dredging done by it during October at the full rate of 24 cents per cubic yard, it accepted the sum tendered by the defendant as a partial payment thereon, but subsequently demanded the payment of the remainder claimed by it to be due at the rate of 24 cents per cubic yard for said October work. This the defendant refused to pay, but, notwithstanding such refusal, the plaintiff continued to dredge until December 4, 1912, when it ceased all work under the contract. Negotiations for the settlement of the controversy which had thus arisen between the parties were entered upon and continued until January 29, 1913, when the plaintiff undertook to work a rescission of the contract. The complaint also shows that during this period of negotiation, in response to letters from the plaintiff to the defendant in an endeavor to arrive at a basis of adjustment of their differences, the defendant stated that the contract provided for an arbitration of their differences and suggested a recourse to that method of settling their controversy. The plaintiff, however, did not adopt or act upon this suggestion, but undertook to rescind the agreement and sue in quantum meruit without having sought to invoke the method provided in the contract for settling the controversy which it concedes had arisen. The provision of the contract providing for arbitration for the adjustment of such differences between the parties to it as might arise is section 7 of article 6 thereof, which reads as follows:

> "In case of any disagreement between the parties respecting any matters under this contract, settlement of which are not hereinbefore provided for, the same shall be settled and the rights of the respective parties determined by arbitration, each party hereto to select one arbitrator and the two so chosen to select a third, and the three arbitrators shall hear all evidence offered and make investigation of the facts, and the decision of the majority of such arbitrators shall be final and binding on both parties."

[2] As to the first question presented by the foregoing recital of facts as shown in the complaint as to whether the work of filling upon the defendant's property had been completed according to the terms of the contract so as to have entitled the plaintiff to be paid the full rate of 24 cents per cubic yard for its work of dredging done during October, the complaint, while very indefinite and uncertain, cannot be said to be so fatally defective as to be subject to a general demurrer; and as to its uncertainty in this respect the record discloses that no special demurrer is aimed at it upon this specific ground.

[3, 4] Passing this question, therefore, we come to the next point urged by the respondent as a reason for not sustaining this appeal. The complaint affirmatively alleges that a controversy and disagreement arose between the parties to the contract respecting the amount of money which the plaintiff was entitled to receive from the defendant for the dredging work done during September and October. If this controversy and disagreement was one which was contemplated and properly included within the terms of section 7 of article 6 of the contract above quoted, then the question arises as to whether the plaintiff was bound to submit, or at least offer in good faith to submit, the matter to arbitration before it could be entitled to work a rescission of the contract based solely upon the defendant's alleged failure to make the payments respecting the proper amount of which such disagreement and controversy had arisen. It is elementary that a party to an agreement may not rescind it while himself in default in respect to a material part thereof. Golden Gate Land Co. v. Sahrbacher, 105 Cal. 114, 38 Pac. 635; Fairchild, etc., Co. v. Southern, etc., Co., 158 Cal. 264, 110 Pac. 951; Cal. Sugar, etc., Agency v. Penoyar, 167 Cal. 274, 139 Pac. 671. The respondent invokes this principle to defeat this action, relying in the first instance upon the plaintiff's failure to invoke the arbitration clause in the agreement. The appellant, however, insists that it cannot be given application to the facts of this case as they appear upon the face of its complaint for the reason that the arbitration clause in the contract is void as an attempted interference with the power and jurisdiction of the courts to decide controversies between parties to contracts. There is respectable authority, both in this state and elsewhere, sustaining this contention. Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 307, 38 Am. Rep. 54; Loup v. Cal. S. R. R. Co., 63 Cal. 97; O. S. Land Co. v. Commercial U. Assur. Co., 66 Cal. 253, 5 Pac. 232; Hamilton v. Home Ins. Co., 137 U. S. 370, 11 Sup. Ct. 133, 34 L. Ed. 708. The respondent, however, cites the cases of California Sugar, etc., Agency v. Penoyar, 167 Cal. 274, 139 Pac. 671, and other cases, to the effect that where parties to a contract of the character of that in question here have agreed upon or authorized an arbiter to determine the existence of any fact which may be matter of dispute betwen them, the decision of such arbiter to be binding and conclusive upon the parties, such a clause in the contract is valid and binding upon the parties. The distinction, however, between this line of cases and those upon which the appellant relies is well drawn in the early case of Holmes v. Richet, supra, wherein the court, in quoting from the case of The President, etc., v. Pa. Coal Co., 50 N. Y. 250, says:

> "The distinction between the two classes of cases is marked and well defined. In one class, the parties undertake by an independent covenant or agreement to provide for an adjustment and settlement of all disputes and differences by arbitration, to the exclusion of the courts, and in the other they merely, by the same agreement which creates the liability and gives the right, qualify the right by providing that before any right of action shall accrue certain facts shall be determined, or amounts and values ascertained, and this is made a condition precedent, either in terms or by necessary implication. This * * * condition being lawful, the courts have never hesitated to give full effect to it."

In the case at bar the clause in the contract comes clearly within the line of inhibition, and hence must be held to have not been binding upon the parties to the agreement so as to have required the plaintiff to have first sought recourse to arbitration before either bringing an action upon the contract or working its rescission and commencing this action upon quantum meruit if otherwise entitled to rescind it.

[5, 6] The respondent contends, however, that the plaintiff was not otherwise entitled to rescind this contract for the following reasons shown upon the face of its complaint. The plaintiff alleges that on November 10, 1912, the defendant, acting upon the report and estimates of its engineers, offered to pay the plaintiff for the amount of its dredging work done during the month of October a sum calculated at the rate of 12 cents per cubic yard; the plaintiff, while insisting that it was entitled to be paid a sum calculated at the rate of 24 cents per cubic yard for such work, nevertheless accepted the sum tendered by the plaintiff as a partial payment thereon, and thereafter continued its dredging work up to December 4, 1912, when it stopped all work under said contract. It also appears that between said date and January 29, 1913, when the plaintiff finally undertook to declare the contract rescinded, the parties were negotiating for a compromise of their differences, during all of which time the defendant was insisting that its obligation under the contract had been fully met by the payment it had tendered and the defendant accepted on November 10, 1912. Under these circumstances affirmatively disclosed by the plaintiff's complaint the respondent contends, we think, correctly that the plaintiff had waived and lost its right to a rescission of the contract. This case is not like the case of California Sugar Agency v. Penoyar, supra, and the cases cited therein, where it was held that the failure or refusal of a party without sufficient cause to pay installments due upon a contract justified a repudiation of the contract by the party not in default. In this case the defendant tendered to the plaintiff the whole amount which it claimed to be due for the work of dredging done in October, and the plaintiff, with full knowledge that the sum so offered was tendered in full performance of the defendant's obligation, and not otherwise, accepted and received the same. It is true the plaintiff states that it accepted and received said sum as part payment for such work, but this it could not do without thereby waiving its right to rescind the contract upon the ground of the defendant's failure to fully perform it. While the contract was divisible as to each installment due upon it, the installments were not divisible so as to entitle a party to accept a portion of an installment tendered as the full sum due thereon and thereafter be permitted to repudiate the contract because the balance of the installment had not been tendered or paid. To permit this would be to allow the party to receive a portion at least of the benefits accruing to him under the contract with one hand while preparing to destroy it with the other. Wolfert v. Caledonia Sprgs. Ice Co., 195 N. Y. 118, 88 N. E. 24, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 864; Lyon v. Bertram, 20 How. 149, 15 L. Ed. 847.

But there is another reason appearing upon the face of the plaintiff's complaint why the right of rescission of the contract, if it ever existed, was lost to it at the time of its attempted exercise. When the defendant made its tender of the sum claimed by it to be due from it to the plaintiff for the dredging work done during October it was equally known to both parties that the sum tendered was the whole sum which was due on that date according to the reports and estimates of the defendant's engineers. The plaintiff was thus fully informed of the exact nature and extent of the defendant's default, if any, in the fulfillment of the terms of its contract. Knowing this, it not only accepted the sum then tendered as a partial payment upon the contract, but it also went on with the work which, under the contract, it was to perform during the month of November and continued with the performance of such work for nearly a month after the defendant's default, if any, and the nature, extent, and reasons thereof were fully known to it; nor even then did it attempt to exercise the right of rescission until nearly two months more had elapsed and until the entire term within which the work under the contract was to have been completed by it had expired. We think that under these circumstances the plaintiff's attempted rescission of the contract, if its right to such rescission ever existed, came too late.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

1. MECHANICS' LIENS 🔑195 — RIGHT OF CLAIMANTS—NOTICE TO WITHHOLD PAYMENT —PREFERENCE—STATUTE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1183 to 1203, the Mechanics' Lien Law, a claimant for labor or materials bestowed on a building, who, before maturity of the last installment of the contract price, served on the owner a notice to withhold payments as provided in section 1184, was entitled to preference in the money due over another claimant who served notice after maturity of the installment.

2. MECHANICS' LIENS 🔑113(2)—REMEDIES—NOTICE TO WITHHOLD PAYMENT—ENFORCEMENT OF LIEN.

The remedy of a claimant for labor and materials bestowed upon a building by notice to the owner to withhold payment from the contractor under Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, is distinct from and disconnected with his remedy by perfecting and enforcing his lien upon the property under section 1183.

3. MECHANICS' LIENS 🔑114(2)—ASSIGNMENT BY CONTRACTOR — RIGHT OF CLAIMANT — STATUTE.

An assignment of an installment of the contract price for a building made by the contractor to a third person does not prevent a lien claimant, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, from intercepting the money to be paid by a notice to the owner to withhold payment to the contractor given prior to maturity of the installment, and the right of such claimant is superior to that of the assignee.

4. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS 🔑81(2)—FURNISHING MATERIAL FOR SCHOOLHOUSE—RECOVERY AGAINST CONTRACTOR — STATUTE.

Where by the terms of a bond given pursuant to St. 1911, p. 1422, the contractor to erect a schoolhouse became bound to pay for all materials or supplies furnished for the performance of the work at his request or that of a subcontractor, plaintiff, who furnished a subcontractor with supplies, could recover of the contractor for a schoolhouse $70 still remaining due it for supplies.

5. GARNISHMENT 🔑51 — ASSIGNMENT OF MONEY TO BECOME DUE—ACCEPTANCE.

Judgment against a subcontractor on a school building in an action wherein the contractor was garnished was not a defense available to the contractor against the claim of a company which furnished labor and materials to the subcontractor under its previous assignment from the subcontractor of moneys to become due from the contractor, which the contractor accepted by stating he would honor it when the money was due, since the claim under the assignment would be paramount to the claim of the subcontractor's subsequent attaching creditor.

6. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS 🔑81(2)—BOND OF CONTRACTOR TO PAY FOR LABOR AND MATERIALS—GARNISHMENT—DEFENSE.

Judgment against a subcontractor on a school building in an action wherein the contractor was garnished was not a defense available to the contractor in action on the contractor's bond by the company which furnished labor and materials to the subcontractor.

7. MECHANICS' LIENS 🔑201 — NOTICE TO WITHHOLD PAYMENT — PRIORITY OVER ATTACHING CREDITOR.

The claim of a company which furnished labor and materials to a subcontractor working on a school building for $500 of the final installment of the price due the contractor, intercepted by its notice to the owner school district to withhold payment, was superior to the claim against the contractor of any attaching creditor of the subcontractor.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by the Southern California Electric Company against Alex Grant and others. From the judgment, plaintiff and the named defendant appeal. Reversed, and judgment directed in accordance with the opinion.

Edward G. Kuster, Gilbert A. McElroy, and Henry M. Young, all of Los Angeles, for appellant and respondent Grant. Edward T. Bishop and Carl W. Gibson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant Southern California Electric Co. Lewis Sherman Jones and Frank C. Hoyt, both of Los Angeles, for cross-complainant and respondent Lorbeer Electrical Supply Co.

SHAW, J. The record presents two appeals from parts of the judgment—one by the plaintiff; the other by the defendant Alex Grant.

The main question presented on plaintiff's appeal is whether or not, under the Mechanics' Lien Law as revised in 1911 (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1183 to 1203) a claimant for labor or materials bestowed upon a building, who first serves on the owner a notice to withhold payments, as provided in section 1184, is entitled to preference in the money due from the owner to the contractor, intercepted by such notice, over another claimant who serves a later notice. A brief statement will show the facts upon which this question arises.

Alex Grant was the original contractor for the erection of a school building for the Los Angeles school district. C. F. McDonald was a subcontractor for the electrical work under said contract. The plaintiff furnished to McDonald a part of the work and materials necessary for the performance of the subcontract, and thereby McDonald became indebted to and still owes plaintiff a balance of $570.

The Lorbeer Electrical Supply Company furnished other labor and materials to McDonald on said subcontract, whereby McDonald became indebted to and still owes it a balance of $550. Some extra work was done by McDonald at the request of Grant upon which the Lorbeer Company performed labor and furnished material to McDonald to the amount of $106, for which McDonald is still indebted to it.

The building was completed in accordance with the contract. On October 10, 1913, the plaintiff served upon the school district a notice to withhold money from the contractor for the payment of its claim aforesaid. At that time there was no money due on the contract price from the school district to Grant, but thereafter, on October 14, 1913, the sum of $500 became due thereon to Grant. Apparently this was the final payment, although the record does not show the fact. Before the trial the district paid this sum into court, and thereupon by order of the court and with the consent of the parties, the district was exonerated from further liability, and the case was dismissed so far as it was concerned. On October 16, 1913, two days after said $500 payment became due, the Lorbeer Company served upon the school district a notice to withhold payments from Grant to the amount of its claim for $550 aforesaid. Thereafter, on November 7, 1913, it served on the district a second notice covering only the claim for $106 on account of said extras.

The plaintiff's complaint states a cause of action to recover from McDonald the entire amount of its claim against him and to have the money due from the school district to Grant applied on said claim. The Lorbeer Company filed a cross-complaint setting up its claim against McDonald and Grant and praying that the money due from the school district be applied thereon. The court below divided the $500 due from the school district proportionally between plaintiff and the Lorbeer Company, giving the plaintiff $254.46 and the Lorbeer Company $245.54. In making this apportionment it excluded the Lorbeer claim on account of the extras aforesaid. These sums were credited to Grant on the respective claims aforesaid, and judgment was rendered against him for the balance, that is, for $315.54 in favor of the plaintiff, and for $410.46, including the $106 for extras, in favor of the Lorbeer Company.

[1] The plaintiff's argument in support of its appeal is, as indicated above, that the effect of section 1184 is that the one or two or more claimants who first serves a stop notice on the owner is entitled to preference, not only in an installment of the contract price then overdue, but also in all installments then unpaid, whether then due or not, and that the fact that one claimant serves his notice before and the other after the maturity of an installment is immaterial. The question presented is not quite so broad. It will be observed that the installment of $500 here involved was not due when the plaintiff served his notice, but was past due when the notice of the Lorbeer Company was served. The question whether claimants who serve stop notices prior to the maturity of a given installment are to have preference therein in the order of the time of service, or whether they shall share proportionally, is not involved. It may be that in such a case they should share proportionally in such installment, but we need not and do not decide the question. We think that the fact that the installment became due after plaintiff's notice and before the service of the Lorbeer Company's notice is material, and that it is decisive of the rights of the parties.

Section 1184 provides that any person described in section 1183 as entitled to a lien may at any time give the stop notice to the owner, stating that he has performed labor or furnished material, or has agreed to do so, to the contractor and the amount thereof in value, and then proceeds as follows:

> "Upon such notice being given it shall be lawful for the owner to withhold, and in the case of property which, for reasons of public policy or otherwise, is not subject to the liens in this chapter provided for, the owner or person who contracted with the contractor, shall withhold from his contractor sufficient money due or that may become due to such contractor to answer such claim. * * *"

So far as public corporations are concerned, this provision is in the same language as it was before the revision of 1911. The owner "shall withhold from his contractor sufficient money due or that may become due to such contractor to answer such claim." In Diamond Match Co. v. Silberstein, 165 Cal. 282, 131 Pac. 874, this language was construed, and it was held that it made it the duty of the owner upon receiving such notice to withhold a sufficient sum to answer the claim from the first moneys that became due thereafter upon his contract with the contractor, and that if he failed to do so, and later notices were served, sufficient to absorb all the subsequent installments of the contract price, the owner could be required by the person who served the first notice to pay the entire amount of his claim up to the amount of the installment which first became due after the service of his notice. Other decisions, in effect, hold that the right of a building contractor to an installment of the contract price is subject to the claims of materialmen and laborers who have given stop notices to the owner prior to the maturity of such installment, and that, if the stop notice is given after maturity, the right of the materialman or laborer therein is subject to any previous disposition thereof by the contractor or any previous right acquired against the contractor therein. First Natl. Bank v. Perris Irr. Dist., 107 Cal. 62, 40 Pac. 45; Newport, etc., Co. v. Drew, 125 Cal. 585, 58 Pac. 187; Miles v. Ryan, 172 Cal. 205, 157 Pac. 5. These cases decide that, if the contractor has assigned an installment, such assignment is good against a subsequent stop notice served after the maturity thereof, and that, if a creditor of the contractor has garnished such installment, a subsequent stop notice served after maturity is subject to the rights of the attaching creditor. The principle is that, if the laborer or materialman postpones the service of a stop notice until after an installment matures, he can reach only such interest as the contractor then has in that installment, and that he must take it subject to all previously acquired rights of third persons. These propositions are deducible from general principles of law taken in connection with the provisions of section 1184. The obligation of the contract requires the payment of the installment when it becomes due. The owner is then required to make the payment. If stop notices had been previously given, he is required to pay the amount thereof to the laborer or materialman, and the balance only to the contractor. The right of such laborer or materialman accrues immediately upon the maturity of the installment. He may immediately begin an action against the owner for so much of the installment as is necessary to pay his claim for labor or materials furnished in the building, and the rights of the parties thereupon became fixed. If a laborer or materialman neglects to serve the stop notice prior to the maturity of an installment, he must be deemed to have waived all right to participate therein as against other claimants who have served notice prior to such maturity, and as against the owner, in the event that he pays such installment promptly at maturity, or before the service of such notice. There is no necessary hardship in this rule. The previous portion of the section allows such claimants to give the stop notice as soon as they have made the agreement to perform labor or furnish materials; they need not wait until the agreement is performed. Promptness on their part, therefore, will secure to them all the benefits which the original contract affords them at the time they enter into the agreement to perform labor or furnish materials for the erection of the building. It necessarily follows that the court below erred in dividing the $500 payment proportionally between these two claimants, and that plaintiff was entitled to have it appriated on its own claim.

[2] The Lorbeer Company cites cases where there was a sale of land under a foreclosure of liens, holding that the proceeds must be divided proportionally among lien claimants of equal rank, regardless of the time of filing their respective claims of lien in the recorder's office. The remedy by stop notice under section 1184 is entirely distinct from, and disconnected with, the remedy by perfecting and enforcing a lien upon the property under section 1183. Bates v. Santa Barbara, 90 Cal. 547, 27 Pac. 438; First Nat. Bank v. Perris Irr. Dist., supra. The decisions as to such foreclosure sales have therefore no application to the present case.

[3] It further appears that at the time of making the agreement between the Lorbeer Company and McDonald for the work and labor upon which its claim of $550 is based, which was on October 24, 1912, nearly one year before the $500 became due from the school district to Grant, McDonald assigned to said Lorbeer Company all his right, title, and interest in all moneys to become due from Grant to him on his subcontract, and ordered Grant to pay the same to said assignee. Grant at that time accepted this order in these words: "I will honor the above order when money is due. Alex Grant." The Lorbeer Company claims priority in the fund by virtue of this assignment. This claim is untenable. As we have said, an assignment of an installment of the contract price made by the contractor to a third person does not prevent a claimant under section 1184 from intercepting the money by a stop notice given prior to the maturity thereof, and the right of such claimant is superior to that of the assignee. First Nat. Bank v. Perris Irr. District, supra; Newport, etc., Co. v. Drew, supra. In so far, therefore, as the transaction of October 24, 1912, operated to transfer or assign to the Lorbeer Company any part of the money to become due from the school district to Grant, it would be inoperative against the notice of the plaintiff, which was given prior to the time that the $500 became due.

It follows from the foregoing conclusions that the judgments below against Grant are not for the correct amounts. Both claimants contracted with McDonald, and hence their claims against Grant are limited to the amount owing by Grant to McDonald on the subcontract, which was $650. The $500 applied on plaintiff's claim from the money due to Grant for the district operates as a credit to Grant on the subcontract with McDonald, and leaves only $150 due thereon to McDonald. The recovery of the Lorbeer Company against Grant by virtue of its assignment is therefore limited to this $150 and $106 for the extras, making a total of $256.

[4] The application of the $500 on the claim of the plaintiff, as aforesaid, leaves remaining unpaid $70 of its claim against McDonald. The mere fact that this money is due for materials furnished to McDonald for the building gives the plaintiff no claim against Grant therefor. Its claim against Grant is based on the fact that Grant gave a bond in accordance with the act of March 27, 1897 (St. 1897, p. 201), as amended in 1911 (Stats. 1911, 1422). This act provides that every contractor for the erection of a building by a school district must file with the school board a bond in the sum not less than one-half the contract price, to be executed by the contractor and at least two sureties. Other acts allow a single surety on such bonds. The bond must provide that, if the contractor fails to pay for any materials or labor furnished for the work, the sureties will pay the same, not exceeding the amount of the bond. By the terms of the bond Grant became bound to pay for all materials or supplies furnished for the performance of the work, whether furnished at the request of Grant himself, or of a subcontractor under him. French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 Pac. 92; Associated Oil Co. v. Commary-Peterson Co., 32 Cal. App. 582, 163 Pac. 702. The plaintiff complied with all the conditions of the act necessary to establish the liability of Grant, and thereupon it began suit against Grant and the National Surety Company upon said bond. By agreement of the parties and order of the court this action was consolidated with the action of the plaintiff to recover the balance due from the school district to Grant, and the two cases were tried together. Upon these facts the plaintiff is entitled to recover of Grant in that action the $70 still remaining due to it for supplies furnished McDonald.

[5-7] It appears that on September 6, 1913, one Bechtol sued McDonald in a justices' court and attached Grant as garnishee. Grant answered the writ, admitting that he then owed McDonald $135. Judgment was rendered against McDonald in a justice's court, and he took an appeal to the superior court, where the cause is still pending. Grant pleaded these facts in defense. Bechtol is not a party to this action. Grant's pleading does not show for what amount Bechtol sued, or that it was for money due on contract. Even if the matter had been properly pleaded, it would not avail Grant as a credit or defense against the claim of the Lorbeer Company, inasmuch as the claim of the Lorbeer Company under its assignment would be paramount to the claim of a subsequent attaching creditor. Nor is it good against the plaintiff as a defense to its action on the bond on which it recovers $70, or its action for the $500 intercepted by its stop notice, which also was superior to the claim of any attaching creditor of McDonald.

These embrace all the points made in support of the two appeals. The parties have stipulated to the facts, and it is apparent that there never was any dispute concerning them. A retrial is therefore unnecessary. The court below can adjust the rights of the parties upon the going down of the remittitur by entering a new judgment that the $500 deposited in court be applied on the claim of plaintiff, that plaintiff recover of Grant the sum of $70, and that the Lorbeer Company recover of Grant the sum of $256, together with costs and interest in each case. It is to be observed further that McDonald does not appeal, and so far as he is concerned the judgments against him have become final. The new judgment will affect only the respective rights of the plaintiff, the Lorbeer Company, and Grant.

It is ordered that the judgment be reversed, and that the court below proceed to enter judgment in accordance with this opinion.

LINN et al. v. PEIRSOL. (Civ. 2394.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 7, 1918. Rehearing Denied June 6, 1918.)

1. Appeal and Error ⚷873(3) — Appeal from Judgment—Matters Reviewable.

Although appeal from judgment was taken more than 60 days after entry thereof, where case is one where statute abolishing appeal from orders denying new trial went into effect while motion for new trial was pending and undecided, action of court in denying motions for nonsuit and directed verdict is reviewable.

2. Appeal and Error ⚷387(3)—Undertaking on Appeal—Time for Filing.

Where notice of appeal was filed before expiration of statutory period, an undertaking filed five days thereafter was within time.

3. Physicians and Surgeons ⚷15 — Malpractice—Evidence.

Where, after performance of first operation on plaintiff, trouble resulted from hemorrhage because of use of catgut, defendant physician cannot be held liable for consequences resulting from use of silk on second operation; it being at most a mistake in judgment in weighing probabilities.

4. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS 🔑14(1) — SKILL AND CARE.

A physician is required to possess only ordinary skill in his profession, and to use his best judgment in the exercise of that skill.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by Anna Linn and husband against F. C. Peirsol. Judgment for plaintiff named, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. K. Peirsol, of Ft. Bragg, and Thomas & Thomas and Robert Duncan, all of Ukiah, for appellant. Mannon & Mannon, of Ukiah, for respondents.

ZOOK, Judge pro tem. In this action, defendant, a physician, appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiff Anna Linn in an action for his alleged malpractice. His main point on this appeal is that there was no showing of negligence on his part sufficient to warrant sending the case to the jury, and that therefore either his motion for nonsuit or his motion for a directed verdict should have been granted.

[1] Respondents contend that this point cannot be considered because the appeal was taken more than 60 days after the entry of the judgment. The case is one where the statute abolishing the appeal from orders denying a new trial went into effect while the motion for new trial was pending and undecided, and under the decision of this court in Nathan v. Porter, 172 Pac. 170, it is proper on the appeal from the judgment to review the action of the lower court on the motion for new trial, and to use the bill of exceptions for that purpose. The action of the court in denying the motions for nonsuit and for directed verdict is therefore reviewable on this appeal.

[2] Respondents' further claim that the appeal should be dismissed because the undertaking on appeal was filed more than six months after the judgment is without merit. The notice of appeal was filed before the expiration of the statutory period, and the undertaking was filed within five days thereafter and was within time. Lowell v. Lowell, 55 Cal. 316.

[3, 4] The alleged negligence of the physician for which plaintiff sought to recover lay in the use by him in an operation of nonabsorbable silk sutures instead of catgut. The only testimony in the record to show that this was improper is contained in an answer to a single question propounded to Dr. Marquis, one of plaintiffs' witnesses, who testified that a careful surgeon would not use silk in the place where it had been used. On cross-examination he admitted, however, that, where a physician requires a ligature that will hold fast to prevent bleeding, he may with propriety use the silk, and he made it clear that his previous answer was based entirely on the conditions as he found them at an operation performed by himself six months after the operation by appellant. The only other medical witness for respondents testified that the choice between silk and catgut is a matter of judgment in each particular case, and there is no testimony in the record to show that, under the conditions as they appeared to appellant when he performed the operation, the use of silk was negligence. It appeared from appellant's testimony that he had performed two operations on Mrs. Linn, that on the first occasion he had had trouble from hemorrhage as a result of the use of catgut, and that therefore he had used silk on the second occasion. It is true that the results of the use of the nonabsorbable silk in the case at bar proved unfortunate, as the silk caused certain perforations of the intestine, which produced serious trouble; but it is clear that on the second operation appellant was in a dilemma. The use of catgut had resulted in hemorrhage before, which he wished to guard against, and the use of silk might produce irritation. Under the circumstances, he should not be held liable for what was at most a mistake of judgment in weighing the probable consequences of the different methods that might be pursued. A physician is required to possess only ordinary skill in his profession and to use his best judgment in the exercise of that skill, and, if he complies with these requirements, he is not liable for the nonsuccess of his treatment. McGraw v. Kerr, 23 Colo. App. 163, 128 Pac. 870, 873; Houghton v. Dickson, 29 Cal. App. 321, 155 Pac. 128; Foreman v. Hunter Lumber Co., 173 Pac. 408.

The motion for a new trial should have been granted, as the court's orders denying the motions for nonsuit and for directed verdict were erroneous.

The motion to dismiss appeal is denied. Judgment reversed.

VAN HAGEN v. FIRST STATE BANK OF CLOVIS. (Civ. 2223.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 3, 1918. Rehearing Denied June 1, 1918.)

1. PLEDGES 🔑48—DISCHARGE OF NOTE—DIRECTED VERDICT.

In an action for value of plaintiff's collateral note, wrongfully retained by defendant, evidence held not to support a directed verdict for plaintiff on the ground that, as the consideration for the principal note had failed, plaintiff was entitled to a return of the collateral note.

2. PLEDGES 🔑48—RETENTION OF NOTE—ACTION FOR VALUE OF NOTE—EVIDENCE.

In action for value of plaintiff's collateral note, wrongfully retained, defendant might show that plaintiff had received a consideration for his payment and the execution of his principal note to defendant, and that he had relinquished his interest in the collateral note.

3. PLEDGES ⚷48—RETENTION OF NOTE—ACTION FOR VALUE—RECOVERY.

In action for value of a collateral note wrongfully retained, where the evidence showed an agreement that defendant was to hold a third party's note until taken up by plaintiff's principal note, and that it was not paid, plaintiff could not recover the collateral note or its value.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by William Van Hagen against the First State Bank of Clovis. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Ernest Klette, M. B. Harris, and E. M. Harris, all of Fresno, for appellant. Kitt Gould, of Clovis, and C. K. Bonestell, of Fresno, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action to recover the sum of $1,080, alleged to be the reasonable value of a certain promissory note owned by plaintiff and wrongfully retained by defendant. The case was tried before a jury. At the conclusion of the testimony there was an instructed verdict for plaintiff for the sum claimed. Defendant moved for a new trial, and in support of the motion specified, among other things, the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and assigned as error certain rulings of the court. This motion was denied, and defendant appeals from the order and from the verdict and judgment.

From the evidence it appears that a Mrs. Amer and one Cadwallader were indebted on a joint note executed by them to the State Bank of Clovis in an amount approximating $1,100. Mrs. Amer was desirous of taking this note up, and induced Van Hagen, the plaintiff herein, to assist her in so doing. In October, 1914, they went together to the defendant bank, and there met a Mr. Norrish, its president and manager, to whom they stated their business. It cannot be clearly ascertained from the testimony of Mrs. Amer and the plaintiff Van Hagen what arrangement was made between the parties, but it does appear from the testimony of Norrish that he received and accepted a certificate of deposit for the sum of $500 from Van Hagen, which sum was credited on the Amer and Cadwallader note. It further appears that Van Hagen at this time executed his promissory note in favor of the bank for the sum of $600. This note was unsecured, and Norrish insisted that some collateral be furnished to insure its payment. Van Hagen at that time was the owner of a note for $1,000, referred to in the evidence as the Kepley note, and which note is the subject of this action, and he indorsed this note over to the defendant bank as security for the payment of his unsecured note to the bank for $600. Norrish took the Kepley note, retained the Amer and Cadwallader note and also the note of Van Hagen, and informed the parties that the Amer and Cadwallader note would be delivered up when the Van Hagen note was paid. The matter remained in this unsettled condition for over two years until the filing of this action on November 17, 1916.

[1, 2] Upon this evidence the trial court directed a verdict for the plaintiff upon the ground that when plaintiff made the $500 payment and executed his note for $600, secured by the Kepley note, the bank had agreed to deliver up the Amer and Cadwallader note, and, not having done so, that the consideration for the Van Hagen note of $600 had failed, and no recovery could be had thereon, and, this being so, plaintiff was entitled to a return of the Kepley note given to secure its payment. The evidence does not support this conclusion. The undisputed testimony of Norrish—and it is the only testimony on the subject—is that he was to retain all of the notes until such time as plaintiff's note was paid. Defendant undertook to make some explanation of the transaction and to show that Van Hagen had received consideration for the payment by him of the $500 and the execution by him to the bank of his note, and that he had relinquished his interest in the Kepley note. This evidence was rejected by the trial court. Defendant clearly had the right to prove this fact.

[3] Defendant further offered in evidence the record in an action entitled "Van Hagen v. Amer," from which record it appears that plaintiff had secured a judgment foreclosing a mortgage executed by Mrs. Amer to secure a note given to Van Hagen in settlement with him; and in making the offer attorney for defendant attempted to state that his purpose in making it was to show that Van Hagen had received full and complete satisfaction of his claim. This statement was rejected, but the judgment roll was admitted. A reading of the testimony discloses the fact that all the circumstances surrounding the transaction in this case are not in evidence. No recovery is sought for the $500 paid by plaintiff. There is also evidence to show that when demand was made upon Norrish for the Kepley note he stated that he was holding it for the benefit of Cadwallader until such time as the Van Hagen note was paid. The evidence as a whole is very unsatisfactory and not convincing, but there is nothing contained therein to contradict the statement of Norrish that the agreement between the parties was that he was to hold all of the notes until plaintiff's note was paid. The note not having been paid, plaintiff was not entitled to recover the Kepley note nor its value.

No question is raised as to the sufficiency of the pleadings herein.

Assuming that plaintiff's complaint is an appropriate one, it simply declares upon a common count for goods sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant in the sum of $1,080, which it is alleged is the reasonable value of the property, namely, the note, describing it. The value of the note is denied by defendant. The evidence is silent as to whether or not the note had any value. Aside from this, the undisputed evidence shows that the bank was to retain the note in question until the Van Hagen note was paid. This being so, there is no evidence to support the judgment.

For the reasons given the judgment is reversed.

ROBBEN v. BENSON et al. (Civ. 1773.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 13, 1918. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 11, 1918.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER 🔑132—TITLE OF VENDOR—CHANGE OF RECORDS—LIABILITY OF PURCHASER.

Where a deed was recorded in the name of one "Robbins" as grantee, a different recorder's substitution of the name "Robben" would not render an abstract of title free from defects, and require the purchaser to accept it, make payments, or forfeit payments made.

2. RECORDS 🔑10—CHANGE BY COUNTY RECORDER—AUTHORITY.

Where a deed was recorded in the name of one "Robbins" as grantee, a subsequent county recorder had no authority 38 years thereafter to strike out the name "Robbins" and substitute the name "Robben," with a marginal insertion of the date and his initials.

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER 🔑280(2) — BREACH BY VENDOR—ACTION AGAINST PURCHASER—REMEDIES OF PURCHASER.

Where a vendor, after breaching its contract to furnish an abstract showing title free from defects, sues to foreclose purchaser's rights, and the purchaser, within time for answering, surrendered the land, he might file a cross-complaint to recover installments paid and damages for the breach.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by William D. Robben against Mrs. I. M. Benson and others, with counterclaim by defendants. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Shinn & Hart, of Sacramento, for appellants. W. U. Goodman, of Fairfield, and F. F. Marshall, of Dixon, for respondent.

PLUMMER, Judge pro tem. On a former hearing of this cause this court expressed its views upon some of the issues involved, which, upon review, we are still satisfied correctly express the law upon the questions considered, and, in so far as the opinion then announced relates thereto, the same is hereby adopted, to wit:

"On the 6th day of December, 1911, the plaintiffs and defendants entered into an agreement for the sale and purchase of certain real estate, situate in the county of Solano, for the agreed price of $21,600, payable in installments, $200 in cash, $1,800 on the 21st day of the same month, $3,000 on the 6th day of December, 1914, and subsequent installments, not necessary to mention herein, further than that all deferred payments were to bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, to be paid on the 6th day of December of each succeeding year, until the full purchase price should have been paid. Under this agreement the defendants went into possession, paid the sum of $2,000 on account of the purchase price, and two interest payments in the sum of $1,176 each, as the same became due, together with all installments of taxes on the premises agreed to be purchased. It was also provided in the agreement that the defendants should make improvements on the premises in the way of installing pumping plants and leveling up and planting to alfalfa at least 34 acres of said land, all of which covenants appear to have been faithfully kept at a considerable expense on the part of the defendants.

"The contract of purchase further provides as follows. 'The said party of the first part agrees to furnish said second parties with a complete abstract of said premises up to date hereof, within a reasonable time hereafter, and the second parties are to be given 15 days in which to examine said abstract and report upon the same; in the event that title to said premises shall be found to be defective, said first party is to be given a reasonable time in which to perfect the same. In the event of a failure to comply with the terms hereof by the said parties of the second part, the said party of the first part shall be released from all obligation in law or equity to convey said property, and said second parties shall forfeit all right thereto.' It is also covenanted that, in the event of a failure to pay interest on the deferred installments, the vendor might at his election declare the unpaid balance immediately due and payable. On the 8th day of December, 1914, the plaintiff not having furnished the defendants with an abstract of title, demand was made therefor, and the abstract in question was delivered to the defendants for their inspection.

"In order to show a complete title, it became necessary to show a conveyance from one W. D. Vail to B. W. Robben. The abstract disclosed, however, a conveyance made and executed on the 8th day of November, 1876, and recorded November 10, 1876, from W. D. Vail to B. W. Robbins. Accordingly the abstract was returned to the attorney for the plaintiff, who, it appears, together with an abstracter, went to the office of the recorder of the county of Solano, and on the 14th day of December, 1914, had the recorder draw two or three lines across the word 'Robbins' and write immediately above the word 'Robben,' and then insert on the margin of the record the following: '12/18/14 F. N. D. by J. P. B.' Thereupon the page in the abstract which had theretofore shown a conveyance from Vail to Robbins was removed, and in its place a page inserted, showing a conveyance from Vail to Robben, but not disclosing the interlineations and additions and erasures made upon the official records in the recorder's office.

"The defendants, not being satisfied, made a personal inspection of the official records and ascertained the manner in which the changes above noted had been made, and thereupon declined to accept the title altered in such manner, and asked that the defect be properly corrected. The plaintiff refused to have anything more to do with the abstract, but it does appear that on or about the 15th of January, 1915, a conveyance from Vail to Robben was taken to the recorder's office and recorded. However, the existence of this conveyance and of the fact of its being placed of record was not called to the attention of the defendants, nor does it appear that any supplemental abstract was furnished by the plaintiff to the defendants, showing the devolution of title from Vail to Robben. The matter appears to have remained in statu quo until about April 5, 1915, when the plaintiff began this action to quiet title to the premises involved. The defendants and appellants counterclaimed for the recovery of the purchase money already paid, and for damages. Judgment passed for the plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

"Upon the trial the plaintiff introduced in evidence a patent from the United States to one William T. Smith, and subsequent conveyances down to and including one to himself, establishing that at the time of the execution of the contract referred to he possessed a merchantable title. Among the deeds introduced was the one hereinbefore referred to, which appears to be a deed from W. D. Vail to B. W. Robben, dated November 8, 1876, recorded November 10, 1876, and re-recorded January 15, 1915. This deed, filed as plaintiff's Exhibit 6, is the one which was erroneously recorded in 1876 as being a conveyance from W. D. Vail to B. W. Robbins. There does not appear to be any testimony showing that the existence of this deed was called to the attention of appellants until its introduction in evidence. Upon the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony showing the matters above recited, the defendants moved for a nonsuit, which, not being granted, and which does not appear to have been passed upon by the court at all, the defendants introduced testimony as to their payments, their objection to the title, and damages claimed to have been suffered.

[1, 2] "It will be observed that the contract of purchase called for an abstract showing a title free from defects, and not merely for proof on the trial that the plaintiff had a good and sufficient title to the premises agreed to be sold. Was the attempted correction of the title by the erasure on the official records of the name 'Robbins' and the insertion of the name 'Robben' sufficient to render the title clear from doubt, and make it obligatory upon the appellants to accept the same, make payments as provided in the contract, or suffer forfeiture and loss of all former installments? In the case of Benson v. Shotwell, 87 Cal. 49, 25 Pac. 249, 681, in an action to quiet title brought by the vendor against the vendee for failure to accept title, it appears that a deed which was in fact signed 'Hepburn' was recorded as signed 'Hopkins.' The court said: 'Under the contract, defendant was entitled to a good paper title, sufficient in law, and was not bound to accept a title resting upon the statute of limitations, or take the risk of determining, from facts which he might learn dehors the record, whether or not the statute of limitations could be successfully pleaded against an adverse claim. * * * True, plaintiff claimed, and upon the trial proved, that the record was wrong, and that the deed purporting to be from Hopkins was in fact from Hepburn. But at the time when it was his duty to show good title he allowed the matter to rest upon his naked assertion, and refused to submit his proof for examination, or to permit the deed to be recorded correctly. Defendant had a right, therefore, to stand by the record, and to govern his conduct accordingly.'

"In the case at bar, there does not appear to have been any controversy over the deed from Vail to Robben. Its actual existence does not appear to have been disclosed, nor does the fact that it was taken to the recorder's office a month later than the furnishing of the corrected abstract, and then re-recorded, appear to have been brought home to the defendants. It thus appears that the plaintiff's right to prevail in this action must stand or fall upon the erasures and interlineations made upon the official record in the recorder's office 38 years after the recording of the written instrument, by a different officer, and for reasons and upon evidence not disclosed to the appellants. In the Shotwell Case it was held that the vendor had not complied with his contract to show title, and that the production of the deed, the exhibition of it to the vendee, and its introduction upon the trial, did not comply with his contract.

"In Foster v. Dugan, 8 Ohio, 87, 31 Am. Dec. 432, the court, having under consideration a correction made by a recorder, and a marginal memorandum, held as follows: 'The marginal note, made by the recorder on the registry, cannot be admitted as evidence to affect the validity of the deed. When it was made does not appear, but it must have been after registration. It is not competent for a public officer to undo what he has once done, and thus correct his errors; when he has executed his duties, he is functus officio, and has lost his power over the subject.' In Jennings v. Dockham, 99 Mich. 253, 58 N. W. 66, it appears that title was vested in one 'Nahum' Chadbourn. By deed recorded October 2, 1848, title was sought to be sustained by offering in evidence a record of a deed purporting to be executed and acknowledged by 'Nathan' Chadbourn to John Chadbourn, recorded October 3, 1853, and a marginal entry on the record as follows: 'The word "Nahum" was recorded "Nathan" by mistake in the annexed record.' Upon these facts the Supreme Court of Michigan used the following language: 'We think the attempted correction of the record of the deed from Nathan Chadbourn to John Chadbourn by the deputy register was without authority of law.' The case was reversed and remanded for a new trial.

"In Elliott v. Piersol, 1 Pet. 328-341, 7 L. Ed. 164, it appears that the record of an acknowledgment to a deed was corrected by interlineations and erasures. There the Supreme Court of the United States disposes of this question in the following decisive form: 'Had the clerk authority to alter the record of his certificate of the acknowledgment of the deed, at any time after the record was made? We are of opinion he had not. We are of opinion he acted ministerially, and not judicially, in the matter. Until his certificate of the acknowledgment of Elliott and wife was recorded, it was, in its nature, but an act in pais, and alterable at the pleasure of the officer. But the authority of the clerk to make and record a certificate of the acknowledgment of the deed was functus officio as soon as the record was made. By the exertion of his authority the authority itself became exhausted. The act had become matter of record, fixed, permanent, and unalterable; and the remaining powers and duty of the clerk were only to keep, and preserve the record safely. If a clerk may, after a deed, together with the acknowledgment or probate thereof, have been committed to record, under color of amendment, add anything to the record of the acknowledgment, we can see no just reason why he may not also subtract from it. The doctrine that a clerk may, at any time, without limitation, alter the record of the acknowledgment of a deed, made in his office, would be, in practice, of very dangerous consequence to the land titles of the county, and cannot receive the sanction of this court.' In Chamberlain v. Bell, 7 Cal. 293, 68 Am. Dec. 260, it appears that the description of the premises intended to be conveyed was omitted, and afterwards supplied by interlineation. The court there said: 'Conceding the propriety of the interlineation, it could only impart notice from the time it was made, and could in no way impair or defeat a title previously acquired.'

"It is not decided, nor can it be logically inferred from this language, that the Supreme Court approved the correction of a deed by the change of the grantee's name upon the record by a different recorder, 38 years after the original record was made, and that such a procedure established a merchantable title, free from doubt, upon which a purchaser must act at his peril, or be held to have forfeited all purchase money theretofore paid by him, without the existence of the deed in its actual form being brought home to him, or any proof adduced showing that the recorder had acted upon anything other than personal request. In those jurisdictions where it is held that a clerk may amend or correct his records, which do not affect titles to real estate, it is the established rule that the correction must be made by the officer who committed the error. The court, in Baker v. Webber, 102 Me. 414, 67 Atl. 144, thus states the rule: 'It is undoubtedly an established rule in New England, respecting the amendment of the records of a city or town, that the clerk who has made an erroneous or incomplete record may while in office, or after a re-election to the same office, amend or complete such record according to the truth, being liable, like a sheriff who amends his return, for any abuse of the right [citing cases]. But without statutory authority one who was formerly a town clerk, but is no longer in office, cannot amend a town record made by him when clerk.' That a vendor, who seeks the harsh remedy of forfeiture, must show strict compliance with the terms and conditions of his contract, requires no citation of authorities, and that a clear title, free from doubt, or what has frequently been described as merchantable, must be exhibited by the vendor to the vendee, is also well established."

The third installment on the contract in question became due and payable on December 6, 1914, up to which time it appears that the abstract of title to the premises, though prepared, had not been delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants, and on the 8th day of December demand was made therefor, whereupon the same was delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants. It appears from the transcript that the defendants waived any rights they might have had by reason of the nondelivery of the abstract, and stipulated that there was no breach in such delivery prior to said 8th day of December. It was further stipulated that the abstract furnished by the plaintiff to the defendants on the 8th day of December showed a conveyance from W. D. Vail to B. W. Robbins, from whom no mesne conveyances were shown vesting title in the plaintiff, and no other action taken than as hereinbefore set forth. Under such circumstances, the defendants were not in default at the time of the institution of plaintiff's suit. It may be stated that it further appears from the transcript that plaintiff, through one of his attorneys, informed the defendants that they would do nothing further in relation to the abstract.

It may be conceded that the plaintiff had, in fact, a good title; but that he failed to make exhibit thereof to the defendants seems to us beyond question. The re-recording of the deed from Vail to Robben on January 15, 1915, and exhibit thereof to the defendants, would have laid a foundation for maintaining an action wherein, all proper parties defendant having been joined, judgment might have been entered by the trial court, finding plaintiff's title valid, quieting any claims of B. W. Robbins to said premises, establishing of record that the conveyance purporting to be made to Robbins was in fact made to Robben, and decreeing performance by the appellants within a reasonable time or suffer the alternative of forfeiture. However, the plaintiff did not elect to pursue this remedy, but chose rather to consider the contract at an end, himself absolved from all its obligations, and instituted this proceeding to quiet title and thus gain the advantage of the installment payments already made under the contract, even though he himself was the party in default. Under these circumstances, what are the rights of the vendees under such contract? In an exceedingly exhaustive opinion, the Supreme Court of this state, speaking through Justice Henshaw, in Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 10, 55 Pac. 716 (43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17), thus lays down the rule:

> "Now, in such contracts, upon a breach by the vendor of a covenant to convey, what courses are open to the vendee? Obviously these: He may stand upon the contract and sue at law for damages for the breach. Here his recovery will be governed by section 3306 of the Civil Code; or, still standing upon his contract, he may go into equity, seeking its specific performance; or he may sue at law to recover the amount that may have been agreed upon as stipulated damages; or, finally, treating the vendor's breach as an abandonment, he may himself abandon it, when, the contract having thus come to an end, he may sue at law to recover what he has paid, in an action for money had and received, for, the contract being at an end, the vendor holds money of the vendee to which he has no right, and to repay which, therefore, the law implies his promise."

To a similar effect is the case of Boas v. Farrington, 85 Cal. 535, 24 Pac. 787, where it is stated, in substance, that:

> "Where a contract for the sale of land provided that the purchase money should be payable in installments, the first installment to be paid on the signing of the agreement, the 'title to be good or the money to be refunded, the party of the first part to furnish abstract of title to said land,' and the vendor furnished an abstract which failed to show a good title, the purchaser may rescind the contract, and recover the money already paid, although the vendor, as a matter of fact, had a good title to the property, if the vendor did not offer to remedy the abstract, or cause a perfect abstract to be furnished before the time arrived for payment of the second installment."

There, as here, the question was not so much the fact of good title as the failure of the abstract to show a title free from objections. In Seals v. Davis, 25 Cal. App. 68, 142 Pac. 905, the vendee brought an action to recover money paid on account of an agreement to purchase real estate by reason of the vendor's attempted rescission, and the court there held:

> "When a plaintiff seeks to recover money which he has paid upon a contract which the defendant has attempted to rescind, he may accept such rescission, and bring his action in the form of a common count for money had and received by the defendant to his use and benefit" —citing a number of authorities.

In McNeil v. Kredo, 31 Cal. App. 76, 159 Pac. 818, the right of the vendee was before the court upon the sufficiency of the complaint, but the right of the vendee to recover was again affirmed; the court saying:

> "The complaint states the cause of action. It in effect alleged that the defendants without cause repudiated the contract, declared it canceled, and denied to plaintiffs any right or interest thereunder. This being so, the plaintiffs were relieved from the obligation of further performance on their part and were privileged to consider and accept the defendant's renunciation of the contract as a rescission of the same" —citing also a number of authorities.

[3] In the case at bar, after the plaintiff had declined to do anything further in relation to the abstract in question or for clearing the title to the premises agreed to be conveyed, and had begun his action to foreclose the rights of the defendants under the contract, the defendants, within the time allowed for answering the plaintiff's complaint, surrendered the lands and premises to the plaintiff and filed a cross-complaint for the recovery of the installments already paid and damages suffered by reason of the plaintiff's breach. Under the authorities above cited it must be held that the defendants had a right to consider the contract as rescinded and prosecute their action for repayment of all installments paid, and also to recover whatever damages they had suffered by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to comply with his covenants therein contained.

The defendants' motion for nonsuit should have been sustained, and the trial court should have proceeded to ascertain and determine the amount of recovery to which the defendants as cross-complainants were entitled. It follows, therefore, that the judgment of the trial court must be reversed, with directions to proceed with the further hearing of this matter in accordance with this opinion; and it is so ordered.

CORBETT v. SPANOS et al. (Civ. 2389.)

1. Negligence 🔑134(1)—Injuries to Customer in Store.

Inference of storekeeper's general invitation to customers to use employés' toilet in rear of store cannot be drawn from single instance of use of toilet by customer by permission of clerk.

2. Negligence 🔑32(2)—Store Customer as "Licensee."

A customer in a store who asked for the toilet and was shown by a clerk to a toilet in the rear of the premises supplied for employés only was a mere licensee.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Licensee.]

3. Negligence 🔑32(1) — Injuries to Licensee—Willfulness.

A storekeeper owes to his customer, a mere licensee in the use of a toilet supplied for employés only, no duty except to refrain from willfully or wantonly injuring her.

4. Negligence 🔑32(1)—Injuries to Licensee—Wantonness.

A customer in store premises, a mere licensee as to the use of a toilet supplied for employés only, was not injured as the result of the storekeeper's willfulness or wantonness when she stepped, after leaving the toilet, into a trapdoor in the passageway opened while she was in the toilet.

5. Negligence 🔑31 — Violation of Ordinance—Customer in Store.

Storekeeper's violation of city ordinance prohibiting for fire protection covering of stairways with permanent flooring would not constitute negligence as to customer injured by falling through trapdoor in the flooring; she not being within the class which the ordinance was designed to protect.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth A. Corbett against Gus Spanos, Ellard B. Whitney, and Hattie E. Wilson. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Louis Ferrari, of San Francisco, for appellant. Cannon & Abbott, of San Francisco, for respondents.

ZOOK, Acting Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an action for damages for physical injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff through the negligence of defendants. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment for defendants entered upon an instructed verdict in their favor at the close of plaintiff's evidence. The facts testified to were as follows: Defendant Spanos conducted a candy and light lunch business in a store owned by defendants Whitney and Wilson, where plaintiff was accustomed to take lunch. In the rear of the store there was a partition running across the width of the store, with a door in the center opening into a narrow and rather dark passageway, on the opposite side of which there was a room containing a toilet and wash basin for the use of the young women employed in the store. There was a trapdoor in the passageway with a flight of stairs leading down to the basement, where candy was made and stored. This stairway was frequently used by the employés when they wished to bring candy up from the basement. On the day of the accident plaintiff, having lunched at the store, asked one of the attendants if there was a dressing room, and was shown to the toilet in question. The trapdoor was closed at the time, and, as it fitted flush with the floor, there was nothing to indicate its existence to plaintiff, and she received no warning about it. While plaintiff was in the toilet some person whose identity was not shown on the trial, but presumably an employé of the store, lifted the trapdoor and left it open. When plaintiff attempted to return to the outer store, she did not notice the open trapdoor, but in opening the partition door, which swung towards her, she stepped backwards and through the trapdoor, and fell down the steps to the basement below.

[1-4] We are of the opinion that the lower court correctly instructed the jury to bring in a verdict for the defendants upon the facts above set forth. While plaintiff was undoubtedly seriously injured by the fall, she could only recover damages therefor upon showing some breach by the defendants of a duty owing to her, and this she has failed to do. The law of California as to the duties owing by a proprietor of a store to his customers and to the public is settled by the cases of Schmidt v. Bauer, 80 Cal. 565, 22 Pac. 256, 5 L. R. A. 580; Means v. So. Cal. Ry. Co., 144 Cal. 473, 77 Pac. 1001, 1 Ann. Cas. 206; Herzog v. Hemphill, 7 Cal. App. 116, 93 Pac. 899. It is well expressed in the following quotation from Schmidt v. Bauer, supra:

> "The keeper of a public place of business is bound to keep his premises and the passageways to and from it in safe condition, and use ordinary care to avoid accidents or injury to those properly entering upon his premises on business. * * * But this rule only applies to such parts of the building as are a part of or used to gain access to, or constitute a passageway to and from the business portion of the building, and not to such parts of the building as are used for the private purposes of the owner, unless the party injured has been induced by the invitation or allurement of the owner, express or implied, to enter therein."

While in the complaint in the case at bar it was alleged that the so-called dressing room was placed by the defendant Spanos at the disposal of his customers and as an inducement to have customers patronize his business, absolutely no evidence in support of this allegation was produced at the trial except the fact that, on the single occasion when plaintiff was injured, she was shown to it by an attendant in response to her query as to whether or not there was a dressing room in the place. It affirmatively appeared in the evidence that there was no sign on the door to the passageway leading to the toilet in question to indicate that there was a dressing room there for the use of customers, and the simple equipment of the room itself, as well as its situation in a poorly lighted passageway, negatives the idea that it was intended for the use of any one other than Spanos' employés. The attendant who showed plaintiff the way was not called to testify upon the trial, and no authority in her to permit the use of the room by the patrons of the place was shown. In the absence of such showing, no inference of a general invitation or inducement by the proprietor of the store such as is alleged in the complaint can be legitimately drawn from this single instance of its use by permission of his servant. The only duty of a proprietor of a store to a mere licensee, when in that portion of the premises not customarily used by the public, and to which the licensee is not expressly or impliedly invited, is to avoid doing any willful or wanton injury to such licensee, and no such injury is shown by the record in the case at bar.

It is also claimed by the plaintiff that the trapdoor and stairway were constructed and maintained by both Spanos and the owners of the building in violation of the provisions of a certain ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco which provides as follows:

> "Stairs or stairways passing from one floor to another in any building shall not be covered with a permanent flooring, but may be closed with a board partition extending from the floor to the ceiling, and provided with a door, which must be kept free from all obstruction at all times, so as to give to the fire department and fire patrol easy access from one floor to another, provided this section shall not apply to buildings used for public assemblages.
> "Goods or obstructions of any kind shall not be placed on the stairs of any building.
> "Explosive or inflammable compounds or combustible materials shall not be stored or placed under any stairway of any building, or used in any such place or manner as to obstruct or render egress hazardous in case of fire."

[5] It is very doubtful whether or not this trapdoor, which could be easily opened and shut, comes within the prohibition of the ordinance as to covering stairs "with a permanent flooring," but it is unnecessary to decide the point here. The ordinance is purely a fire protection measure, designed to enable the fire department to have unobstructed access from one floor of a building to another in case of fire, and it is manifestly not intended to provide for the protection of the general public from injury. Therefore, conceding the ordinance to have been violated, plaintiff cannot claim that such violation constituted negligence, because she does not come within any class of persons which the ordinance was designed to protect. Toomey v. S. P. R. R., 86 Cal. 374, 24 Pac. 1074, 10 L. R. A. 139. As is said in the article on Negligence in 29 Cyc. at page 438:

> "The violation of a statute or ordinance designed to protect persons entitled to be on premises will not constitute negligence as to mere licensees or trespassers to whom no duty is owed independently of the statute."

In view of this principle, the alleged violation of the ordinance cannot operate to create liability on the part of either owners or proprietor.

Judgment affirmed.

DELLA MORA v. FAVILLA. (Civ. 2390.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 4, 1918.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⟹854(6)—REVIEW—ORDER GRANTING NEW TRIAL.

Where court granted motion for new trial, without specifying reasons, if there is any good reason contained in the notice, the order will not be disturbed.

2. NEGLIGENCE ⟹6 — VIOLATION OF ORDINANCE.

The violation of a city ordinance in and of itself constitutes and establishes negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Negligence.]

3. EVIDENCE 🔑14—JUDICIAL NOTICE—FOOT TRAFFIC.

It is matter of judicial knowledge that heaviest foot passenger traffic on streets of San Francisco takes place between 8 a. m. and 6 p. m., and that pedestrians would be annoyed and inconvenienced, and, on steeper sidewalks, endangered, by having walks washed between those hours.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑120—ORDINANCE AS TO WASHING SIDEWALKS—PURPOSE.

Ordinance of city of San Francisco, providing sidewalks should not be washed between 8 a. m. and 6 p. m., was designed to obviate inconvenience, annoyance, and danger to pedestrians during hours when streets were most in use, as well as to conserve water supply.

5. NEW TRIAL 🔑70 — VERDICT — LACK OF SUPPORT IN EVIDENCE.

If the trial court, having the evidence before it, and having seen witnesses, determined that verdict as to plaintiff's contributory negligence was not supported by the evidence, it was the court's duty to grant plaintiff a new trial.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑933(4)—NEW TRIAL —GROUNDS—PRESUMPTION.

Presuming trial court acted either on conviction its instruction, that negligence was established by proof of violation of ordinance, was not followed by jury, or that jury found contributory negligence against preponderance of evidence, order granting plaintiff new trial must be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Dino Della Mora against C. Favilla. From an order granting plaintiff new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James A. Bacigalupi, of San Francisco (Edmund Nelson, of San Francisco, and Michele Cimbalo, of counsel), for appellant. Joseph A. Brown and Frank J. Egan, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. [1] The plaintiff was injured by slipping and falling on a steep sidewalk in the city of San Francisco. The sidewalk had been wetted by being washed by the defendant at 10 o'clock on the morning of the accident, and it was claimed that the wet and slippery condition of the sidewalk caused the plaintiff to fall. By washing the sidewalk at that hour defendant violated an ordinance of the city and county which made it unlawful to wash a sidewalk between 8 a. m. and 6 p. m. The defenses were the legal contention that the ordinance was not designed for the protection of pedestrians on a sidewalk, but that its purpose was to conserve the water supply of the city, and hence that it did not constitute negligence between the parties here for the defendant to wash the sidewalk in violation of the ordinance; and, second, the allegation as a fact in the answer that the plaintiff was intoxicated when the accident occurred, and that this either caused or contributed to his fall. The jury found for the defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial on the grounds of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; that it was against law, and of errors occurring at the trial. The court granted the motion, without specifying its reasons. If, therefore, there is any good reason for granting it contained in the notice, the order will not be disturbed.

[2] The trial court instructed the jury at length as to the bearing of this ordinance on the case; the gist of its charge on that subject being comprised in an instruction which read as follows:

> "The violation of an ordinance in and of itself constitutes and establishes negligence. Therefore, if the plaintiff in this case has satisfied you that the defendant here on the occasion in question violated that ordinance, then he has established negligence on the part of the defendant. And the next question for you to determine would be whether such negligence on the part of the defendant directly contributed to and caused the injury that the plaintiff has suffered."

This instruction correctly stated the law, which is so well settled in this jurisdiction as to need no citation of authority to support it. If the broad proposition of law so established in this state, and given to the jury by the trial court in this case, is to be changed or modified, it must be done by the Supreme Court. It is not the function of this court to change it. This being so, the trial court was justified in holding that the negligence of the defendant was established.

[3, 4] It is contended that the sole purpose of this ordinance is to conserve the water supply of San Francisco; that it was not designed nor adopted for the purpose of protecting people upon the streets from the inconvenience or danger of wet and slippery sidewalks. With this contention we are unable to agree. The ordinance provides that sidewalks shall not be washed between the hours of 8 a. m. and 6 p. m. It is a matter of judicial knowledge that the heaviest foot passenger traffic upon the streets of San Francisco takes place between those hours, and that pedestrians would be annoyed and inconvenienced, and upon the steeper sidewalks of the city endangered, by having the sidewalks wet and slippery when pedestrians were most numerous thereon. For these reasons we think it clear that, while the ordinance may have been designed also the conserve the water supply of the city, another purpose, and the principal purpose of the ordinance, obviously was that the sidewalks should not be made inconvenient, annoying, and dangerous to the pedestrian population of the city during the hours when most in use.

[5, 6] The other question involved in the action was that of contributory negligence upon the part of the plaintiff; it being contended by the defendant that the plaintiff at the time of the accident was intoxicated, and that his intoxication contributed thereto. The plaintiff himself testified that he had not drunk anything that morning. He was strongly corroborated by other witnesses, although the testimony upon this point was not all one way. The trial court had the witnesses before it. The verdict of the jury must have been based, in view of the law as to the violation of the ordinance establishing negligence in the defendant, upon the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. If the trial court, having the evidence before it and having seen the witnesses, determined that the verdict upon this point was not supported by the evidence, then it was the duty of the trial court to do exactly what it did, namely, to grant the plaintiff a new trial. Presuming that the trial court acted either upon a conviction that its instruction, that negligence was established by proof of the violation of the ordinance, was not followed by the jury, or that the jury found contributory negligence upon the part of the plaintiff, when by the great preponderance of the evidence such contributory negligence did not exist, and accordingly granted a new trial, the order granting the same must be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

PULLIN v. ALLEN et al. (Civ. 2285.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 13, 1918.)

1. Trover and Conversion 🔑23—Right to Sue—Attorney and Client.

Where attorneys performed services and received money for client, the client could not maintain conversion during time attorneys were entitled to retain the money pending determination of reasonable fee.

2. Trover and Conversion 🔑67—Instructions—Law of Case.

Defendants in conversion are entitled to instruction stating matters necessary to make out a cause of action for conversion.

3. Trover and Conversion 🔑67—Instructions—Burden of Proof.

Defendants in conversion are entitled to instruction on burden of proof.

4. Trover and Conversion 🔑67—Actions—Instructions.

In client's action for conversion of money by attorney from funds coming to him through services, notwithstanding testimony that client offered $100 for services rendered, that the attorney demanded $500, and that the client thereafter accepted further services, the attorney was not entitled to instruction on issue of agreement to pay $500.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by S. E. Pullin against W. S. Allen and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Frank P. Doherty and Allen & Allen, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Courtney Lacey, of Los Angeles, and A. S. Bongiorno, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Defendants appeal from the judgment. The action was brought for the alleged conversion of the sum of $500, which by the complaint it was asserted belonged to the plaintiff. The defendants made answer, first specifically denying the allegations of the complaint. It was then alleged that defendants had rendered professional services for the plaintiff to the reasonable value of the sum of $500; that in the course of their employment the defendants came into possession of certain moneys and property as the result of the professional services rendered to said plaintiff; and that said defendants, after deducting their expenses, costs, and fees in the sum of $500, delivered all of the remainder and residue of said moneys and property to the plaintiff. The undisputed evidence in the case showed that the defendants as attorneys at law were engaged by the plaintiff to attend to litigation already commenced and threatened against the plaintiff. That the services were rendered in a satisfactory manner, no dispute is made. A part of the services required of the defendants was to attempt the negotiation of the interests of the plaintiff in the furniture of a certain apartment house. After attending to the clearing up of certain mortgage liens against this property, defendants secured a purchaser for the interests of the plaintiff, and upon a sale of such interests received certain moneys into their hands in excess of the sum of $500. After the work had all been completed, defendants made return to the plaintiff of all moneys except the sum of $500, which latter sum they retained, claiming the right so to do under the understanding had with the plaintiff that they were to receive a reasonable fee for their services. It seems to be indicated beyond all question that the agreement between the parties was that defendants should be paid out of the moneys in their hands for the services which they had rendered. It would seem to be immaterial, therefore, whether, as defendants assert, they possessed a lien upon the money independent of any agreement entitling them to retain such a sum as would reasonably compensate them for their work. Plaintiff in her testimony did not claim to have paid to the defendants any money in compensation for the services rendered, but only sought to show that the sum of $500 was an excessive amount to be allowed. After considerable of the services which defendant had been engaged to perform were rendered, a conversation occurred between the plaintiff and one of the defendants relative to the fee to be charged. Plaintiff on that point testified that in conversation with Mr. W. S. Allen she then said:

> "Why, yes. I am going to give you $100 of it. He said, 'You do not think you are going to get off with $100 for me with all this work?' He said, 'You do not think you are going to give me $100?' I said: 'Certainly I am going to give you $100. I insist on giving you $100.' 'Well,' he said, 'I won't take less than $500, and I wouldn't do it again for $1,000.'"

The sister of the plaintiff, referring to the same conversation, testified as follows:

"We were talking to Mr. Allen, and I was sitting at my desk, and we were talking about the business and talking about the rebating. Then I said again, 'But, Mr. Allen, we are going to give you $100 out of this, and by the time we have paid up everybody, where does my sister come out?'" She added that Mr. Allen replied that he was going to charge $500 for the work, and that she said, "You are just joking," and that he said, "I am not joking."

It was after this conversation was had that the sale of the furniture interests was made and the proceeds collected by the defendants. As we have before noted, the matter of the right of the defendants to retain out of the money collected a reasonable fee was not questioned by the plaintiff.

[1] Conceding, as we think must be admitted, that under the facts of the case the defendants had the right to retain possession of the $500 until it were legally ascertained that a reasonable compensation for their services amounted to a less sum, then it must follow that until such ascertainment was had there would be no ground for the action of conversion. There could be no conversion while the right to retain the money existed. By the verdict of the jury the plaintiff was awarded judgment in the sum of $250.

[2-4] Instructions were offered by the defendants and refused by the court, advising the jury of the essential matters necessary to make out a cause of action for conversion. We think that the defendants were entitled to have the offered instructions on these points given. They were also entitled to have an instruction, which was offered and refused by the court, given touching the matter of where the burden of proof rested in the action. The court did instruct the jury as to what was meant by the term "preponderance of the evidence," but, so far as we can find from the transcript, gave no instruction at all as to the burden of proof being upon the plaintiff to establish her cause of action by such a preponderance of the proof. We do not think it was error to refuse offered instructions on the matter as to whether there was an agreement to pay the sum of $500 as compensation for defendants' services. Defendants base their right to have this instruction given upon the evidence showing the conversation had between defendant W. S. Allen and the plaintiff after a considerable part of the services for which compensation was claimed had been rendered. The argument is that, as the defendants then stated that they would charge $500 for their services, because the plaintiff accepted further services in the same matter she would become bound to pay the amount claimed. We do not believe that the facts shown by that conversation are sufficient to make it appear that the plaintiff became bound as by agreement to pay the amount alleged. That conversation showed merely that the plaintiff and defendants were wide apart in their ideas as to what a reasonable compensation would be. The plaintiff asserted that she was going to pay $100, and the defendant W. S. Allen asserted that the charge would be $500. The question of the amount of compensation was not there settled, but was left an open and disputed matter. The trial judge treated that question as being the only one in the case, for in his instruction to the jury he said:

"The facts in this case are comprised in a very small compass. It is admitted that the defendants retained $500. No complaint is made at all of their services in the way that any portion of the money was spent. It is claimed they retained $500. It is admitted that they are entitled to some part of that on account of their services, and it is for you to determine what part they are entitled to, or whether or not they are entitled to all of it. That is all there is to this case."

The remainder of the instructions given consisted principally of a statement of general rules for the guidance of the jury in arriving at a verdict. In the particulars which we have hereinbefore pointed out, we think that the charge was not as complete as the defendants were entitled to have given.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

MEYERS v. McKILLOP. (Civ. 1799.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 3, 1918.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF ⟹158(4) — ORIGINAL PROMISE—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—EVIDENCE.

In an action for services of physician rendered to third party, evidence held to show that they were rendered in reliance that defendant would pay therefor, and that defendant directly promised to make such payment.

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF ⟹33(2)—PROMISE TO PAY DEBT OF THIRD PARTY—ORIGINAL CONTRACT.

Where plaintiff's services for the benefit of a third person were performed in reliance that defendant would pay therefor, and defendant directly promised to pay, there was an original contract, with a sufficient consideration for its support.

3. TRIAL ⟹396(1) — FINDINGS — EMPLOYMENT—PERIOD OF SERVICES.

In action for services of physician rendered to a third party on defendant's alleged promise to pay, an objection as to period of service covered by finding, in view of general allegation in complaint and exact time covered by services as shown by the evidence, held without merit.

Action by E. L. Meyers against John McKillop. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George F. Jones, of Oroville, for appellant. Lon Bond, of Chico, and Deirup & Deirup, of El Centro, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for the recovery of the sum of $390.25 for services rendered by plaintiff as physician and surgeon and by his assignors, W. B. Johnson and Sacramento Valley Hospital, a corporation, and the judgment was in his favor for $359.25.

The only question in this case is whether the evidence warranted the court in finding that the transaction between plaintiff and defendant created an original or primary obligation on the part of the latter, it being his contention that he was, at most a guarantor, and that the obligation was void because not in writing. The facts are similar, and the same question is presented in the matter of the two small assigned claims. We think that there can be no doubt that the theory adopted by the trial court finds sufficient support in the record. The services were performed for one F. J. Williams, and Dr. Meyers was called to attend him on the 5th day of October. Two days thereafter, according to plaintiff's testimony, he had the following conversation with the defendant at the Sacramento Valley Hospital:

> "I asked him whether he would pay Mr. Williams' bill. I told him I had an understanding he was going to pay the bill, and he said he would. I told him perhaps we had better make the sister feel more easy about the money. When we went down stairs, I repeated the conversation in front of Sister Marie, and the substance was that he was to pay Mr. Williams' bill."

He furthermore testified:

> "I made three calls on the 7th; on the 8th three calls; on the 9th there were five calls made; and on the 10th he was operated on by myself, Dr. Johnson and Dr. Wilson. I called on him twice subsequent to the operation; on the 11th I called three times; on the 12th I called four times; and on the 13th three times the day he died."

These services, performed after his conversation with defendant, were reasonably worth, so he said, the sum of $305, and this was allowed by the court.

[1, 2] It is a fair inference from the foregoing that these services were performed upon the reliance that the defendant would pay, and it is also a fair inference that the latter directly promised to make such payment. This constitutes an original contract, with a sufficient consideration for its support. Klamath Lumber Co. v. Co-operative Land & Trust Co., 25 Cal. App. 678, 145 Pac. 159.

It is true that Dr. Meyers was originally called by one Barnholdt, but there is no evidence that he was employed by the latter or by Williams, or that he looked to either for his compensation. At any rate, we may eliminate the services performed on the 5th and 6th of October, as did the trial judge, and consider only what was done after said conversation with the defendant. This may be considered a separate and distinct contract, and we see no legal obstacle in the way of enforcing it. It is true that the defendant denied any agreement for the payment of the claim, but the court below obviously did not believe him, and we cannot say that the want of faith was not justified.

[3] There is some contention in the closing brief that it does not appear whether the findings cover the entire period of the service or the time subsequent to plaintiff's employment by the defendant. The particular finding in point follows the allegation of the complaint:

> "That within two years last past plaintiff within the county of Butte, state of California rendered medical and surgical services to one F. J. Williams at the special instance and request of the defendant, and defendant promised and agreed to pay the value thereof."

Of course, from this it could not be determined whether it covered the entire period or not, but the allegation in the complaint was certain and definite enough to withstand the general demurrer which was interposed, and the exact time covered by the services for which defendant was held liable was revealed by the evidence. The amount found due corresponded exactly with the testimony as to the value of these services, and we are not inclined to the view that there is any merit in this claim of the appellant.

Indeed, the case is simple, and there seems no necessity for any further consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

CROCE v. BAZZURO et al. (Civ. 2370.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑103(1)—SUITS TO ENFORCE TRUST—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

A suit by an administrator against the heirs to recover proceeds of an insurance policy and rentals as trust property is barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 343, requiring actions not otherwise provided for to be commenced within four years; more than four years having elapsed since defendants denied the trust and claimed the property as their own.

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑103(3)—RECOVERY OF TRUST ESTATE—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE.

Where property held in trust is distributed to the trustee's heir, the heir takes as an involuntary trustee, and limitations against a suit to recover the property begin to run at the time of distribution, obviating the necessity of a repudiation of the trust.

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑192(3) — SUSPENSION OF LIMITATIONS—PLEADING.

In a suit to recover rentals and proceeds of insurance as trust property, a complaint alleging that plaintiff had no knowledge, information, or belief that the property was insured, or that the insurance had been collected until six months before the suit, and that plaintiff used reasonable diligence, not amounting to a charge of undiscovered fraud, did not stay the running of limitations.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Suit by Luigi Croce, as administrator of the estate of Francesco Bazzuro, deceased, against Mary Bazzuro and Anna Rose Mary Bazzuro. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant Mary Bazzuro appeals. Reversed.

D. Freidenrich, of San Francisco, for appellant. John J. Mazza and W. E. White, both of San Francisco, for respondent Croce. Harold C. Reyman, of San Francisco, for respondent Anna Rose Mary Bazzuro.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. This action was begun some time previous to the 9th day of October, 1914, by Luigi Croce, as administrator of the estate of Francesco Bazzuro, against Mary Bazzuro and Anna Rose Mary Bazzuro, a minor daughter of Mary, to recover $1,960 from the defendants upon allegations that they received this fund in trust for the heirs of the deceased Francesco upon a fire insurance policy for loss sustained by the destruction of a building in the fire of April 18, 1906, and also to recover $500 alleged to have been collected by the defendants as rents from the tenants of the building covered by the policy. The facts supporting the action were these: Francesco Bazzuro died intestate in 1879. At his death he held a mortgage upon a lot in San Francisco on which the building above mentioned was situated. His brother, Giuseppe Bazzuro, was appointed administrator of the estate, and as such foreclosed this mortgage, bought in the property at the amount of the mortgage at a sale in the foreclosure proceedings, and obtained a sheriff's deed as administrator of his brother's estate in the year 1884. In that condition the matter rested until the death of Giuseppe, which occurred in 1904. A year after the death of Giuseppe the plaintiff, Luigi Croce, was appointed administrator of the estate of Francesco to succeed Giuseppe, and he is still the administrator of that estate. The defendant Mary is the widow of Giuseppe, and Anna Rose Mary is the daughter of Giuseppe and Mary. Mary and Anna Rose Mary are the only heirs at law of Giuseppe. On the 15th day of July, 1905, a decree of distribution was entered in Giuseppe's estate by which all of the property vested in him at his death was distributed in equal shares to his widow and child. On the 10th day of October, 1905, Mary caused the building on the property to be insured against fire in the sum of $2,000. The policy was made payable to the estate of Giuseppe. About the 7th of November following Mary caused the name of the insured in the policy to be changed from the "Estate of Giuseppe" to "Mrs. Mary Bazzuro." The building was totally destroyed by fire on April 18, 1906, and on the 7th of July succeeding, the defendants collected $1,960 upon the policy because of the loss. On the 25th day of September, 1913, in an action theretofore begun by the plaintiff and the defendants herein, the court made its decree that the real property distributed in the complaint was at that time, and had been from the month of October, 1904, held by the defendants in trust for the heirs at law of Francesco Bazurro, and required the defendants to convey the real property in trust for the said heirs and subject to administration of Francesco's estate. On the 1st day of November, 1913, a commissioner appointed by the court in that action for the purpose executed and delivered to plaintiff a deed pursuant to that decree conveying to him, as administrator, the real property described in the complaint herein in trust for the heirs at law of Francesco and subject to administration of his estate. Before the destruction of the building Mary had collected $500 as rent from tenants thereof.

The insurance money and the rent were not mentioned nor prayed for in the action to recover the real property above referred to. The complaint alleged that the plaintiff had no knowledge, information, or belief that the building was insured or that the defendants had collected the insurance until about six months prior to the commencement of this action, and that thereafter plaintiff used all reasonable diligence in ascertaining the amount of insurance, and when and from what company the same had been collected. Plaintiff did not obtain that information until the 23d day of January, 1915.

The plaintiff had judgment in the action for the insurance money and rent and interest thereon from the time the funds came into Mary's hands. Judgment was given in favor of Anna Rose Mary. From the judgment against herself, the defendant Mary appeals.

[1] The statute of limitations seems to us to be an insuperable obstacle to the affirmance of this judgment. The particular section of the statute depended upon is section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which states that an action for relief, not provided for in the preceding sections of that Code, must be commenced within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued. The cause of action here, certainly in any view, must be held to have accrued at the time of the filing of the answer of Mary Bazzuro in the case in which the land was recovered to the administrator of the estate of Francesco; for in her answer in that case she flatly repudiated any trust which it was claimed reposed in her on account of the facts hereinbefore recited. In that action the answer set up adverse possession by Giuseppe and by the defendants, Mary and her daughter, a position entirely inconsistent with the trust; for in that action the defendants, Mary and her daughter, claimed that the title was vested in them, which claim constituted a denial that they held the property in trust, and also in effect a denial that the plaintiff was entitled to the property for the purposes of administration. This adverse claim set the statute in motion, even conceding that a repudiation of the trust was necessary to do so.

[2] However, no repudiation of this trust seems to have been necessary to set this statute in motion for the facts bring it within the rule of Norton v. Bassett, 154 Cal. 411, 97 Pac. 894, 129 Am. St. Rep. 162. The facts of that case were nearly identical with those in this case. Bassett, Sr., held certain property in trust for Norton. He died, and the property was distributed to his son. An action was begun against the latter without a repudiation by him of the trust. The Supreme Court held that no repudiation was necessary to set the statute in motion upon the ground that the younger Bassett was not a trustee of a voluntary trust, but of an involuntary trust, and that as a trustee of a trust obligation cast upon him by law he could plead the four-year statute of limitation without having repudiated the trust. The court, in discussing the matter, said:

> "In the case at bar the trust cast on the defendant Bassett was an involuntary one. The plaintiffs had a right to proceed to enforce their claim to the trust property immediately that the title to the trust property vested in the defendant Bassett as an involuntary or constructive trustee; the statute commenced to run from that date, and this action, not having been commenced until over five years thereafter, was barred by the provisions of the statute requiring such actions to be commenced within four years from the time the right of action accrues."

That case holds that an heir to whom property which his ancestor has held as trustee is distributed takes and holds as an involuntary trustee in whose favor the period of limitation begins to run on the distribution of the property to him, and is therefore authority for holding that this action was barred by limitation at the time that it was begun.

[3] In passing it may be said that the allegations of lack of knowledge on the part of plaintiff of the collection of the insurance money are not sufficient to stay the running of the statute, as those allegations do not amount to a charge of undiscovered fraud on the part of Mary Bazzuro.

The judgment is reversed.

4. ATTACHMENT 🔑211 — COMPLAINT OMITTING PRAYER.

The complaint in an action for money, though not containing a prayer for relief, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 426, accompanied by the affidavit on attachment required by statute, was sufficient as basis for writ of attachment, though, no answer having been filed, judgment could not have been entered.

Amended complaint supersedes original.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by C. L. Hoffman and De Ver McLaren against the Pacific Coast Construction Company. From an order denying its motion to dissolve attachment, defendant appeals. Order affirmed.

Karl F. Kennedy, of San Francisco, for appellant. Robinson & Robinson, of Oakland, and McCoy & Gans, of Red Bluff, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion to dissolve attachment. Appellant rests its appeal upon the sole ground that the "complaint is insufficient to constitute a basis for said attachment," and this for the reason that the complaint contained no prayer for relief when the levy was made under the writ of attachment.

The action is for money, to wit, the sum of $503.11, alleged to have been paid out to and for defendant at its special instance and request, no part of which has been paid, and the same is now due and unpaid. The complaint was filed May 26, 1916, and summons was issued. With the complaint were filed affidavits on attachment and undertaking. On the same day the writ was issued and a certain lot of pipe attached by the sheriff and taken into his possession. The complaint stated a cause of action for attachment, as did the affidavit. The writ duly issued and was duly executed, and the proceedings were in due form, except, as is contended, that the complaint lacked a necessary element to confer jurisdiction on the court, to wit, a prayer for the relief which the plaintiff claims. This contention arises out of the provisions of section 426 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows:

"The complaint must contain: 1. The title of the action, the name of the court and county in which the action is brought, and the names of the parties to the action; 2. A statement of the facts constituting the cause of action, in ordinary and concise language; 3. A demand of the relief which the plaintiff claims. If the recovery of money or damages be demanded, the amount thereof must be stated."

Appellant's position is concretely stated in the following paragraph of its opening brief:

"As to the proposition of a 'complaint' possessing a caption followed immediately thereafter by a prayer, it requires no citation of authority to prove that such paper would be quite worthless, under the second subdivision of the section. It cannot, therefore, be logically urged that any different rule should apply, in the event of an entire omission of the third required part of a complaint, namely, the prayer. The language of the third subdivision is not only as forcible, but is even more emphatic: '* * * The amount must be stated.' Considering its wording, its shoulder to shoulder position with the other two subdivisions, and the practical reason for its existence, there can be no question, we believe, but that the third subdivision's terms must be abided by, or the paper filed as a complaint is quite void."

It becomes necessary to trace the further proceedings in the case, chronologically stated, as to which no step was taken by either party until in the early part of the year following the filing of the complaint and issuance and service of the writ.

On February 19, 1917, defendant filed notice that on March 2, 1917, it would move the court to dissolve the attachment on the ground:

"That the complaint upon which said attachment proceedings were based stated facts which are insufficient, and said complaint is insufficient to constitute a basis for said attachment; that said motion will be based upon all the papers, records, and files in this action."

On March 2, 1917, plaintiff filed an amended complaint alleging the corporate capacity of the defendant, which had been omitted in the original complaint. Otherwise the original complaint was unchanged.

A notice of motion by plaintiff, dated March 10, 1917, appears in the record, that plaintiffs would on March 19, 1917, move the court for leave to file a second amended complaint, form of which accompanied the motion and was the same as the first amended complaint, except that it contained the usual prayer for relief. The motion was based upon the grounds:

"That in the original and first amended complaint of said plaintiff a prayer for relief, based on the facts alleged in said complaint and first amended complaint, was inadvertently omitted, and that leave to amend said complaint by inserting such prayer as the facts alleged justify should be granted in furtherance of justice and under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Said motion will be based upon the said proposed amended complaint and the affidavit of James S. Moore, Jr. [of counsel in the case], copies of which are served herewith, upon this notice, and upon the papers, records, and files in said cause."

Notice is in the record bearing no date, signed by defendant's attorneys, "appearing not generally, but specially and solely for such purpose," that on March 19, 1917, defendant would move the court for an order dismissing the action on the ground:

That "neither the original nor the amended complaint herein contains a prayer, as imperatively demanded by section 426, Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, that the facts stated in said complaint are insufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the court has no jurisdiction to try the said cause, and that the county clerk of Tehama county had no lawful power or right to file said complaint."

It does not appear when these various motions were in fact heard. But on April 2, 1917, the court granted leave to file a second amended complaint by the following order:

"[Title of Court and Cause.] Order Granting Leave to Amend. Good cause appearing therefor, and on motion of Messrs. Robinson & Robinson and Price and Messrs. McCoy & Gans, attorneys for plaintiffs herein, and on reading the notice and affidavit on file herein, it is hereby ordered that plaintiffs be, and they are hereby, granted leave to file their second amended complaint in words and figures as set out and with said notice of motion for leave to amend. Dated this 2d day of April, 1917. John F. Ellison, Judge of the Superior Court."

Thereupon, and on the same day, the second amended complaint was filed. On the following day, April 3, 1917, the court made the following order denying the defendant's several motions:

"The defendant's motion to quash the service of summons in this action is denied. The defendant's motion to dismiss the action is denied. The defendant's motion to dissolve the attachment is denied. The defendant allowed 10 days within which to answer or demur to the complaint."

Without further appearance in the case, defendant filed its notice of appeal.

It thus appears that the second amended complaint was on file before the court had ruled upon defendant's motions. The points on which defendant relies are: That in the absence of a prayer for relief the court was without jurisdiction, quite as much so as if the pleading wholly failed to indicate the court, in which latter case such would be the result (citing 31 Cyc. 94, and cases). Hence it is urged that, as the prayer is an essential element to confer jurisdiction, under section 426 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it follows that the court had not jurisdiction. Defendant's second contention is that, as the court did not have jurisdiction, its order to issue the attachment was void for the reason that there was nothing to support the writ.

It is further claimed:

"That absence of the prayer vitiates the purported complaint, and amendment was impossible. But," proceeds the brief, "assuming that the law were otherwise, and permitted the insertion of a prayer by amendment, it would still be true that until such insertion the court would be powerless to do aught but order such insertion. And any process, attachment, or other ruling would be valueless until the insertion of that ad damnum clause stating a jurisdictional amount. Respondents' first opportunity to have a valid attachment issued would arise after the order allowing the insertion."

Doubtless where there is no answer, and hence no trial of issues of fact, no judgment could be entered in the absence of any demand for relief. A default judgment could not legally be given and made if the complaint were prayerless. But it does not follow that the court is without jurisdiction to order a writ of attachment to issue where a cause of action is stated, pursuant to subdivision 2 of section 426 of the Code of Civil Procedure, though the prayer for relief is omitted in the complaint.

[1] Section 580 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

> "The relief granted to the plaintiff, if there be no answer, cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint; but in any other case, the court may grant him any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue."

This section plainly shows that the plaintiff may have some relief without regard to the prayer where an issue has been raised by an answer. Johnson v. Polhemus, 99 Cal. 240, 244, 33 Pac. 908; Woods Central Irr. D. Co. v. Porter Slough D. Co., 173 Cal. 149, 153, 159 Pac. 427; Murphy v. Stelling, 8 Cal. App. 702, 97 Pac. 672. In Donovan v. McDevitt, 36 Mont. 61, 92 Pac. 49, the court said:

> "It is true that the prayer is made a part of the complaint by section 671 of the Code of Civil Procedure; but it is made such part independently of the statement of facts constituting the cause of action. And, if the facts stated in the body of the complaint entitled the plaintiff to any relief, a general demurrer will not lie, no matter what may be the form of the prayer, or, indeed, whether there is any prayer at all. Hiatt v. Parker, 29 Kan. 765; Culver v. Rodgers, 33 Ohio St. 537; Sannoner v. Jacobson & Co., 47 Ark. 31, 14 S. W. 458; Parker v. Norfolk, etc., Ry. Co., 119 N. C. 677, 25 S. E. 722. It may be that the plaintiff cannot recover a money judgment without a prayer in his complaint demanding the same and stating the amount to which he deems himself entitled."

Both the questions of jurisdiction and amendability of the complaint where the prayer was lacking were considered in Eldon Ice Co. v. Van Hooser, 163 Mo. App. 591, 147 S. W. 161, where the court said:

> "But where a petition is in all respects sufficient save for the omission of a prayer, as this one, we do not believe that defect so far nullifies the paper as to deprive it of the efficacy of an invocation of jurisdiction, or that it is so far defective as not to afford a base for amendment. The omission of a prayer will not destroy jurisdiction."

We quote the following from Sannoner v. Jacobson, supra, which has our concurrence:

> "The question then is narrowed to this: Is the omission of a prayer for judgment so grave a matter as to be fatal to the action? If it is not fatal to the action, the intervener cannot be heard to complain. The statute declares that 'the court must in every stage of action disregard any error or defect in the proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the adverse party.' * * * In a suit upon an account for money advanced like the one under consideration, the only relief to which the plaintiff can be entitled is at once apparent from the allegations of the complaint, and the omission of the demand for judgment cannot be said to affect the substantial right of any adversary."

[2] It has been held that, although, under section 430 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that the court has no jurisdiction may be interposed, a demurrer does not lie to the prayer. Althof v. Conheim, 38 Cal. 230, 99 Am. Dec. 363; Bailey v. Dale, 71 Cal. 34, 11 Pac. 804. To determine the question of jurisdiction we must look to the averments of the complaint setting forth the facts constituting the cause of action. It was said in Lehnhardt v. Jennings, 119 Cal. 199, 48 Pac. 56, 51 Pac. 195, that:

> "It has never been held that the prayer of the complaint should conclude the question of jurisdiction."

In Kohler v. Agassiz, 99 Cal. 9, 33 Pac. 741, the court said:

> "Even on demurrer to the complaint the defendants cannot object to the prayer, and certainly, so long as the complaint contains every essential of an action upon contract, they cannot upon motion [to dissolve] an attachment accomplish what they could not upon demurrer."

It was held in that case that a motion to dissolve an attachment could not be turned into a demurrer, but that on such motion we are "simply to determine whether: (1) The complaint showed the action to be founded upon contract, express or implied; (2) whether it states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendants; and, if not, (3) does it appear therefrom that it can be so amended as to state a cause of action upon contract? As against a nonresident debtor, these questions being answered in the affirmative, we must not concern ourselves further with the complaint."

In Hale Bros. v. Milliken, 142 Cal. 137, 75 Pac. 653, the court said:

> "If the complaint sets forth a cause of action upon a contract, express or implied, it cannot be attacked for ambiguity or uncertainty, and not even whether it states a cause of action if it appear therefrom that it can be so amended as to state a cause of action upon contract; in other words, the motion cannot be turned into a demurrer to the complaint. Kohler v. Agassiz, 99 Cal. 9 [33 Pac. 741]. If we may inquire whether the complaint is capable of amendment in accordance with rules governing amendments, it would seem to follow that such amendment may be made pending the hearing on a motion to dissolve the attachment. So held, we think, in Hathaway v. Davis, 33 Cal. 161, and Hammond v. Starr, 79 Cal. 556 [21 Pac. 971], and results from what is said in Kohler v. Agassiz, 99 Cal. 9 [33 Pac. 741]. We may therefore consider the complaint as amended, for it in no sense changed the nature of the cause of action."

See, also, Pinkiert v. Kornblum, 5 Cal. App. 522, 90 Pac. 969; Pajaro Valley Bank v. Scurich, 7 Cal. App. 732, 95 Pac. 911.

[3-5] No reason can be advanced for holding that the prayer to a complaint may not be amended, or supplied when omitted, in like manner and to like extent that the complaint may be amended where the facts stated are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or where the title of the court has been erroneously given through inadvertence or mistake, or an error has been made in naming the party or parties plaintiff. The prayer may be amended to conform to the proofs at the trial. Why may not it be amended or supplied to conform to the cause of action stated in the complaint? We are of the opinion that the complaint as it originally stood, accompanied as it was by the affidavit required by the statute, was sufficient as a basis for the writ, although in its then form, no answer having been filed, a judgment could not legally have been entered in the case. Furthermore, we think the court was authorized to grant the motion to amend the complaint, before it had ruled upon defendant's motions, by allowing a prayer for relief consonant with the cause of action set forth in the complaint. The amended complaint supersedes the original complaint (Bray v. Lowery, 163 Cal. 256, 124 Pac. 1004); and it has been held that, where no new cause of action is attempted to be stated, the amendment, though made after the expiration of the period of limitation for the action, relates back to the time of the commencement (Ruiz v. Santa Barbara Gas, etc., Co., 164 Cal. 188, 128 Pac. 330).

The controlling questions in the case seem to be disposed of by the foregoing considerations.

The order is affirmed.

ANDERSON v. NEAL INSTITUTES CO. et al. (Civ. 2395.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE 🔑12—RIGHT TO REMEDY.
When the enforcement of a contract by decree of court is difficult or practically impossible, specific performance will not be granted.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE 🔑12—RIGHT TO REMEDY.
Contract requiring defendant to prepare and furnish medicines and advertising literature and give plaintiff the exclusive right to use the remedies could not be specifically enforced.

3. INJUNCTION 🔑59(1)—RIGHT TO REMEDY—BREACH OF CONTRACT.
Under Code Civ. Proc. § 526, prohibiting injunction to prevent breach of a contract, the performance of which could not be specifically enforced, a contract containing affirmative and negative covenants impossible of enforcement by court will not support suit for injunction to restrain breach.

4. INJUNCTION 🔑114(3)—RIGHT TO REMEDY—ASSIGNEES.
Where contract with principal defendant would not support suit for injunction to restrain its breach, the suit was not maintainable against assignees of the principal defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Suit by E. L. Anderson against the Neal Institutes Company, a corporation, and others. From a judgment sustaining demurrer to amended and supplemental complaint without leave to amend, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. P. Johnson, of Red Bluff, and James D. Thurman, of San Francisco, for appellant. David A. Nelson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment entered in favor of defendants upon an order sustaining a general demurrer to plaintiff's amended and supplemental complaint without leave to amend.

The facts as alleged in the complaint, stripped of legal verbiage, are substantially as follows: The defendant Neal Institutes Company has been for several years continuously engaged in the business of preparing and distributing certain medical remedies, known as the Neal remedies, for the treatment of patients addicted to the excessive use of alcoholic liquors and pernicious drugs; and it maintains, either directly or through persons acting by its license and permission, institutes in various cities of the United States for the purpose of treating patients according to its system of treatment and by the use of its remedies. By a written contract, made in March, 1910, between the plaintiff and the Neal Institutes Company, the latter granted to plaintiff for a term of 99 years the exclusive right to advertise and use the Neal remedies and the Neal method of treatment in the northern half of the state of California, and to use the name "Neal" in connection with such institutes as might be established by plaintiff in his territory. The company further agreed to supply to plaintiff on his order such of the company's medicines and advertising literature as he might require. Pursuant to the contract the plaintiff, in May, 1910, established an institute in San Francisco at number 1409 Sutter street under the name of the Neal Institute, sometimes followed in advertisements by the descriptive term "of San Francisco." This institute has been continuously maintained by plaintiff and plaintiff's patients there treated with the Neal remedies supplied by the Neal Institutes Company, and by extensive advertising and by the personal care and attention of plaintiff throughout a period of about 5½ years prior to the commencement of the action plaintiff built up a valuable business for his institute, and it acquired a highly valuable good will. In the month of November, 1913, the Neal Institutes Company, acting in confederation with the other defendants, established, and has since continuously maintained, a rival institute in San Francisco at number 1550 Fell street under the name of the Neal Institute of San Francisco. Since this last-named institute was established the Neal Institutes Company has refused to furnish any of its remedies to the plaintiff, but has been furnishing them to the rival institute, and the defendants have there treated patients according to the Neal system and by use of the Neal remedies.

It is charged by plaintiff that the defendants have so acted as to appropriate to themselves the benefit of plaintiff's personal work and of the advertising done by him, and have diverted to their institute business and patronage rightfully belonging to plaintiff, and have thereby seriously prejudiced plaintiff's business and impaired the good will attached to his institute. By reason of the injury, stated in the complaint to be irreparable, caused to plaintiff and his business through the acts of the defendants, plaintiff instituted this action on November 20, 1915, praying for a prohibitory injunction and an accounting. Subsequently, and on March 28, 1916, an amended and supplemental complaint was filed by leave of court, to which the defendants jointly interposed a demurrer. After a hearing had upon the demurrer the trial court held that an injunction could not properly be granted; and, the demurrer being sustained without leave to amend, judgment was entered in favor of the defendants.

The question to be determined on this appeal, therefore, is whether the amended and supplemental complaint states a cause of action, and, if so, whether the plaintiff is entitled to a prohibitory injunction.

The contract which is the basis of the action contains affirmative and implied negative covenants; and it appearing from the nature of the contract that specific performance could not be decreed, it was the view of the trial judge that an injunction to prevent a breach of the contract would not lie. We think this view is correct.

[1, 2] When the enforcement of a contract by decree of court is difficult or practically impossible, specific performance will not be granted.

> "It is elementary," says Pomeroy in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, § 1405, "that the contract must be such that the court is able to make an effective decree for its specific performance, and is able to enforce its own decree when made."

The contract here would require the defendant Neal Institutes Company to prepare the remedies used in the treatment of patients at the institutes which might be established by plaintiff, and this service is of such a character that courts could not make an effective decree for its performance. The impossibility of compelling performance in a case of this kind is well illustrated by the case of Barnes v. McAllister, 18 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 534. Plaintiff concedes this principle of law, and accordingly does not ask for a mandatory injunction directing said defendant to supply its remedies to plaintiff; but he does ask for a prohibitory injunction restraining the Neal Institutes Company from supplying its codefendants with said remedies in violation of its contract with plaintiff.

Where, as here, a contract contains both affirmative and negative stipulations, the authorities are in irreconcilable conflict upon the question whether equity will interfere to prevent a breach of the negative covenant when the affirmative covenant is of such a nature, that it cannot be specifically enforced by a judicial decree. 2 High on Injunctions, § 1164. For example, according to one line of authorities, where an opera singer or actor has contracted to sing or play for plaintiff at his theater, and not elsewhere without his permission, defendant may be enjoined from singing or acting elsewhere; the court thus preventing a breach of a negative covenant, although it cannot specifically enforce the affirmative agreement by compelling defendant to sing or act for plaintiff. Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De Gex M. & G. 604; Daly v. Smith, 49 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 150; McCaull v. Braham (C. C.) 16 Fed. 37. So, where defendant had agreed to make printing presses for the plaintiff, and to sell to plaintiff its entire output, and had expressly covenanted not to make them for any other person, an injunction was granted to restrain a violation of the negative stipulation, although the affirmative agreement was not capable of being specifically enforced against the defendant. Myers v. Steel Machine Co., 67 N. J. Eq. 300, 57 Atl. 1080.

Another line of cases holds to the contrary. In Welty v. Jacobs et al., 171 Ill. 624, 49 N. E. 723, 40 L. R. A. 98, it was held that an injunction against the proprietor of a theater will not be granted to prevent the breach of a contract to furnish the theater and its equipment to the manager of a company for a certain period, and to prevent him from furnishing the theater to a rival company during that period, since it was impossible to compel the plaintiff to carry out his contract according to its terms. So, when an actor agreed in writing with a manager not to perform at any other theater for a term of ten years, and broke his agreement, it was held that since the court could not enforce the positive part of the contract, it would not restrain by injunction a breach of the negative part. Hamblin v. Dinneford et al., 2 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 529. In those cases it was said that in effect to enjoin one from doing something in violation of his contract is an indirect mode of enforcing the affirmative provisions of such contract, that it amounts to a negative specific performance of the contract, and that courts of equity will not do indirectly what they cannot do directly.

[3] It thus appears, as before stated, that there is a conflict in the decisions as to whether under the circumstances of a case like this the plaintiff would be entitled to an injunction to restrain the violation of a negative covenant of his contract with the defendant; but in this state the question was put at rest at the time of the adoption of the Civil Code by the terms of subdivision 5 of section 3423

(since incorporated in the Code of Civil Procedure [section 526]), which provides:

> "An injunction cannot be granted: * * * Fifth. To prevent the breach of a contract the performance of which would not be specifically enforced."

The same policy was pursued by the Legislature in adopting subdivision 1 of that section, the subject-matter dealt with in which, like the one under consideration, had given rise to conflicting decisions by the courts. That such was the policy of the Legislature has been declared with reference to subdivision 1 of section 3423. Spreckels v. Hawaiian Com., etc., Co., 117 Cal. 377, 379, 49 Pac. 353.

Section 3274 of the Civil Code, which, with section 3423, constitutes a part of the Code entitled "Relief in General," reads:

> "Specific and preventive relief may be given in no other cases than those specified in this part of the Civil Code."

Subdivision 5 of section 3423 is free from ambiguity or uncertainty. It clearly declares as the law in this state the rule laid down in one of two opposing lines of authority. If there could be a doubt as to the intention of the Legislature in this regard, it is removed by an examination of the notes to section 1912 of Field's Proposed Draft of the Civil Code of New York, which section was practically adopted in this state, and by an examination of the notes to subdivision 5, § 3423, Civil Code Annotated, 1874, where the following authorities, cited as the foundation of that provision, declare that the court will not interfere by injunction to prevent the violation of an agreement of which, from the nature of the subject, there could be no decree of specific performance. Newberry v. James, 2 Meriv. 446; Williams v. Williams, 3 Meriv. 160; Hamblin v. Dinneford, 2 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 529; Sanquirico v. Benedetti, 1 Barb. (N. Y.) 315. References in the case of Peterson v. McDonald, 13 Cal. App. 644, 110 Pac. 465, and of Farnum v. Clarke, 148 Cal. 615, 84 Pac. 166, tend to support the view here taken.

California cases cited by plaintiff to sustain his position that an injunction will issue to restrain the violation of a negative covenant are not in point, being either an exception to the rule, or based on contracts negative in form, requiring a person to refrain from doing a certain thing, and having no affirmative covenants calling for specific performance. 22 Cyc. 845; 2 High on Injunctions, §§ 1134 and 1166.

[4] From the allegations of the complaint in the case at bar it appears that plaintiff's rights spring from and grow out of a contract containing affirmative and negative stipulations, and therefore the question as to whether or not he is entitled to injunctive relief is governed by the law as declared in subdivision 5 of section 3423 of the Civil Code. It thus appearing that the demurrer is well grounded with respect to the Neal Institutes Company, it follows that it is also well grounded as to the other defendants, who stand in the shoes of the company with regard to certain territory described in the contract. They were in effect the assignees of that company so far as the contract here involved is concerned, and therefore stand in the same relation to the plaintiff as their assignor.

The judgment is affirmed.

SAN JOAQUIN VALLEY BANK v. GATE CITY OIL CO. et al. (Civ. 1838.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 16, 1918.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY 🔑200(7) — CONTRIBUTION — PAYMENT OF JUDGMENT BY SURETY—EVIDENCE.

In a proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 709, by defendant surety on a note to compel contribution from his cosureties after judgment, evidence held to justify conclusion that defendant had not paid the judgment with his own money, and was not entitled to contribution.

2. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY 🔑200(7) — CONTRIBUTION—AFFIDAVITS.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 2009, as to use of affidavits, it was not error, on motion for contribution by defendant surety under section 709, to admit, over movant's objection, affidavits introduced by other defendants to meet the motion; the motion itself being based upon movant's affidavit.

3. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY 🔑194(6½)—CONTRIBUTION BETWEEN COSURETIES.

Code Civ. Proc. § 709, as to enforcement of contribution by a surety who pays the judgment, merely fixes a rule of procedure, and not a maxim of law, entitling a surety, who in fact does not pay a judgment, to contribution.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Norton, Judge.

Action by the San Joaquin Valley Bank against the Gate City Oil Company and others. After judgment for plaintiff, defendant J. F. Lynch made motion for contribution. Motion denied, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Gross & Lynch, Geo. F. McNoble, and A. H. Carpenter, all of Stockton, for appellant. Nutter & Orr, O. B. Parkinson, and Philip C. Bordman, all of Stockton, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This appeal is taken from an order made after judgment denying the appellant's motion for contribution under section 709 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The original action was brought upon a promissory note executed by defendant corporation to plaintiff and which, as was found by the court at the trial, was signed by defendant corporation as principal and by defendants Smith, Lynch, and Giottonini, as sureties. Plaintiff had judgment in the action, and on appeal to the Supreme Court the judgment was affirmed on May 27, 1915. 170 Cal. 250, 149 Pac. 557.

It was also found by the trial court that, as between the defendants, the said sureties, they executed the note under an agreement between themselves and defendant Gate City Oil Company, that they were merely sureties or accommodation makers, and that said Gate City Oil Company was the principal debtor, and should pay the amount to become due on said note, and they should have no liability chargeable against them, but that plaintiff was not affected by such agreement. The defendant, Gate City Oil Company, received the entire amount of said note for its use and benefit. The defendant Gate City Oil Company and defendant Lynch, appellant herein, took an appeal from said judgment to the Supreme Court, rendered in favor of the San Joaquin Valley Bank, but defendants Smith and Giottonini did not appeal. In that appeal, said defendants the oil company and Lynch gave an undertaking in the usual form to stay the enforcement of the judgment appealed from conditioned for the payment of the judgment by appellants if affirmed, and, if payment was not made by appellants as provided therein, that judgment might be entered against the sureties on said bond. The sureties on this undertaking were C. L. Flack, who was at all times during the litigation one of the principal owners of the defendant Gate City Oil Company and Robert McFadden. Defendant and appellant Lynch during all of said times held a contract signed by the said Flack and one W. R. Jacobs, who was also a principal owner in the Gate City Oil Company, indemnifying him against liability on the note sued upon. On the going down of the remittitur from the Supreme Court, an abstract of the judgment was filed in the recorder's office of Kern county, where the Gate City Oil Company held and owned certain property. After the affirmance of the judgment in said action, and about the time the remittitur went down and the abstract of the judgment was recorded in Kern county, said Jacobs and said Flack, as the officers and managing agents of the Gate City Oil Company, entered into an agreement with the Northern Oil Company, by which the Gate City Oil Company was to sell certain of its leasehold interests in Kern county to the said Northern Oil Company. But the Northern Oil Company, learning of the filing of the abstract of the judgment in the recorder's office of Kern county, declined to complete the purchase until the judgment had been satisfied and the property released from the lien. The defendant J. F. Lynch claims to have paid the full amount of the judgment, to wit: the sum of $8,145.22, and upon that claim he instituted these proceedings to compel contribution from the other defendants, Smith and Giottonini. Within ten days after the date on which he claims to have paid the whole of said judgment, Lynch filed with the clerk of the court where said judgment was rendered a notice of such payment by him and his claim to contribution from the other defendants, the said Smith and Giottonini, and gave the notice required by said section of the Code. The matter was heard upon the motion of said Lynch made upon affidavits and upon evidence submitted by said defendants Smith and Giottonini, and oral testimony submitted at the hearing. The said Smith and Giottonini made no claim that they had paid the said judgment or any part thereof. The matter was submitted to the court for decision, which is found in the record, and is as follows:

> "The motion of defendant J. F. Lynch for an order that an execution herein be issued in favor of said defendant J. F. Lynch and against the defendant Gate City Oil Company, a corporation, J. Jerome Smith, and F. F. Giottonini, upon the ground that the said defendant J. F. Lynch has paid more than his due proportion of the judgment. Certain affidavits and evidence were introduced in support and against said motion, and, the defendant J. F. Lynch having filed herein objections to certain evidence introduced against said motion, and defendant J. F. Lynch having also filed a motion to strike out certain affidavits introduced herein in opposition to said motion, and said motion and objection having been heretofore argued by respective counsel and submitted to the court for consideration and decision, and after due deliberation thereon the court this day rendered its decision as follows, to wit: That said objections to certain evidence be overruled, that petitioner's motion to strike out be denied, and that petitioner's motion to order execution issue herein be, and the same hereby, is, denied, to which ruling Geo. F. McNoble, Esq., attorney for petitioner, duly excepts. Dated: January 31st, 1916."

The appeal is from said order or decision, and the appellant assigns the following particulars as to which he claims there is no evidence to support the order or decision: (1) That there is no evidence to justify the implied finding that defendant Lynch did not pay the full amount of the judgment in the case of the said San Joaquin Valley Bank v. Gate City Oil Company; (2) there is no evidence to justify the finding that defendant Lynch is not entitled to contribution for such payment of said judgment from defendants Smith and Giottonini; (3) there is no evidence to sustain the finding that the Gate City Oil Company paid the aforesaid judgment or any part or portion thereof; (4) there is no evidence to sustain the finding that said Lynch has not paid more than his due proportion of the aforesaid judgment.

It is claimed by respondents that the transaction by which payment of the judgment against the Gate City Oil Company was accomplished was substantially as follows, as set forth in respondent's brief:

> That Flack, Jacobs, and Lynch "devised a plan for the payment, under which they could hold the respondents, J. Jerome Smith and F. F. Giottonini, to contribution thereunder, save themselves from liability, and at the same time release the property of the Gate City Oil Company, the principal debtor, from the effect of the judgment, to the end that it might be sold to the Northern Oil Company, thus retaining the proceeds of such sale within their own control and for their own use, and defeating recourse by the defendants J. Jerome Smith and F. F. Giottonini against the property of the Gate City Oil Company, which had been practically sequestered to the payment of the judgment. As a part of this plan C. L. Flack, vice president of the defendant and principal debtor, Gate City Oil Company, and its surety on the appeal bond, deposited money borrowed on Mr. Flack's personal credit with the Anglo & London-Paris National Bank in San Francisco, and by understanding with Mr. Lynch arranged to have it paid on the judgment, so that it would appear to be the money of the appellant Lynch, at the same time taking back an agreement from Lynch to pay to Flack all money he could recover by way of contribution from the defendants J. Jerome Smith and F. F. Giottonini. The judgment was then fully satisfied of record, and the sale of the Gate City Oil Company's property was consummated to the Northern Oil Company, and the proceeds of the sale ($4,000 in form of a check and the remainder in notes) turned over to Mr. Flack as vice president of the Gate City Oil Company. Mr. Flack personally received back the surplus money over what had been deposited by him for payment of the judgment, in amount $104.78."

Appellant relies upon the form of the entry on the judgment book in satisfaction of the judgment of the San Joaquin Valley Bank, which is as follows:

"The within judgment is hereby fully paid, satisfied, and discharged this 8th day of July, 1915, by the payment of the sum of $8,145.22 same being the money of J. F. Lynch" —and also upon the testimony of Flack and the testimony given by appellant himself.

Mr. Flack was a resident of Los Angeles, and in the early part of July, 1915, he met the defendant Lynch in San Francisco at the Anglo & London-Paris National Bank. The witness was asked the following question:

"Q. What, if anything, did you have to do with providing the money for the payment or satisfaction of this judgment as indicated there? A. Well, I gave Mr. Lynch a certificate or cashier's check, I forget which now, for $8,000. I handed him a check payable to the California-Anglo Bank for $250, and he handed those to the California Bank. I was standing there when he did it. He passed them through the window to the bank. Q. Was that your money by which that judgment was discharged? A. No, sir; I had turned it over to Mr. Lynch, and he turned it into the bank. Q. Was that the money of the Gate City Oil Company? A. No, sir; no part of it. * * * Q. State what, if any, transaction took place between you and J. F. Lynch on or about the 8th day of July, 1915, with respect to any money transaction whereby he had received any money from you, or you had received any money from him, the 6th of July. A. I let Mr. Lynch have— Q. (interrupting) I wish you would tell just what took place between you and Mr. Lynch. A. I met Mr. Lynch in San Francisco. I met him at the Anglo-California Bank. I gave to Mr. Lynch at that time— Q. (interrupting). Mr. Flack, the court has sustained the objections to 'gave.' A. I handed to Mr. Lynch at that time a cashier's check, my recollection is for $8,000, with the understanding—with the agreement— Q. (interrupting). I do not care about the understanding. State what took place between you. A. Mr. Lynch gave me an agreement to repay the money; I handed him a check for $250. We stepped up to the window of the Anglo-California Bank, and he laid the check and the cashier's check down and asked for a receipt for that money. I think he has got the receipt now; and then we talked there with him a little while and went away. Mr. Lynch has got a copy of our agreement and the receipt that the bank gave him."

The agreement was then offered and received in evidence, and is as follows:

"In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of San Joaquin. The San Joaquin Valley Bank, a Corporation, Plaintiff, v. Gate City Oil Company, a Corporation, et al., Defendants. No. 10002. This is to certify and I do hereby certify, that C. L. Flack has this day advanced to me and deposited in bank for my use and benefit the sum of eight thousand one hundred and fifty (8,150.00) dollars, with which I desire to pay and will pay the judgment in the above entitled action to protect my own property from execution and in order to secure the said C. L. Flack in the repayment of said money to him by me I have this day assigned to said Flack all the right, title and interest that I now have or may hereafter have or acquire in and to all money and things of value that I may recover or collect or that may be paid by or collected from the Gate City Oil Company, J. Jerome Smith and F. F. Giottonini, or any of them as a contribution or payment to me by them, or any of them, or their respective proportions or shares of the judgment in the above-entitled action, under the law of contribution, by reason of the payment of said judgment by me, one of the cojudgment debtors in said action.

"[Signed] J. F. Lynch."

"Q. That is the agreement to which you referred in your testimony? A. That is the agreement. I am familiar with Mr. J. F. Lynch's signature, and that is his signature. I saw him sign it. He has not paid me back any portion of the moneys specified in that agreement; and no one else has paid it to me."

On cross-examination:

"Q. You were tending to a sale of the Gate City Oil Company's interest to the Northern Oil Company? A. That was what I was negotiating. The cashier's check that I have referred to was issued by the Bank of Riverbank. I was not an officer of that bank at any time. Q. When did you obtain that cashier's check from the bank at Riverbank? A. I think it was two or three days before that; I could not tell you exactly. Q. Did the Northern Oil Company, before it would close the trade for the purchase of the Gate City, require this judgment to be paid off? A. Yes; they would not take the property with any lien on it of any kind. Q. Didn't you get that cashier's check from the bank at Riverbank for the purpose of using it in satisfying this judgment? A. I did not get all the money— Q. (interrupting). Will you answer my question? A. For the purpose of paying that off? I got that check for the purpose of giving that money to Mr. Lynch, or letting him have it so he could pay it off. Q. Obtain it for the purpose of paying the judgment of the Gate City Oil Company? A. What I am telling you, for the purpose of lending it to Mr. Lynch so he could go and pay it over. Q. Did you intend that the $8,000 evidenced by the cashier's check should be used in satisfying the bank's judgment against the Gate City Oil Company? A. Yes, sir; I did. Q. That was your intention and purpose when you withdrew that money from the bank at Riverbank, was it not? Q. Yes, sir. * * * Q. Whose money was that money in the Bank of Riverbank, when you obtained the cashier's certificate? A. It was mine. Q. Whose money was it that you drew a $250 check for? A. That was mine. Q. In a Los Angeles bank? That was your money? A. That was mine. Q. And it was the check of yours you had drawn upon the bank of Los Angeles for $250, and the $8,000 cashier's check of the Bank of Riverbank, that you had with you at the Anglo-Bank in San Francisco? A. Yes, sir. * * * Q. At that time you were interested, as manager of the Gate City Oil Company, in selling its properties to the Northern Oil Company, were you not? A. I was not manager, but I was interested in selling it; I was vice president. Q. You were there for the purpose of doing whatever the Northern Oil Company required, so that you could close the trade in selling the Gate City Oil Company property? A. That is what I was there for, to clean up the title. I was vice president of the Gate City Oil Company that was defendant in the San Joaquin Valley Bank suit; I was a bondsman on the appeal in that case, and had not been released therefrom at the time I met Mr. Lynch in San Francisco. Q. The only security that Mr. Lynch gave you for this $8,150 is represented in this agreement that has been offered and received in evidence? A. That is all. Q. In other words, you were to let him have the money, he was to pay it, and then he was to call upon these other people for contribution, and whatever he received upon contribution he was to pay back to you? A. Yes, sir. * * * Q. In other words, you used this money you speak of for the purpose of getting some money back out of J. Jerome Smith and F. F. Giottonini? A. Yes, sir. Q. While if you paid it as the Gate City Oil Company's money, then, as between you, you could not get any of it back, is that not so? A. No; that is not properly so; I am not in the habit of loaning $8,000 upon such security. Q. Didn't you just simply transfer this money into Mr. Lynch's name so you might come back in and obtain from Giottonini and Smith some portion of that money? A. My idea was to get the money; I just made the deal with Mr. Lynch so Mr. Lynch could pay the judgment, and then Mr. Lynch, when he recovered back, was to pay me back the amount of money that he got; and, if I say so, he will have to pay it all back. Q. In other words, you are using Mr. Lynch as a convenience to get back some of the money from Smith and Giottonini? * * * A. I did not put it that way, as 'a convenience.' Q. Well, you expected, by operating through Mr. Lynch in the way you have testified, that you stood a chance to get back some of the money from Smith and Giottonini? A. Yes; I thought I would get it back."

He testified further that upon delivery of his checks to the Anglo Bank, the Northern Oil Company paid him $4,000, which was the first installment to be paid upon the transfer of the property, and he deposited that money to his credit in the Bank of Riverbank, and that the Northern Oil Company also delivered the notes and other securities making up the balance of the purchase price.

Defendant J. F. Lynch testified that he met Mr. Flack in San Francisco on the 6th of July, 1915, and, being asked what occurred at the time between them, answered:

"Well, I had explained to Mr. Flack in Stockton before, in reference to this judgment, and I told him that I was a little afraid about this judgment, that the execution might issue and be levied upon my property, and that he had agreed to help me out in the matter, and I expected him to do so, and he said he would see about it."

He testified he received checks from Mr. Flack to the amount of $8,250 on the 6th of July, and that he deposited it in the bank at San Francisco.

"Q. What was afterwards done with it? A. It was sent to the bank here in Stockton to pay this San Joaquin Valley Bank judgment. I am the applicant for contribution here. I was present when this memorandum was made on the judgment book H of the superior court of this county. The money was paid over at that time and place as there indicated, and it was my money; I borrowed it from Mr. Flack; I have not paid him back; I still owe him the money."

W. F. Duffy, cashier of the Anglo & London-Paris National Bank, made affidavit:

"That on or about the 6th day of July, 1915, one C. L. Flack, accompanied by one J. F. Lynch, and two gentlemen representing the Northern Oil Company, came to said Anglo & London-Paris National Bank, and said Flack then and there delivered to affiant a cashier's check on the First National Bank of Riverbank, in the sum of $8,000, and a check of C. L. Flack drawn on the First National Bank of Los Angeles, in the sum of $250, and instructed affiant that said check be forwarded by said Anglo & London-Paris National Bank to the Stockton Savings & Loan Society, at Stockton, Cal., to be by said Stockton Savings & Loan Society utilized to whatever extent might be necessary to satisfy the judgment, interest, and costs, laying in judgment, rendered in favor of the San Joaquin Valley Bank against the Gate City Oil Company, the proceeds, if any, remaining after the satisfaction of such judgment, interest, and costs, to be returned to said Anglo & London-Paris National Bank and held subject to the order of said C. L. Flack; that said C. L. Flack, or said J. F. Lynch, stated to affiant at said time and place that he wanted it to be understood that the aforesaid sum of $8,250 was being paid by said J. F. Lynch; that immediately after handing affiant the aforesaid checks, said C. L. Flack deposited with said Anglo & London-Paris National Bank, to the credit of the aforesaid First National Bank of Riverbank, a voucher check drawn by Northern Oil Company, in favor of Gate City Oil Company, in the amount of $4,000."

Thomas E. Connolly, cashier of the Stockton Savings & Loan Society, made affidavit that on the 7th day of July, 1915, he had a conversation by telephone with the Anglo & London-Paris National Bank with reference to the payment of the judgment in question, in which he was informed by the latter bank that a deposit of $8,250 had been made with the latter bank to be used in satisfying said judgment, and on the same day he received a letter from that bank dated July 6th, informing his bank of the deposit and the purpose for which it was made, and stating, among other things:

"Mr. J. F. Lynch, as one of the interested parties, states that he will call on you to-morrow morning, and desires to co-operate with you in the satisfaction of this judgment. Mr. Lynch, however, is without authority in the matter, and we would request that prompt action be taken in accordance with the terms of this letter. It is his desire that when payment is made it shall be specifically stated in the records that it is he, personally, who is satisfying the judgment, his object being to lay the foundation for a claim against his codefendants for their proportion of the judgment. If it can be handled in this way, it will be an act of courtesy to Mr. Lynch, but the judgment should be satisfied even if his wishes in this respect cannot be met."

The letter closes with a request that report be made of the satisfaction of the judgment, etc.

R. B. Teefy, cashier of the San Joaquin Valley Bank, plaintiff in the action, made affidavit:

That Thomas E. Connolly, cashier of Stockton Savings & Loan Society, on July 8, 1915, "handed witness, as cashier of plaintiff company, a certificate of deposit for the sum of $8,145.22, drawn in favor of the said San Joaquin Valley Bank as and for the payment in full of the judgment heretofore rendered in favor of the San Joaquin Valley Bank and as against said defendants in the action entitled as above. That said deponent on behalf of the said San Joaquin Valley Bank thereupon accepted said certificate of deposit in full payment and satisfaction of said judgment, and entered upon the records in said clerk's office the following statement, to wit: 'The within judgment is hereby fully paid, satisfied, and discharged this 8th day of July, 1915, by the payment of the sum of $8,145.22 same being the money of J. F. Lynch. [Signed] The San Joaquin Valley Bank, by R. B. Teefy, Cashier.'"

He further deposed:

"That deponent did not at said time know, and does not now know, who furnished the money for the payment of said judgment as evidenced by said certificate of deposit, but that one J. F. Lynch was present at the time of said payment and said delivery of said certificate of deposit by said Thomas E. Connolly to deponent, and then and there requested deponent to make the written statement, 'same being money of J. F. Lynch.' That deponent was advised by counsel that such writing could work no injury to said the San Joaquin Valley Bank, and as a matter of closing the transaction, deponent wrote said statement 'same being money of J. F. Lynch.'"

A copy of the certificate of deposit referred to showed that the money was deposited by the Stockton Savings & Loan Society.

[1] It is unnecessary to go further into the evidence, of which there was, together with the facts above appearing, sufficient to show that the claim made by respondents, quoted above from their brief, is clearly established, and that the court was fully justified in making its findings, and that the order appealed from is abundantly supported. It seems to us that what took place between Flack and Lynch in the Anglo & London-Paris National Bank, at the time Flack's certified check on the Bank of Riverbank for $8,000 and his check on a Los Angeles bank for $250 were passed over the counter of said Anglo Bank, was mere camouflage, which failed to conceal the true nature of the transaction.

[2] Appellant urges the point that it was error for the court to admit, over appellant's objection, the various affidavits introduced by respondents to meet the motion which was itself based upon Lynch's affidavit. There is no merit in this contention. Code Civ. Proc. § 2009; California M. & S. Bank v. Graves, 129 Cal. 649, 62 Pac. 259; Guardianship of Van Loan, 142 Cal. 423, 76 Pac. 37.

The entry on the margin of the judgment book referring to the payment of the judgment, to wit, "same being the money of J. F. Lynch," was the statement of an immaterial fact, was unknown to be the fact by the cashier of the bank who made it, and was made to carry out the plan concocted in the Anglo & London-Paris National Bank. It was not conclusive on anybody, and was in violation of the actual facts. Appellant's right to contribution under section 709, Code of Civil Procedure, depended entirely upon his paying the judgment, and as he did not pay it, he failed to establish any right to contribution.

[3] There is no question as to the scope of section 709 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for it has been held by this court that a rule of procedure, and not a maxim of substantive law, is announced by that statute. It simply provides a convenient method of enforcing contribution by a judgment debtor who had paid a judgment as against a codefendant or codefendants liable for a proportion of the debt. Dow v. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co., 162 Cal. 136, 138, 121 Pac. 379.

Respondents advance the point that the principal debtor, the Gate City Oil Company, and J. F. Lynch having appealed from the judgment, and having given an undertaking staying execution of the judgment, the original sureties (respondents here) were thereby released so far as any right to contribution is concerned. This for the reason that:

"If the rule were otherwise, it would permit the property of the principal debtor to be released and disposed of, and thereby shift payment to other and prior sureties" (citing cases).

We do not find it necessary to pass upon the point. The order of the court finds ample support in the evidence, and it is therefore affirmed.

SILVA et al. v. AZEVEDO et al. (Sac. 2569.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 3, 1918. Rehearing Denied Aug. 2, 1918.)

1. BOUNDARIES 🔑46(1) — PRACTICAL LOCATION—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Where adjoining landowners, after employing surveyor to locate dividing line, construct a substantial fence thereon, and for more than six years regard such fence as the true boundary, improving and cultivating land up to fence, the owners will be deemed to have agreed on fence as true boundary.

2. BOUNDARIES 🔑46(1)—AGREEMENT—VALIDITY.

Adjoining owners cannot, by agreement, establish a boundary they know is not true boundary; such agreement constituting transfer of land which is possible only through conveyance.

3. BOUNDARIES 🔑46(3) — AGREEMENT — EFFECT.

Where a fence has been accepted as true boundary line for a period greater than that fixed by statute of limitations, and during such time adjoining landowners have improved and cultivated land up to fence, the boundary will not be changed upon discovery that fence was not originally built on true dividing line.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Manuel I. Silva and others against Joseph V. Azevedo and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

S. Luke Howe and Downey, Pullen & Downey, all of Sacramento, for appellants. Driver & Driver, B. F. Van Dyke, and Frank Tade, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Ejectment to recover a strip of land containing about 6½ acres. Judgment went for plaintiffs, and the defendants appeal. The plaintiffs are the successors in interest of Manuel Silva. The defendants are husband and wife. For purposes of statement and discussion, we may treat the case as if Manuel Silva were the plaintiff, and Joseph V. Azevedo the sole defendant. In 1908, Azevedo purchased a tract of farming land, containing something over 126 acres, in Sacramento. The parcel was quadrilateral, its easterly and westerly lines being parallel, the southerly line meeting these at right angles, and the northerly line running diagonally from northeast to southwest. Roughly speaking, the length of the parcel, from north to south, was about three times its width, from east to west. Prior to the purchase of the tract there had been an understanding that the land was to be divided equally between Silva and Azevedo. Accordingly, Azevedo conveyed to Silva the east half of his holding, the land granted being described in the deed by metes and bounds. A fence was built, dividing the entire tract into two parcels, and each proceeded to occupy, improve, and farm the land on his side of the fence. After some six years, Silva discovered that the fence had been placed about 70 feet too far east, and that a part of the land described in his deed, comprising the strip in controversy, was in Azevedo's possession. The present action resulted.

Azevedo's defense was based, principally, upon the claim that the fence line had been agreed upon as the boundary between the two parcels, and that such agreement was binding upon the parties. The rule invoked is a familiar one. An early case applying it, and one that has frequently been cited in this court, is Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 619. The scope and effect of the doctrine are thus defined in Young v. Blakeman, 153 Cal. 477, 95 Pac. 888:

> "When such [adjoining] owners, being uncertain of the true position of the boundary so [in their deeds] described, agree upon its true location, mark it upon the ground, or build up to it, occupy on each side up to the place thus fixed and acquiesce in such location for a period equal to the statute of limitations, or under such circumstances that substantial loss would be caused by a change of its position, such line becomes, in law, the true line called for by the respective descriptions, regardless of the accuracy of the agreed location as it may appear by subsequent measurements."

In the present case, the court found that there was no uncertainty as to the location of the boundary line, and no agreement between the parties that the fence line should be taken to be the true boundary. We think, however, that these findings, if not at variance with the more specific facts found, are without support in the evidence. It is found (and the evidence shows without conflict) that before the execution of the deed from Azevedo to Silva the entire tract theretofore acquired by Azevedo had not been divided, nor had the boundary line between the east and west halves thereof been marked upon the ground; that Azevedo and Silva, acting jointly, engaged a surveyor to survey the tract, to divide the same into east and west halves, to furnish a particular description by metes and bounds of the east half for use in the deed to be executed, and to locate upon the ground, by means of stakes, the division line between the east and west halves. The surveyor made the survey and furnished the description, which was carried into the deed, and correctly described, by metes and bounds, the east half of the tract. He also established a line of stakes upon the ground, but by mistake located these stakes too far to the east, thus throwing the disputed strip into the westerly subdivision of the tract. Neither Silva nor Azevedo knew of said mistake. The two joined in building a substantial fence on the line marked by the stakes, believing such line to be the true line called for by the deed. Azevedo has ever since been in possession of the land lying to the west of the fence, and has made valuable and permanent improvements on the strip in controversy, relying upon "the mutual mistaken belief of all parties" that the fence was located upon the true division line. It appears, further, that one-half of the surveyor's charge was paid by each of the parties, and that each contributed one-half of the money and the labor expended in the building of the fence.

[1] On this state of facts, we think there was no room for any other inference than that the line indicated by the surveyor as the dividing line between the two holdings, and followed by the erection of a fence by the two parties, was agreed on by them as the true boundary. It is argued that the "agreed boundary" rule applies only where there is an uncertainty regarding the position of the boundary, and that in this case there was no such uncertainty, since the true location of the line could always have been determined by a correct measurement. But this condition exists in virtually every case in which the aid of the rule is sought. There is no occasion for asserting that a boundary has been established by agreement, unless the description in the conveyance in reality designates a different boundary. "It is only where the true location is subsequently ascertained that actions of this kind arise." Price v. De Reyes, 161 Cal. 484, 489, 119 Pac. 893. That Silva and Azevedo were, in fact, in doubt as to the place where the dividing line should run is apparent from the circumstances, and from their conduct. To properly locate, on the ground, the boundaries of a tract of somewhat irregular shape and containing 56 acres is a task calling for knowledge and skill of a more or less expert character. That the parties thought they needed the assistance of some one possessing the requisite ability is conclusively shown by their employment of a surveyor to locate and mark the division line between the two halves of the larger tract. The only purpose they could have had in so doing was to fix definitely, by proper measurement and marking, the boundary, which, until it was so ascertained and marked, must have remained uncertain in their minds. When, then, acting upon the information so given them, they joined in the construction of a substantial fence on the line, and proceeded, respectively, to improve and cultivate up to the fence, the only theory upon which their acts can reasonably be explained is that they had agreed upon the fence line as the true location of the west boundary of the land conveyed to Silva. It is true that both were mistaken in believing that the line so fixed was the true line. But this does not prevent the application of the rule. Sneed v. Osborn, supra; Biggins v. Champlin, 59 Cal. 113.

[2, 3] It is true, as has repeatedly been held, that adjoining owners cannot, by their mere agreement, establish a boundary other than the true one, where they know that the line attempted to be fixed is not, in fact, the true boundary. Nathan v. Dierssen, 134 Cal. 282, 66 Pac. 485; Lewis v. Ogram, 149 Cal. 505, 87 Pac. 60, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 610, 117 Am. St. Rep. 151; Mann v. Mann, 152 Cal. 23, 91 Pac. 994. In such cases the parties are merely endeavoring to transfer land from one to the other, an object that can be accomplished only by means of a conveyance. No such situation is presented here. Nor is the case parallel to Clapp v. Churchill, 164 Cal. 741, 130 Pac. 1061, where it was held that the doctrine of an agreed boundary line could not apply where one of the coterminous owners believed that a certain line marked the boundary, but there was no evidence of any such belief on the part of the other. In this case it is apparent that both Silva and Azevedo, thinking that the line fixed by the surveyor was the true boundary described in the deed, accepted such line as the division between their holdings, built a fence upon it, and occupied and improved up to the fence. We have here not only a continued acquiescence in the line so fixed, and an occupation in accordance with it for a period beyond that fixed by the statute of limitations, but the erection of substantial and permanent improvements upon the disputed piece by the defendant. It would be a manifest injustice to permit him to be ousted now merely because the plaintiffs have, by a new survey, discovered that their predecessor and the defendant were in error in the original establishment of the line. "If the position of the line always remained to be ascertained by measurement alone, the result would be that it would not be a fixed boundary, but would be subject to change with every new measurement. Such uncertainty and instability in the title to land would be intolerable." Young v. Blakeman, supra.

The judgment is reversed.

Complaint charging that defendant in named city and county of state, on or about given date, before filing of complaint, unlawfully, maliciously, and willfully disturbed peace, and quiet of named person by loud and unusual noise and tumultuous conduct, etc., held to state facts constituting public offense under Pen. Lindemann, C. E. Schilling, C. C. Holzel, C. Hoffman, H. E. Frank, and B. L. Shubert. Denied.

Joseph P. Lacey, of Oakland, for petitioners.

PER CURIAM. These are applications for writs of habeas corpus. The petitioner in each case is held under a judgment pronounced upon a conviction in the police court of the city of Oakland of the crime known as disturbing the peace.

The judgment of the police court has been affirmed by the superior court of the county of Alameda. The sole ground of the applications for the writs is that the complaint in the police court wholly failed to state a public offense under the laws of the state of California.

[1, 2] The complaint in each case charged that the defendants did "in the city of Oakland and in the county of Alameda, and state of California, on or about the 24th day of February, A. D. 1918, and prior to the filing of this complaint, unlawfully, maliciously and willfully disturb the peace and quiet of N. B. Myran by loud and unusual noise and by tumultuous and offensive conduct; said and all of the acts of the said defendant in the premises were and are contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California." We are of the opinion that it must be held that such a complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a public offense under section 415 of the Penal Code. To our minds Ex parte Foley, 62 Cal. 508, is in point, and sustains our conclusion that it is sufficient to charge such an offense in the language of the statute.

In each of the above-entitled matters the application for a writ of habeas corpus is denied.

Where both parties to deed in escrow abandoned transaction, subsequent delivery of deed by one obtaining equitable title from grantor was not a delivery in pursuance of escrow instructions, and passage of title did not relate back to time of delivery in escrow.

5. Judgment 🔑788(1)—Lien on Land — Priority.

When judgment creditor records judgment in another county, in which there are lands of judgment debtor, he obtains a lien, but no rights as against outstanding unrecorded deeds or latent equitable titles of third persons.

6. Execution 🔑272(1)—Purchasers—Bona Fides.

Purchaser at execution sale on judgment recorded in another county than that in which rendered acquires title to lands sold, which is prior to any unrecorded deed or rights of equitable owners of which he has no actual or constructive notice.

7. Deeds 🔑194(3) — Presumptions — Delivery.

Date of recorded deed would at least put subsequent purchasers on inquiry as to time of delivery; presumption being that a deed is delivered on day of its date.

8. Execution 🔑272(2) — Claims by Third Parties—Persons in Possession.

Possession of land is constructive notice to purchaser at sale under execution, sufficient to put him on inquiry as to rights of person in possession and those under whom he is claiming.

9. Deeds 🔑195—Presumptions—Consideration.

A conveyance, not impeached is presumed to have been supported by a sufficient consideration.

10. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑238 — Purchaser from Bona Fide Purchaser.

In an action to quiet title, where defendant claimed under a sale under execution, and plaintiff showed conveyance to third person by judgment debtor, prior to judgment, for a sufficient consideration, it was immaterial that there was no consideration paid by plaintiff to judgment debtor's grantee.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action to quiet title by J. H. Whitney against W. H. A. Sherman. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stutsman & Stutsman, of Los Angeles, for appellant. C. G. Selleck, of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant's appeal is from the judgment. The complaint states a cause of action to quiet the title of plaintiff to a parcel of land in San Diego county against the alleged unfounded claims of the defendant.

Both parties derive title from one G. H. Lewis. It was agreed at the trial that Lewis was the owner of the lots on August 22, 1911. Plaintiff's chain of title from Lewis is as follows: On August 22, 1911, Lewis signed and acknowledged a deed purporting to convey said lot to Roberta E. Hiles. The deed was not then delivered to the grantee, but, together with a contract of the same date by Lewis to sell the lots to Roberta E. Hiles, was deposited in escrow with the Marine National Bank, with written instructions by Lewis to the bank to deliver the deed to Hiles on payment of the full price in accordance with the terms of the contract. The contract provided that the price was $1,300, and that the buyer was to pay the same in monthly installments of $10 each, until the price was fully paid. Up to February 15, 1913, payments were made thereon amounting to $312.30. No more was ever paid. The escrow instructions provided that, if said buyer failed to make the payments as stipulated, all the papers in escrow were to be returned to Lewis. On February 16, 1913, Lewis and Hiles went to the bank and there abandoned the escrow, and all the papers in escrow, except the instructions, were then taken by Lewis and Hiles to the office of Mr. Mossholder, in San Diego, and left with him. The court below found that, prior to the recording of the judgment hereinafter referred to, Lewis sold his interest in the lots to his father-in-law, Slocum, for $1,000, which was paid to him in cash. There was evidence sufficient to support this finding. After the escrow was abandoned, Slocum in some manner transferred his interest in the lots to Whitney. On April 10, 1913, Hiles executed and delivered a deed purporting to convey the lots to plaintiff, Whitney. On April 19, 1913, Whitney executed a contract to sell the lots to Hiles for $1,073.73, payable in monthly installments of $10 each thereafter. Said sum was the estimated amount of principal and interest unpaid on the sale of August 22, 1911, by Lewis to Hiles. The deed of August 22, 1911, from Lewis to Hiles, was delivered to Hiles immediately before the execution of the deed by Hiles to Whitney on April 10, 1913, and it was recorded on April 21, 1913. The evidence shows that the delivery was made by Mr. Whitney, not by Lewis. The defendant's chain of title from Lewis is much simpler. On January 31, 1913, he recovered a judgment against Lewis in the superior court of Los Angeles county for $3,750. A certified copy of this judgment was duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of San Diego county on February 15, 1913, which, it must be noted, was one day prior to the abandonment of the Lewis-Hiles escrow. Execution was issued on this judgment, and pursuant to regular notice the lot was sold thereon to defendant on April 26, 1913, for $500 credited on the judgment. There was no redemption, and a sheriff's deed thereon was duly executed to defendant on April 30, 1914.

[1] The defendant does not claim that he has, by any pleading, set up in defense the charge that the deal whereby the interest of Lewis was sold to Whitney, the escrow deed delivered by Whitney to Hiles, the lots reconveyed by Hiles to Whitney, and the new agreement of sale executed by Whitney to Hiles, was a scheme carried out with the intent to defraud him, and therefore void as against him. The intimations to that effect in his brief must therefore be disregarded.

[2] His principal claim is that his judgment became a lien on the title of Lewis to the land prior to the acquisition of any right or interest in the land by Slocum, Hiles, or Whitney, and hence that his title under the execution sale thereon is paramount to the title of Whitney. The judgment became a lien on whatever title Lewis had in the land on February 15, 1913. The evidence shows that the sale by Lewis to Hiles was abandoned, and in effect canceled, and that the deed whereby it was to be consummated was taken by Lewis on February 16, 1913, and afterward delivered to Hiles. If Lewis held the beneficial interest, as well as the title, when he took the deed from escrow, the judgment would be a lien thereon, and the title of defendant under the sheriff's deed would prevail.

[3] The general rule regarding the passing of title by deeds put in escrow is stated in Civil Code, § 1057, as follows:

> "A grant may be deposited by the grantor with a third person, to be delivered upon performance of a condition, and, on delivery by the depositary it will take effect."

Under this rule no title passes until the condition is so far performed that the grantee is entitled to the possession of the deed. There is an exception to this rule where the condition upon which the deed is to be delivered is one which is certain to occur, regardless of any act of the parties, such, for example, as the death of the grantor. In those cases it has been held that the title to the property passes to the grantee at the time of the deposit of the deed in escrow, subject, however, to a life estate in the property in the grantor. Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 450, 33 Pac. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186; Husheon v. Kelley, 162 Cal. 660, 124 Pac. 231; Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 637, 151 Pac. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703. But that exception, as was explained in Bury v. Young, "results unavoidably from the certainty of the event upon which the second delivery is made to depend and from the impossibility under the circumstances that the grantor would ever be able to recall or repossess himself of the deed." To the same effect see Prutsman v. Baker, 30 Wis. 650–652, 11 Am. Rep. 592; Cook v. Brown, 34 N. H. 460. In the present case the condition was not certain of fulfillment, and it depended upon the conduct of the grantee. To such a case the exception does not apply.

[4] The delivery of the deed in escrow became ineffectual for any purpose when the parties abandoned it. The subsequent delivery by Whitney in April after he had become an equitable owner of the interest of Lewis in the lots, was not a delivery in pursuance of the escrow instructions, and it became effective only from the time of such delivery. It passed the title of Lewis as of that date, and not before. It did not relate back to the time of the delivery in escrow.

[5-10] At the time of the recording of the judgment Slocum was the equitable owner of the title to the lots, subject to the rights of Hiles under the escrow agreement. When the judgment creditor records his judgment in another county, in which there are lands of the judgment debtor, he obtains thereby a lien on the lands but no right in the lands as against outstanding unrecorded deeds or latent equitable titles of third persons. 2 Freeman on Judgments, § 357. If execution issues on such judgment and a sale takes place thereon, the execution purchaser will acquire title to the land, which will be prior to any unrecorded deed or rights of equitable owners of which he has no notice, actual or constructive. But if he has notice thereof he will take subject thereto. Foorman v. Wallace, 75 Cal. 552, 17 Pac. 680; Bank of Ukiah v. Petaluma S. Bank, 100 Cal. 590, 35 Pac. 170; Wilhoit v. Lyons, 98 Cal. 409, 33 Pac. 325. At the time the defendant purchased the land at the execution sale on his judgment, the deed of Lewis to Hiles, dated in August, 1911, was on record. It gave constructive notice of its contents to all subsequent purchasers. The date of that deed would at least put them on inquiry as to the time of delivery, the presumption being that a deed is delivered on the day of its date. Furthermore, Hiles took possession of the lots in August 1911, and remained in actual possession and occupancy from that time until the purchase by Sherman in April, 1913. At the time of the execution sale she was holding under a contract of purchase from Whitney, and her possession inured to the benefit of Whitney and operated to give constructive notice to any purchaser of the lots sufficient to put him on inquiry as to her rights, and those of Whitney, in the land. Morrison v. Wilson, 13 Cal. 500, 73 Am. Dec. 593; Dreyfus v. Hirt, 82 Cal. 625, 23 Pac. 193; Scheerer v. Cuddy, 85 Cal. 272, 24 Pac. 713; Beattie v. Crewdson, 124 Cal. 577, 57 Pac. 463.

There is no evidence tending to show that Sherman was not aware of the rights of the parties under the transfer from Lewis to Slocum at the time he made his purchase on the execution sale. He testified that he had no knowledge thereof at the time his judgment was recorded, but gave no evidence that he had not received actual notice thereof prior to his purchase. Under all these circumstances, the title of Lewis under his sheriff's deed is subject to the superior rights of Whitney. Slocum paid an adequate consideration at the time of his purchase from Lewis; the consideration of the sale from Slocum to Whitney has not been impeached, and is presumed to be sufficient. In any event, Whitney could rely upon the consideration paid by Slocum for the lots, and would be subrogated to his rights, even if he had received the lots as a gift. The delivery of the deed of Lewis to Mrs. Hiles, and her deed to Whitney, vested the title in Whitney, free from all rights of the defendant under the sheriff's deed. For these reasons we are of the opinion that the court below properly decided in favor of the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SOLDAVINI. (Cr. 729.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 22, 1918.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑396(1)—EVIDENCE ADMISSIBLE BY REASON OF ADMISSION OF SIMILAR EVIDENCE.

Where defendant did not object to admission of letter to him from deceased containing veiled threats and calling defendant a traitor, reason for unfriendly relations being couched in ambiguous terms, and defendant denied he had ever done anything to deceased as a traitor, it was proper to permit state to show in rebuttal that defendant had made improper advances to wife of deceased, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1854.

2. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1169(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

Even if admission of evidence was erroneous, a conviction will not be set aside, where an examination of the entire cause shows that no miscarriage of justice occurred.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Frank Soldavini was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. V. Riccardi, of Los Angeles, and Jeff L. Maloy, of San Jose, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was charged by information with the murder of one Tacchi, alleged to have been committed on the 26th day of October, 1917, in Marin county. He was tried and convicted of manslaughter, an indeterminate sentence being imposed. From the judgment and from an order denying a new trial defendant appeals.

[1] The only question raised upon the appeal is whether the trial court erred in permitting the wife of the deceased to testify that the defendant had made improper advances to her several months previous to the homicide. During the trial there was introduced in evidence, without objection, a letter written by Tacchi to defendant, which contained veiled threats and in which Tacchi called the defendant "traitor," and from which it was apparent that ill feeling existed between them, the reason for the unfriendly relation being couched in ambiguous terms. The defendant, when asked what there was in the letter which made him feel so badly that he cried, replied, "There was there that I was a defamer and defaming his family and those things." Upon redirect examination the defendant denied that he had ever defamed Tacchi's family, or that he had ever done anything to him as a traitor. To rebut this testimony it was proper to permit in evidence testimony to the effect that the defendant, several months prior to the homicide, had made improper advances to the wife of the deceased. It was also proper testimony to explain the insinuations contained in the letter as to the reason of the unfriendly relation between the deceased and defendant. Code Civ. Proc. § 1854.

[2] But even if the admission of the evidence in question were erroneous, the judgment should not be set aside, for an examination of the entire cause shows that no miscarriage of justice occurred.

Judgment affirmed.

WHITE et al. v. WESTERN FISH CO. et al. (Civ. 2288.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 16, 1918. Rehearing Denied June 15, 1918.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑1011(1)—Review—Findings on Conflicting Evidence.

Findings of trial court on conflicting and contradictory evidence will not be disturbed.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑1013—Review — Finding of Damages.

Where testimony as to damages was conflicting, question was for trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Gustin White and George Bogan, copartners, etc., against the Western Fish Company and Antonio Trapani. From judgment for plaintiffs against him, Trapani appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Madden, of San Francisco, for appellant. Harry I. Stafford, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The appellant, Antonio Trapani, while driving his automobile at the intersection of Webster and Geary streets in the city of San Francisco one stormy night, collided with a taxicab owned by the plaintiffs. The trial court gave judgment against Trapani for $520.05, and from this judgment he appeals.

[1] The appeal presents nothing but the disputed question of fact whether the collision was due to the negligence of the plaintiff's driver or the defendant Trapani. The evidence, as is usual in such cases, is conflicting and contradictory. The trial court accepted the statements of plaintiff's witnesses. We have examined the record with care, and find no reason to disturb the findings of the trial court.

[2] Complaint is made that the damages awarded were too large, but on this subject also the testimony was conflicting, and it was a question for the trial court to determine.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SWENSON. (Cr. 741.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 16, 1918. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 15, 1918.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑1159(4) — Review — Findings of Fact.

In a prosecution for attempting to commit a lewd act on the person of a child, jury's determination as to the truth or falsity of defendant's explanation of his presence at the place where the crime was charged to have been committed will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Criminal Law 🔑829(1) — Instructions —Instructions Covered.

In a prosecution for attempting to commit a lewd act, refusal to give stock instructions requested by defendant was not error, where such instructions were in effect given in different language.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Andrew Swenson was convicted of attempting to commit a lewd act, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas P. Wickes and Karl F. Kennedy, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was accused of committing a lewd act, as denounced in section 288 of the Penal Code, upon the person of a child 3½ years of age. He was convicted of an attempt to commit this crime. He was found in a basement with the child. Her clothes were down. She had a nickel, which she said he gave her. He contradicted this statement. He ran when discovered emerging from the basement, but was pursued and arrested.

[1] Various plausible explanations of his situation and conduct are offered by his counsel, upon which we are asked to say that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence. All these explanations were by the record presented to the jury. We cannot, nor have we any disposition to, usurp their functions in determining the truth or falsity of these explanations. It is also contended that the evidence failed to show an attempt to commit the crime. We think, however, that it is sufficient for this purpose.

[2] Some complaint is made of the refusal of the court to give certain stock instructions requested by the defendant; but these instructions were all given—in different language, it is true, but in effect—by the court in its charge to the jury.

The judgment is affirmed.

MARYLAND CASUALTY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

(S. F. 8624.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 3, 1918. Rehearing Denied Aug. 1, 1918.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑417(8)—AWARDS OF INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION—REVIEW.

Irregularities or errors in mere matters of procedure do not affect jurisdiction of Industrial Accident Commission to make awards, and are not grounds upon which reviewing court may vacate award.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑417(8)—AWARDS OF INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION—REVIEW.

On certiorari to review award of Industrial Accident Commission, court will not set aside award because of admission of incompetent testimony; there being enough competent evidence admitted to sustain award.

3. INSURANCE 🔑435—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION—"OPERATING A FARM MACHINE."

An engineer, in charge of a caterpillar engine used to pull a disc harrow at night, would be "operating a farm machine," within policy of insurance carrier covering employés engaged in "general farm work, excluding the operation of farm machinery"; but deceased, who was assisting by means of a lantern in harrowing, and had nothing to do with engine at time of accident, would not.

4. INSURANCE 🔑146(3)—POLICY OF INSURER—CONSTRUCTION.

Uncertain provisions of policy of insurance carrier will be construed most strongly against it, in view of Civ. Code, § 1654.

In Bank. Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Hulda V. Dobson for compensation for the death of her husband, in the employ of George C. Ellis. There was an award against the Maryland Casualty Company, insurance carrier, and it brings certiorari. Award affirmed.

John Ralph Wilson, of San Francisco, and Charles B. Morris, of San Bernardino, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is a proceeding in certiorari under the Workmen's Compensation Act, to review an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission against the Maryland Casualty Company in favor of Hulda V. Dobson as compensation for the death of her husband, alleged to have occurred from an accident while in the employ of George C. Ellis. The award was made against the Maryland Casualty Company as insurance carrier for Ellis. Its claim is that the policy of insurance does not cover the accident which caused the death of Dobson.

The insurance policy was issued to Ellis by the Casualty Company of America. Afterward, and before the happening of the accident, the Maryland Casualty Company, by agreement with the original insurer, assumed all liability upon the policy, and Ellis accepted it as the insurance carrier. By the terms of the policy the insurer agreed to pay all sums due from Ellis under the Workmen's Compensation Law (St. 1911, p. 796) because of any injury to those of his employés mentioned in the policy. The sixth clause provides as follows:

> "This policy shall cover only employés of the employer, legally employed, whose remuneration is included in said declaration; but nothing in this policy shall be construed as excluding any employé who may become entitled to compensation under the provisions of said Workmen's Compensation Law, and all amendments thereto."

The declarations referred to are contained in a document attached to and made a part of the policy. The employés whose remuneration is therein stated, that are here involved, are therein described as those engaged in "general farm work excluding the operation of farm machinery (no blasting)."

The complainant asks that the award be annulled upon the following grounds: (1) That the commission granted a rehearing to Ellis on the ground of newly discovered evidence, in violation of its own rule requiring such evidence to be set out in detail in the application for a rehearing. (2) In taking further testimony without solicitation from either party. (3) In admitting and considering incompetent testimony relating to the meaning of the policy of insurance in question. (4) In determining that under said policy of insurance the plaintiff as insurance carrier for Ellis is liable to pay compensation for the death of said Dobson.

[1] With respect to the first and second grounds we need only say that irregularities, or errors in mere matters of procedure, do not go to the jurisdiction of the commission to make awards, and are not grounds upon which this court can vacate an award. These grounds relate entirely to matters of procedure.

[2] In like manner this court is unable to set aside an award because of the admission of incompetent evidence, provided there is enough competent evidence admitted to uphold the same. This disposes of the third ground.

[3] The fourth ground presents the only matter for serious consideration. The question is whether or not this court can say that the commission erred as a matter of law, upon the uncontradicted evidence, in determining that the plaintiff herein was liable under the terms of the policy for the compensation awarded. We think the evidence is sufficient to support the award.

In carrying on his farming operations, Ellis used a caterpillar engine, and at the time of this accident it was being used to pull a disc harrow in harrowing a field, in the nighttime. A man named Grimes was the engineer in charge of the caterpillar engine, and was operating it at the time. In going across the field it was necessary to have a light at the other side at the point he wished to reach, so as to guide the engineer on the way. He directed Dobson to stay at one side until he had reached the farther side, and to hold the light at the proper place to guide him on his return. Dobson did so, and, when the engine and harrow had returned, Dobson stepped to the left side of the caterpillar, waited until the disc harrows had got opposite to him, and then put his lantern on a tool box, which was on the disc. This happened about the time the engine was turning to go back. This turn swung the engine and harrow about, so that a bar attached to the harrow caught Dobson and threw him upon the discs, whereby he received the injury. It was no part of Dobson's duty to take care of the engine, except to assist at times in oiling it, and at the time of his injury he was not operating the caterpillar engine in any way, as above stated.

Implements ordinarily found upon a farm, such as plows, harrows, or wagons, are not usually spoken of as "machines" in these times, when such things as mowing machines, reaping machines, threshing machines, and various kinds of traction engines are in common use in doing farm work. The operation of a caterpillar engine to pull a harrow would undoubtedly be within the meaning of the phrase, and the engineer who performed that task would not be covered by this policy. But one who harrows or plows a field, or drives a wagon, is not ordinarily said to be running machinery. There might be various things incidental to harrowing a field, or other farm work, where motor power is in use, that would require the service of a man, or men, in addition to the man who operated the motor engine. The only machine used in such work, as that word is commonly understood, would be the engine. The man in charge of it would be operating a farm machine, but those assisting to do the work of harrowing the field would not be so considered, unless they had something to do with the engine itself. Dobson at times did do something about the machine, as when he filled one of the grease cups, although at such times it was not in motion; but he was not operating the machine when he was standing at one end of the field holding a lantern to guide the engineer on his return from the other end, nor when, the engine having returned, he was placing his lantern on the tool box of the harrow. He was assisting in the work of plowing the field, but was not assisting in the special part of the work requiring the operation of machinery.

[4] If, in view of the particular facts in this case, the phrase "general farm work, excluding the operation of farm machinery," is of uncertain import, then, in resolving such uncertainty, we are to be guided by the rule that in such a case the contract is to be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist. Civ. Code, § 1654. This policy was drawn by the insurer. It caused the uncertainty to exist. It is obvious that the purpose of inserting the exception was to avoid the risks incidental to the operation of machinery, and not to avoid the risks incidental to ordinary farm work. We think, therefore, that the meaning of the phrase should be restricted so that it would include those who were actually engaged upon the machine, and not those who were assisting in general operations for which the machine furnished only the motive power. Giving it this meaning, it will be seen that it does not include the work upon which Dobson was engaged, and that he was not within the exception.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary to discuss the other propositions presented. The award of the commission was therefore properly made against the insurance carrier.

The award is affirmed.

LINDBLOM v. ROUND VALLEY WATER CO. (Sac. 2552.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1918. Rehearing Denied July 26, 1918.)

1. Waters and Water Courses 🔑38—Continuous Flow.

It is not necessary to the existence of a water course that the flow be continuous through the year.

2. Waters and Water Courses 🔑38—Water from Rain and Snow—Definition.

Water comprising the run-off from the usually and annually recurring fall of rain and snow, when running in a defined stream, constitutes a "water course," to which a riparian proprietor's rights attach.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Water Course.]

3. Waters and Water Courses 🔑38—Diversion—Effect.

If a stream were a water course, it would not lose that character by a mere diversion, however long continued, though the rights of a riparian owner might be subordinate to those of the appropriator.

4. Waters and Water Courses 🔑151—"Forfeiture" by Appropriators—"Abandonment."

The "forfeiture" by nonuser, under Civ. Code, § 1411, of a right to appropriate water, is distinct from "abandonment," which depends upon proof of an intent permanently to relinquish the possession and enjoyment of a property right.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Abandonment; Forfeiture.]

5. Waters and Water Courses 🔑152(8)—Nonuser by Appropriator—Evidence of Abandonment.

Nonuser of appropriated water affords evidence from which the intent to abandon, to make out an abandonment, may be inferred; but it is merely evidence of such intent.

6. Waters and Water Courses 🔑151—Nonuser by Appropriator—Statute.

Under Civ. Code, § 1411, failure of appropriator of water for five years to apply it to a beneficial purpose ends the right, regardless of the question of intent, and, after partial failure, appropriator can hold as against one subsequent in right only maximum quantity he has used.

7. Waters and Water Courses 🔑144—Right of Appropriator—Usufructuary Character.

All that a water company could acquire by diverting or impounding the water of a stream was a usufructuary right, not an ownership in the corpus of the water, except perhaps so much as it actually reduced to possession in its reservoir.

8. Waters and Water Courses 🔑132—Prescriptive Rights—Impounding for Storage.

Prescriptive rights of appropriator of water do not extend to impounding of water for mere purpose of holding it in storage, which is not of itself a beneficial use.

9. Waters and Water Courses 🔑151—Right of Appropriator—Forfeiture by Nonuser—Statute.

If water company ceased for more than five years to apply to beneficial use part of water appropriated from stream and impounded in reservoir, under Civ. Code, § 1411, it cannot continue diversion and storage of water in excess of its legitimate needs; a riparian owner, who became such subsequent to acquisition of company's rights, complaining.

10. Waters and Water Courses 🔑143—Right of Public Water Company—Diversion.

A water company supplying a public use is entitled to divert and impound water in excess of its exact daily requirement at a given time in order to provide for loss or wastage, anticipated growth in demand, etc.

11. Waters and Water Courses 🔑152(8)—Beneficial Use—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In action to enjoin water company from cutting off flow of water of stream to mining property, evidence held not to sustain finding that for more than 40 years water company and predecessors had continuously applied all water dammed to beneficial purposes.

12. Waters and Water Courses 🔑151—Forfeiture by Nonuser—Effect.

Water company, which dammed stream but failed to make beneficial use of water impounded, a riparian proprietor subsequent in right complaining, cannot be required to use dam to keep constant supply running in stream, which previously was dry in summer, but need only allow escape, during months of natural flow, of surplus it does not require.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by E. O. Lindblom against the Round Valley Water Company. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

R. H. Cross and Arthur H. Brandt, both of San Francisco, for appellant. L. N. Peter, of Quincy, and W. H. Spaulding, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The defendant has for many years maintained a reservoir in Round Valley, Plumas county, impounding water by means of a dam at the head of North Canyon, a narrow ravine leading from the northerly end of the valley. Sales of water so stored have been made from time to time to consumers at various points below the dam. When this action was commenced, the plaintiff was in possession, under the then owner, of certain mining property situate in North Canyon, a short distance below the defendant's dam. Pending the suit, plaintiff has acquired title to such property. The action was brought upon the theory that plaintiff's land was riparian to a natural stream running through North Canyon, and that defendant was controlling water impounded by its dam in such manner as to invade plaintiff's riparian rights. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

It will not be necessary, for present purposes, to recite the allegations of the pleadings, or to refer to any of the findings, except those which are made the basis of attack by the appellant. These findings are, in effect, that there is no stream or water course in North Canyon, as alleged by the plaintiff, and that defendant and its predecessor have for more than 40 years last past continuously applied all of the water in the reservoir to useful and beneficial purposes.

[1-3] There is little conflict in the evidence. It appears that the reservoir site covers some 400 acres. The country is mountainous, the surface of the reservoir being at an elevation of over 4,000 feet. The fall of rain and snow on the surrounding hills drains naturally into Round Valley. Whether or not this water reaches the valley through well-defined streams—on this there is some conflict in the testimony—the record leaves no room for doubt that, before any dam was constructed, there was, in the winter and spring of each year, a discharge of a stream of water from the northerly end of the valley into and through North Canyon. This stream was of the character familiar in this state, and in other semiarid regions. It carried a substantial current of water during the season of rainfall, and thereafter while the snows in the surrounding mountains were melting; but the flow ceased entirely as the dry summer season advanced. In ordinary seasons water began to run in November or December, and ceased about June. The bottom of North Canyon bore every aspect of a well-defined stream channel. It is, of course, not necessary to the existence of a water course that the flow should be continuous throughout the year. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 417, 418, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674; Spangler v. San Francisco, 84 Cal. 12, 23 Pac. 1091, 18 Am. St. Rep. 158; Los Angeles Cem. Ass'n v. Los Angeles, 103 Cal. 461, 37 Pac. 375; Huffner v. Sawday, 153 Cal. 86, 94 Pac. 424. The finding that North Canyon was not a water course was, apparently, based upon the theory that the waters running down the ravine were flood waters, and hence not a part of the stream to whose flow the riparian owner was entitled. Gallatin v. Corning Irr. Co., 163 Cal. 405, 126 Pac. 864, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 74. But the record does not support this theory. The evidence is clear to the effect that the water running into Round Valley (and, except as intercepted by the defendant, down North Canyon) consisted of the run-off from the usual, and annually recurring fall of rain and snow. Such water, when running in a defined stream, constitutes a water course to which the riparian proprietor's rights attach. Miller & Lux v. Madera, etc., Co., 155 Cal. 76, 77, 99 Pac. 502, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 391, and cases cited. The first of the findings assailed must therefore be held to be contrary to the evidence. If North Canyon was, under natural conditions, a water course, it would not lose that character by a mere diversion, however long continued, although the rights of the riparian owner might be subordinate to those of the appropriator. We are brought, then, to the consideration of the second of the findings above mentioned, the one which declares that defendant has for many years applied all the water to useful and beneficial purposes.

A dam was first built across the mouth of North Canyon in 1861 or 1862. It was washed out soon after, and another, constructed to replace it, was also carried away. Thereafter a third dam was built by Judkins and Kellogg for the purpose of storing water for sale to mines in the vicinity. In 1876, the defendant purchased the rights of Judkins and Kellogg, and it has been in possession of the property ever since. During all the intervening period it has maintained the dam and the reservoir, and has sold water for the generation of power to mines at various points below the dam. During all this time it has claimed and exercised the right to control all the water coming into its reservoir. At times it has discharged surplus water into North Canyon through a pipe or, later on, through a spillway. But such discharge has been absolutely controlled by it and has been resorted to when it seemed advisable to lower the surface of the reservoir for the protection of the dam. In selling water to consumers defendant has acted as a public service corporation, receiving the rates fixed from time to time by the county board of supervisors.

The plaintiff went into possession of the property now owned by him some months before the commencement of the action. At first he took water from the defendant, paying the regular rates therefor. Thereafter he refused further payment, and the resulting controversy finally culminated in the institution of this action, in which he sought, among other things, an injunction restraining the defendant from cutting off the flow of water to his mining property.

[4-6] About 1883 the defendant had strengthened and enlarged the dam, thereby increasing the storage capacity of its reservoir. It was then serving water to a considerable number of mines, and their requirements were such as to fairly consume the flow which the reservoir could furnish. This state of facts continued, as is conceded by the appellant in its brief, for a sufficiently long period to give the defendant "an appropriative right to all the water draining from the Round Valley watershed to the full extent of the capacity of the reservoir." The appellant further admits, as, under the concession just quoted, he necessarily must that the defendant's diversion and impounding of the water was at one time under a right paramount to the rights of the plaintiff as a riparian proprieter on North Canyon. The sole contention in this regard is that the defendant has, by failing for five years to apply the whole of the water so impounded by it to a useful and beneficial purpose, lost the right it once owned and enjoyed. Section 1411 of the Civil Code provides that:

> "The appropriation must be for some useful or beneficial purpose, and when the appropriator or his successor in interest ceases to use it for such a purpose, the right ceases."

In Smith v. Hawkins, 110 Cal. 122, 42 Pac. 453, it was held that this section lays down a rule for the forfeiture of a right by nonuser. Such forfeiture is entirely distinct from abandonment, which depends upon proof of an intent to permanently relinquish the possession and enjoyment of a property right. Utt v. Frey, 106 Cal. 397, 39 Pac. 807. Nonuser affords evidence from which the intent to abandon may be inferred; but it is merely evidence of such intent. Under section 1411, however, nonuser ends the right regardless of the appropriator's intent. The section does not prescribe any length of time during which the nonuser must continue, but in Smith v. Hawkins the court, applying the analogy of the statutes relating to adverse possession and prescription, laid down the rule that the right was lost by a failure, for a period of five years, to apply the water to a useful or beneficial purpose. On a second appeal in the same case, the court restated the doctrine, and extended its application to a partial failure to apply water to a beneficial use, declaring that the appropriator could hold, as against one subsequent in right, "only the maximum quantity of water which he shall have devoted to a beneficial use at some time within the period by which his right would otherwise be barred for nonuser." Smith v. Hawkins, 120 Cal. 86, 52 Pac. 139.

[7-9] The theory underlying section 1411, as interpreted in these cases, is thus explained in the decision on the first appeal in Smith v. Hawkins:

> "Considering the necessity of water in the industrial affairs of this state, it would be a most mischievous perpetuity which would allow one who has made an appropriation of a stream to retain indefinitely, as against other appropriators, a right to the water therein, while failing to apply the same to some useful or beneficial purpose." 110 Cal. 127, 42 Pac. 454.

The reasoning is as applicable to the situation of the parties in this case as it was to that of the opposing claimants in Smith v. Hopkins. There, as here, a valid appropriation had been made while the land below the point of diversion was still a part of the public domain. There, as here, a part of that land, bordering on the stream, had passed into the ownership of one claiming a superior right in the flow as against the prior appropriator who, it was asserted, had failed to apply the water to a beneficial use. The defendant's position is not strengthened by resting its right on the basis of prescription. All it could acquire, by diverting or impounding the water, was a usufructuary right (Wiel on Water Rights [3d Ed.] § 18), not an ownership in the corpus of the water, except, perhaps, so much thereof as it has actually reduced to possession in its reservoir. The matter here in dispute is, not the ownership of any particular quantity now impounded but the right to dam and control the water as it runs into and through Round Valley. Storage of water in a reservoir is not in itself a beneficial use. It is a mere means to the end of applying the water to such use. Kinney on Irrigation (2d Ed.) p. 1480. The defendant's prescriptive rights do not extend to the impounding of the water for the mere purpose of holding it in storage. If, then, the defendant has ceased for a period of more than five years to apply to a beneficial use any part of the water so retained and impounded by it, the considerations of public policy pointed out in Smith v. Hawkins, supra, demand that it shall not be permitted to continue the diversion and storage of the excess over its legitimate needs, and thus prevent the application of such excess to the needs of others who, if there had been no impounding by the defendant, would have been entitled to use it.

[10, 11] The evidence in this case fairly shows that for a period of more than five years before the commencement of the action the defendant had not applied to beneficial uses all of the water so impounded by its dam and reservoir. While there is some suggestion in the evidence that the defendant supplied water for irrigation, as well as for mining purposes, the record indicates very clearly that the service of water for irrigation was too trifling to be worth considering. Substantially the sole use was for mining purposes. As we have said above, this use was at one time sufficient to call for the entire capacity of defendant's works. But from about 1890 there was a marked decrease in the number of mines supplied by the defendant. Some of the mines were closed, and the demand on the defendant for water became and remained much less than it had been. The testimony elicited from defendant's own witnesses shows, without substantial conflict, that for many years the Round Valley Water Company had been selling considerably less than the amount of water which, on an average, its reservoir was capable of supplying each day through the year. We recognize, of course, that a water company supplying a public use is entitled to divert and impound water in excess of its exact daily requirement at a given time. Provision may be made to cover loss or wastage in transmission, and reasonably anticipated growth of demand. So, too, the company should be permitted to store a surplus to meet emergencies, such as a diminution of supply which may occur from time to time in years of light rainfall. But, making all allowance for these factors (none of which was fully developed in the evidence), the record as it now stands forces the conclusion that for more than the statutory period there had been an impounding and control of an amount of water substantially in excess of the reasonable requirements of the defendant. The finding that for more than 40 years last past the defendant and its predecessors had continuously applied all of the water to useful and beneficial purposes is therefore not sustained by the evidence.

[12] In so far as the right to any of the water had been forfeited by nonuser, the plaintiff would be entitled to have the amount so forfeited flow down the stream in its accustomed course. This does not mean that the plaintiff may claim any benefit from the maintaining by the defendant of its dam and reservoir. He is not in a position to demand that the defendant shall, by its artificial works, furnish a constant flow of water in North Canyon throughout the year. His only rights are those which he would have had under the natural conditions existing before the dam was erected, subject to the deduction of so much of the water as defendant has continuously applied to a beneficial use. In other words, he cannot require the defendant to discharge any water into the stream during those months in which there would be no flow if no dam had ever been built. He may merely insist that, during the months of natural flow, the defendant shall permit the escape into the canyon of the surplus of the natural flow over and above what is required to enable the defendant to meet its reasonable needs, measured by its maximum requirements during the five years preceding the commencement of the action.

The respondent contends that a certain deed made to the defendant by plaintiff's predecessors in interest granted, at least by necessary implication, the right to maintain the dam and reservoir in the manner in which they had been maintained, and estopped the plaintiff from objecting to the defendant's conduct. No right based upon this deed was set up in the defendant's answer, nor is there any finding bearing upon this claim. We do not, therefore, find it necessary to consider whether the deed, properly construed, has the effect claimed for it. If, upon another trial, the defendant desires to rely upon this ground of defense, it should make application to the court below for leave to amend its answer accordingly.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. MENDOSA. (Cr. 2179.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 9, 1918.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑711 — ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL—LIMITING TIME.
In a criminal case where there were but few witnesses and the testimony was brief, it was not error to limit defendant's argument to 15 minutes.

2. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑995(2) — JUDGMENT — REQUISITES AND SUFFICIENCY.
In view of Pen. Code, § 1168, providing the court shall not fix the term of imprisonment, the judgment properly consists only of a recital of the offense and a designation of the prison to which the prisoner is committed.

3. BURGLARY 🔑49 — JUDGMENT — MINIMUM TERM.
Inasmuch as Pen. Code, § 461, prescribing punishment for burglary, provides no minimum term for burglary in the second degree, a judgment fixing a mimimum term for such offense is erroneous.

4. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑982 — SUSPENSION OF SENTENCE.
The court cannot suspend sentence for burglary and remand the defendant to the custody of the sheriff, for the latter is required by Pen. Code, § 1216, to forthwith deliver the defendant to the warden of the penitentiary, but a sentence may be suspended under section 1203 by allowing the defendant to go at large "under the charge and supervision of the probation officer."

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffen, Judge.

Albert Mendosa was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and he appeals from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. Order denying new trial affirmed. Judgement reversed, with directions.

Charlotte F. Jones, of Seattle, Wash., for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The judgment pronounced upon such conviction was as follows:

"The said Albert Mendosa having been duly convicted in this court of the crime of burglary in the second degree, it is therefore ordered that said Albert Mendosa be punished by imprisonment in the state prison at San Quentin for a period of not less than one nor more than five years. It is further ordered by the court that the sentence be suspended and the defendant remanded to the custody of the sheriff, and confined in the county jail until the further order of the court."

The opinion of the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District was, in part as follows:

[1] "We are satisfied from a careful examination of the record that the evidence amply justified the verdict, that the court's instructions fully covered the case, and that there was no error committed in limiting defendant's argument to 15 minutes in view of the small number of witnesses examined and the brevity of their testimony. There is no merit in the contention that the conviction was not good in law.

[2, 3] "But the judgment based on the conviction and the order of suspension of judgment are open to serious objection. The crime was committed in August, 1917, subsequent to the going into effect of section 1168 of the Penal Code [St. 1917, p. 665], known as the 'indeterminate sentence' law, the constitutionality of which has been recently upheld in the case of In re Lee, 171 Pac. 958. That section provides that 'the court in imposing * * * sentence shall not fix the term of * * * imprisonment,' but that 'the period of the prisoner's confinement shall not exceed the maximum or be less than the minimum term of imprisonment provided by law for the public offense of which such person was convicted.' Under this section the judgment of the court properly consists of a recital of the offense of which the defendant stands convicted, a designation of the state prison to which he is committed, and nothing more. In the case at bar the court was in error in fixing a minimum term of one year, because section 461 of the Penal Code, which prescribes the punishment for burglary, provides no minimum term for burglary in the second degree. * * *

[4] "There was no authority in law for the action of the court in suspending the execution of the sentence and remanding the petitioner to the custody of the sheriff to be confined in the county jail. Where the penalty of the law is imprisonment in the state prison, it is the duty of the sheriff to forthwith deliver the defendant to the warden of the state prison. Section 1216, Pen. Code. If the court desires to suspend the execution of the sentence, the only way in which it can legally do so is by proceeding under section 1203 of the Penal Code, and that section expressly provides that in the event of such suspension 'the court shall place such person on probation and under the charge and supervision of the probation officer of said court, during such suspension.' The section clearly contemplates that the defendant, while on probation and conforming to the terms thereof, shall be at large and not in confinement."

We are entirely satisfied with this portion of the opinion and adopt the same as part of the opinion of this court.

This cause was ordered transferred to this court for the reason that we were not satisfied that the judgment of the District Court of Appeal was a proper judgment in view of the conclusion of the court as expressed in this opinion. It is apparent from what has been said that the judgment of the superior court was erroneous. Under the circumstances, there should be no new trial of this cause; but the superior court should be required to pronounce proper judgment upon the conviction legally obtained.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed. The judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to arraign the defendant for judgment and to thereupon proceed with the matter of the judgment in the manner required by law.

MERCHANTS' NAT. BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO v. CARMICHAEL. (Sac. 2512.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1918. Rehearing Denied July 26, 1918.)

1. Account Stated 🔑1—Definition.

An "account stated" is a writing exhibiting the state of account between the parties and the balance owing from one to the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Account Stated.]

2. Account Stated 🔑7—Effect.

An "account stated," when assented to, expressly or impliedly, becomes a new contract.

3. Account Stated 🔑1—Acknowledgment of Amount Due under Water Contract.

Instrument, whereby water company acknowledged it had received from landowner on irrigation contract $7,000 as part payment, stating balance due was $4,126.65, truth of which landowner acknowledged, was not mere calculation of amount due as fixed by contract, which depended on number of acres in land, to be ascertained by survey, but was an "account stated."

4. Bills and Notes 🔑41—Instrument as Duebill.

Instrument, whereby water company acknowledged it had received $7,000 from landowner on contract for irrigation, stating balance due was $4,126.65, to which landowner assented, if not an account stated, was good foundation for action against landowner, being in effect a duebill.

5. Contracts 🔑108(2)—To Furnish Water—Public Policy.

Public water company's contract to furnish water for fixed sum and at fixed rate is not against public policy, but is enforceable between parties unless and until public authorities find cause to abrogate or modify it.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by the Merchants' National Bank of San Francisco against D. W. Carmichael. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Gavin McNab, Nat Schmulowitz, and H. S. Derby, all of San Francisco, for appellant. R. L. Shinn, A. L. Hart, and A. L. Shinn, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment. The complaint states a cause of action to recover $4,126.65 upon a stated account alleged to have been made between D. W. Carmichael and the American Cañon Water Company, and afterwards transferred to the plaintiff. The defendant denies the making of the stated account, or of any agreement to pay the money sued for. The court made findings to the effect that no account had been stated by the said parties, and that no sum was found due to the water company from the defendant Carmichael, and that he never agreed to pay said sum of money. Thereupon judgment was given for the defendant. It is claimed that this finding is contrary to the evidence.

Carmichael was the owner of a tract of land containing 1,126.64 acres, more or less, which he proposed to subdivide and sell to purchasers in small tracts. He desired to make some arrangement whereby water could be furnished for irrigation and domestic use on said tracts. With this in view he and said water company, on December 16, 1912, entered into an agreement whereby the water company agreed that for a sum equal to $10 an acre for each acre of Carmichael's land, the area to be determined by a subsequent survey, which sum Carmichael thereby agreed to pay to said water company, it would execute to each of the expected buyers of tracts of said land a contract to furnish the tract bought by them with water perpetually, at the yearly charge of $4 per acre for irrigation and $1 a month for domestic use, the said right to be appurtenant to such tract so bought. The agreement recited that Carmichael had paid to the water company $7,000 of the sum agreed to be paid by him as aforesaid. The second agreement was as follows:

> "Sacramento, Calif. December 16, 1912.
> "This is to acknowledge that American Cañon Water Company has this day received from D. W. Carmichael on account of contract of even date herewith, for the furnishing of water on 1,126.64 acres of land on the Haggin grant, the sum of $7,000.00, gold coin of the United States of America as part payment of the said contract. That the balance due on said contract is the sum of $4,126.65.
> "American Cañon Water Company,
> "By O. G. Hopkins, Attorney.
> "I hereby acknowledge the foregoing to be a correct statement of the amount paid and the amount still due and unpaid on said contract.
> "D. W. Carmichael."

[1, 2] An account stated is defined as "an agreed balance of accounts; an account which has been examined and accepted by the parties." It is not necessary that there should be cross-demands between the parties, or that the defendant's acknowledgment that a certain sum is due from him to the plaintiff should relate to more than a single debt or transaction. Baird v. Crank, 98 Cal. 297, 33 Pac. 63. "An account stated is a document, a writing, which exhibits the state of the account between parties and the balance owing from one to the other, and when assented to, either expressly or impliedly, it becomes a new contract." Coffee v. Williams, 103 Cal. 556, 37 Pac. 504; Gardner v. Watson, 170 Cal. 574, 150 Pac. 994.

The first agreement created an indebtedness from Carmichael to the water company. On its face it showed that the amount of the original debt was $11,266.40, with a credit thereon of $7,000, which would leave a balance of $4,266.40.

The second agreement expressly states that the balance due on the original debt is $4,126.65. The evidence shows that the first contract is dated November 30, 1912, and that it was acknowledged on that day by the executing officers of the water company, that some time after that date the second agreement was prepared, and that both were finally executed by delivery on the same day, December 16, 1912. It is conceded that the second refers to the first. The recital in the second that the first is "of even date" with the second was a clerical error. The difference in the balance shown in the respective documents would appear to have been the result of error, or of payments made after the partial execution of the first. It is apparent from the terms of the second that its delivery, in contemplation of law at least, succeeded the delivery of the first. It assumes the pre-existence of the first agreement as a subsidiary contract. It does not itself create the original obligation, as claimed by respondent; it refers to the first agreement as the foundation thereof. The authorities cited by respondent to the effect that "an account stated cannot be made to create a liability when none existed before" are therefore not in point.

[3, 4] Nor does the second agreement constitute a mere calculation of the amount due as fixed by the terms of the first agreement, so as to bring it within the rule declared in cases like Jasper v. Lamkin, 162 Ala. 388, 50 South. 337, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1237, 136 Am. St. Rep. 34, where it was held that a statement of the amount due for principal and interest on promissory notes, made by the holder thereof and assented to as correct by the maker, is not an account stated. Here the amount to become due was not fixed with certainty by the first agreement. It was made to depend on the number of acres in the tract of land, which was to be ascertained by a survey. The second agreement obviated the necessity for a survey or was the result thereof. In either case it differentiates this case from those referred to. But even if it could be said that the instrument cannot be sued on as an account stated, the plaintiff would still be entitled to recover. The complaint alleges its execution, a copy of it is made a part of the complaint, and there are allegations that defendant agreed to pay the amount stated therein, that payment had been demanded of him and that he has failed to pay the same or any part thereof. The instrument is an acknowledgment of a debt due, the law implies a promise to pay the same, and it is a good foundation for an action, being in effect a duebill.

[5] Respondent suggests that the first agreement was an attempt to bind a public water company by a contract to furnish water for a fixed sum and at a fixed rate, and intimates such a contract is against public policy and invalid. But such a contract is valid unless the proper public authority interferes. Unless the public authorities find cause to abrogate or modify such contract, and until they do so, it is valid and enforceable between the parties. Southern Pacific Co. v. Spring Valley Water Co., 173 Cal. 297, 159 Pac. 865, L. R. A. 1917E, 680. Moreover, it does not appear by anything printed in the briefs that the water company was engaged in supplying a public use. The court below erred in rendering judgment for the defendant.

The judgment is reversed.

J. F. LUCEY CO. v. McMULLEN.

(S. F. 7036.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 20, 1918.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑843(1)—ORDERS REVERSIBLE—SETTING ASIDE FINAL JUDGMENT.
On appeal from judgment and also from order refusing to set judgment aside, it is unnecessary to consider latter appeal, since matters presented thereon arise upon appeal from judgment.

2. CORPORATIONS 🔑268(1) — SUIT AGAINST STOCKHOLDER—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.
In action by judgment creditor against stockholder for balance due on stock, complaint held demurrable, since it was susceptible of no other construction than that there was no consideration for stock, so that transfer was void under Const. art. 12, § 11, and Civ. Code, § 359, declaring void stock issues not for money, labor, or property.

3. PLEADING 🔑403(2)—CURE OF DEFECTS IN COMPLAINT—ANSWER.
Where defendant's answer cured defect in complaint in particulars in which it was assailed by demurrer, contention that complaint is insufficient is not available to defendant on appeal.

4. CORPORATIONS 🔑99(1)—ISSUING STOCK—CONSIDERATION.
If making of loan by defendant to corporation was valuable consideration for issue and transfer of stock to defendant, transfer would not be void under Const. art. 12, § 11, and Civ. Code, § 359.

5. CORPORATIONS 🔑271 — LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDER TO CREDITOR.
If defendant gave valuable consideration for stock, he was entitled, in suit to enforce his liability as stockholder, to finding ascertaining such value, since plaintiff creditor would only be entitled, at most, to have access to balance of subscription which remained unpaid.

6. TRIAL 🔑396(3)—FINDINGS—RESPONSIVENESS TO ISSUES.
In action by creditor against stockholder, findings that there was no consideration for transfer of stock by corporation to defendant and that stock was transferred as a bonus or a loan held not responsive to issues where there was no finding as to actual consideration and actual value of stock.

7. Corporations ⊂⇒232(2) — Liability of Stockholder to Creditor.

Where a corporation becomes so financially embarrassed that it is necessary for it to issue and transfer some portion of its stock as a bonus for a loan, liability to creditors of receiver of stock so transferred depends upon whether there was fraud and whether consideration for issuance of stock was equal to full face value of stock.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by the J. F. Lucey Company, a corporation, against R. J. McMullen. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order refusing to set aside such judgment, etc., defendant appeals. Judgment reversed.

Dudley Kinsell and Vance McClymonds, both of Oakland, and Mastick & Partridge and H. F. Chadbourne, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Herbert L. McNair, of Los Angeles, and McNair & Stoker, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. [1] This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and also from an order refusing to set aside said judgment and enter a judgment for the defendant. As to this latter appeal it is unnecessary to consider it separately, since the same matters presented thereon arise upon the appeal from the judgment. Hayne, New Trial and Appeal, § 199. The action was one brought by the plaintiff as a judgment creditor of the Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company, a corporation, and also as the assignee of two other judgments against said corporation, and is one in which the plaintiff seeks to recover from the defendant an amount sufficient to satisfy these several judgments for which the said defendant is alleged to be liable by virtue of the fact that the defendant was, at the time the indebtedness represented by said judgments arose, a stockholder of the said Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company, holding 25,000 shares of its capital stock of the par value of $1 per share. The complaint proceeds to allege upon information and belief:

"That the said defendant paid no sum of money or other thing of value to said Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company, or to any other person, or at all, for said 25,000 shares, or for any part thereof, and that all of said 25,000 shares were issued directly to the said defendant by said Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company without the said defendant paying or the said Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company receiving any consideration therefor whatever; that said defendant is still the owner and holder of said 25,000 shares, and has never paid any consideration for the same, and that there is now due and owing from the said defendant to said Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company the full sum of $25,000, the par value as aforesaid of said stock, for the same."

The complaint prays for the application of a sufficient portion of all defendant's alleged unpaid subscription to pay his said judgments and for general relief. To this complaint the defendant presented a demurrer, which the court overruled, whereupon the defendant answered the several counts of the complaint, denying that he did not pay full consideration for said stock, and averring that said stock at the time of its transfer to him was fully paid up stock of said corporation, and as a further and separate defense alleged that the said defendant received said stock in the course of a certain transaction in which he had loaned to the said Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company the sum of $3,500 upon its promissory note secured by a chattel mortgage and assignment of lease, and that as part of the consideration for said loan and as a bonus therefor the said corporation had issued to the defendant and he had received the aforesaid shares of the fully paid up stock of the corporation; that said stock at no time had any value whatsoever and was finally sold for delinquent assessments levied thereon. Upon the trial of the cause the court made the following finding of fact:

"That on the 30th day of November, 1910, the defendant herein became the owner of 25,000 shares of the capital stock of said Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company of the par value of $25,000; that said defendant paid no sum of money or other thing of value to said Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company, or to any other person, or at all, for said 25,000 shares, or for any part thereof, and that all of said 25,000 shares were issued directly to the said defendant by said Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company without the said defendant paying or the said Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company receiving any consideration therefor whatever; that said 25,000 shares were issued by said Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company to said defendant as a bonus to said defendant for making a loan of $3,500 to said Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company, to secure which loan said Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company gave to said defendant a chattel mortgage upon its property and assets; that said defendant is still the owner and holder of said 25,000 shares of stock, and has never paid any consideration for the same; and that there is now due and owing from said defendant to said Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company the full sum of $25,000, the par value of said stock, for the same."

The court made no finding as to whether said stock was ever of any value, nor did it find what, if any, was the value of the security pledged to the defendant for his said loan. As a conclusion of law the court found that the defendant was indebted to the Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company in the sum of $25,000, covering the entire par value of said stock, and hence was liable to the plaintiff for the sum of $6,772.40, the full amount of its said claim, for which judgment was accordingly entered.

[2] The first question presented by the appellant upon this appeal is that his demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. This point we deem to be well taken. The unequivocal language of the plaintiff's complaint above quoted is susceptible of no other construction consistent with the rules of pleading than that no consideration was either paid or received for or on account of the transfer of the stock in question to the defendant. If this be so, the case falls squarely within the reasoning and authority of Kellerman v. Maier, 116 Cal. 416, 48 Pac. 377, wherein it is decided that such a transfer of stock of a corporation is void under section 359 of the Civil Code, which embodies the terms of article 12, § 11, of the state Constitution, the court in that case holding that certificates of shares of stock of a corporation issued in violation of this section of the Code and provision of the Constitution are void, and that parties receiving them did not thereby become shareholders, nor make themselves liable to creditors as for an unpaid subscription.

[3] The record, however, discloses that the defendant in his answer denied that said stock was issued to him without any consideration paid or received therefor, and in support of said denial sets up the actual transaction in the course of which he received said stock from the Oakland-McKittrick Oil Company, and affirmatively alleges that said stock was transferred to him as a bonus for making a loan of $3,500 to the corporation, and as a part of the consideration for said loan, and further avers that said stock was issued to him and received by him as fully paid up stock of said corporation. In making these allegations the answer ekes out the insufficiency of the complaint in which it was assailed upon demurrer. This being so, the point is no longer available to the defendant upon appeal. Cohen v. Know, 90 Cal. 266, 27 Pac. 215, 13 L. R. A. 71; Kreling v. Kreling, 118 Cal. 421, 50 Pac. 549; Savings Bank, etc., v. Barrett, 126 Cal. 413, 58 Pac. 914.

[4-6] But if the respondent can escape the peril of this attack upon the insufficiency of its complaint, it is only to fall upon the horns of the dilemma presented by the findings of the court. The court found the fact to be as the plaintiff had alleged it to be, that no consideration had been paid or received for the transfer of said stock to the defendant, and that the defendant was liable to the corporation for the full sum of $25,000, the par value of said stock. The court also, however, found the facts attending the transfer of the stock to him to be that the defendant had been delivered said stock as a bonus for making a loan to the corporation issuing it. From the facts thus found this dilemma arises: If no consideration existed for the issue and transfer of this stock to the defendant, then such issue and transfer would be void upon the authority of Kellerman v. Maier, supra. On the other hand, if the making of the loan was a valuable consideration for the issue and transfer of the stock, then its issue and transfer would not be void as in violation of the section of the Civil Code and the provision of the Constitution above quoted (California Trona Co. v. Wilkinson, 20 Cal. App. 694, 130 Pac. 190), but in such event the defendant would have been entitled to have the actual consideration for which the stock was taken ascertained and applied to his subscription to said stock, and as a payment in whole or in part of his liability thereon, and the creditors of the corporation would only be entitled, at the most, to have access to whatever balance of the subscription remained unpaid in order to realize upon their claims. It was therefore incumbent upon the trial court to find what actual value the stock had, if any, and what actual consideration, if any, existed for its issuance and transfer to the defendant. McKee v. Title Ins. Co., 159 Cal. 206, 113 Pac. 140. The findings of the court are silent upon this phase of the case. Hence they are not only fatally doubtful and uncertain, but do not respond to the issues presented by the pleadings herein.

[7] The case, however, presents other aspects which should be viewed and determined for the purposes of such amendment of the pleadings as may be necessary and of another trial. The defendant in his answer averred that the stock in question was issued to him as a bonus for a loan by him to the corporation of the sum of $3,500, that at the time of its issuance to him as such bonus stock by said corporation it was represented to him by the official agents thereof that said corporation was financially embarrassed and indebted to various persons and in need of an immediate loan of the sum of $3,500 to take care of and discharge the pressing obligations of said corporation, and that if said defendant would make to it said loan for such purposes, the said corporation would in consideration thereof, and as a bonus therefor issue to said defendant 25,000 shares of the fully paid up capital stock of said corporation, and that, relying upon said representations, said defendant did make said loan, and took from said corporation said stock as a bonus therefor upon such understanding and agreement; that said stock at the time of said transaction had no market value, or any value whatsoever, and that the transfer of said stock and the whole thereof to him was made for a full consideration and for the highest market value obtainable therefor. These averments of fact present a logical problem which has for its major premise the legal question as to the extent of the liability to creditors of a corporation of persons taking bonus stock of such corporation under circumstances similar to those presented by the defendant's pleading in the instant case. In the cases of Vermont Marble Company v. Declez, 135 Cal. 579, 67 Pac. 1057, 56 L. R. A. 728, 87 Am. St. Rep. 143, and Herron v. Shaw, 165 Cal. 668, 133 Pac. 488, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1265, it was held that as to stockholders of a corporation to whom had been issued its stock for money or for property having a defined value less than the par value of the stock the creditors of the corporation could have recourse against such stockholders for the difference between the purchase price of the stock and its par value even though as between the corporation and such stockholders it had been agreed that it should be taken as fully paid up stock. In the case of Harrison v. Armour, 169 Cal. 787, 147 Pac. 1166, it was held that where, in a transaction between a corporation and a person who was the holder of certain patent rights of undetermined value, wherein certain shares of the stock of the corporation had been issued in full payment for such patent rights and upon the express or implied agreement that such stock should be so issued and transferred as fully paid up stock, creditors of the corporation could not have recourse against such stockholder for any unpaid balance of the par value of said stock in the absence of an affirmative showing of fraud in the transaction, and that in cases where the stock is not sold for cash, but is issued in return for real or personal property having no defined value, the rule is that where the corporation and the stockholder have agreed upon a given valuation for the property transferred, such valuation is binding and conclusive unless it is fraudulent in purpose and effect. In the case of Garretson v. Pacific Crude Oil Co., 146 Cal. 184, 79 Pac. 838, wherein the plaintiff, as one of the stockholders of a corporation, brought an action to set aside a transaction between the corporation and another stockholder whereby the former had issued to the latter a large block of its stock of the par value of $1 per share in payment for certain oil leases which the evidence showed to have a probable value equal to about 10 cents per share of the stock, and also showed the stock to have had at the time of the transaction an actual market value not in excess of 10 cents per share, the court held the transaction to be an entirely legitimate one as between the corporation and the stockholder obtaining such stock and one not to be assailed by other stockholders without affirmative proof of fraud in the transaction. In the cases of Vermont Marble Co. v. Declez and Herron v. Shaw, supra, and in other cases where the principle therein enunciated has been applied, the transaction for the transfer of the corporate stock in each case arose at a time in the life of the corporation when it was beginning or preparing to begin the business for which it was formed and was issuing its stock in return for the money or property which was to form its capital. A different situation, however, arises when a corporation, after it has been for some time engaged in doing business, has become so involved or financially embarrassed as to find it necessary, in order to meet its obligations or obtain money or property essential to the further conduct of its operations, to issue and transfer some portion of its stock at less than its face or par value, but as fully paid up stock, as bonuses for loans or in payment of obligations already accrued.

The following cases state the rule which has been applied to corporations issuing their stock as fully paid up stock under conditions analogous to those above indicated: In the case of Fogg v. Blair, 139 U. S. 118, 11 Sup. Ct. 476, 35 L. Ed. 104, the St. Louis & Keokuk Railroad Company had been engaged in constructing its railroad through certain portions of Missouri, and in so doing had become indebted in large amounts to a considerable number of persons on account of such work, and in order to pay for such construction caused to be issued certain bonds and also certain amounts of its stock which were delivered to those of its creditors taking said bonds, at a considerably less value than the par value thereof, but in full payment and settlement of such claims for construction. In the action brought by other creditors of the corporation against those taking such stock under said conditions to recover for the unpaid amount of the par value thereof it was held that such suit could not be maintained on behalf of such creditors without averment and proof of bad faith on the part of those engaging in such a transaction and without showing that the stock of the corporation when issued under such circumstances had in fact at the time of its issuance any other or higher actual value than that at which it was taken in the transaction, and that in the absence of such averments the complaint in the action was bad. In the case of Handley v. Stutz, 139 U. S. 417, 11 Sup. Ct. 530, 35 L. Ed. 227, the facts of the case showed that a corporation finding its original capital impaired by loss or misfortune, for the purpose of recuperating itself and producing new conditions for the successful prosecution of its business, sought to issue additional bonds and stock for these purposes, and found that on account of its condition its bonds could not be negotiated without the use of the stock as a bonus to those taking the same and as fully paid up stock. In the action on the part of creditors of the corporation to have recourse against those taking said stock under such circumstances to the extent of the par value thereof, the court held that no such cause of action existed in the absence of averments and proof showing actual or inferable fraud in the transaction, and that the consideration for its issuance was not equal to its full actual value at the time of its issuance and transfer. In so holding the Supreme Court of the United States gave its full assent to the doctrine adopted in this state in the cases of Vermont Marble Co. v. Declez, supra, and Herron v. Shaw, supra, but held that it was not applicable to every case where the stock of a corporation had been issued for less than its par value, nor was it to be given application to cases where, after the corporation had been for some time a going concern, the stock was so issued for a consideration other than money and of undetermined value, where no element of bad faith entered into the transaction, and where the stock was not shown to have any greater actual value at the time of the issuance and transfer than that for which it was taken as fully paid up stock. See, also, Seaboard Nat. Bank v. Slater (C. C.) 117 Fed. 1003. These cases have direct application to the case at bar. The defendant, as an affirmative defense in his answer, set forth the circumstances under which the stock in question had been issued and delivered to him. These showed that the corporation, being financially embarrassed and indebted to several persons and in immediate need of money to meet its pressing obligations, solicited and received from him a loan of the sum of $3,500, giving some personal securities therefor and agreeing to issue and issuing to him this stock as a bonus for such loan and as the fully paid up stock of the corporation; that said stock, when so issued, did not have any actual market value, and that in making said loan to it said corporation received from said defendant the full actual value of said stock, and that the making of said loan to said corporation enabled it to meet certain of its obligations and continue the prosecution of its business. These averments presented issues of fact to which, if found in favor of the defendant, the foregoing principles of law would be applicable. The court made no finding upon them, although the defendant offered evidence in their support sufficient to have required such findings. In thus failing to make any finding upon these issues or upon the question as to the good faith of the transaction which was involved therein, we think the trial court was in error requiring a reversal of the judgment from which this appeal was taken.

PEOPLE v. BENNETT. (Cr. 590.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 20, 1918.)

1. Assault and Battery 🔑92—Assault with Deadly Weapon—Evidence.

In a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, evidence held to sustain a verdict of guilty.

2. Assault and Battery 🔑56—"Assault with Deadly Weapon"—Elements.

The pointing of an unloaded gun at the prosecuting witness, accompanied by a threat, without any attempt to use it otherwise, is not an "assault with a deadly weapon," and cannot sustain a conviction for assault, for want of present ability to commit a violent injury on the person threatened in the manner attempted.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Assault with Dangerous or Deadly Weapon.]

3. Criminal Law 🔑364(1) — Evidence — Res Gestæ.

In a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, where defendant, while choking another woman at the ranch of the prosecuting witness, pointed a gun at prosecutrix, and made a threat, and, after leaving, returned and fired a shotgun through the screen door, all such acts constituted one transaction, and were provable as part of the res gestæ.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Thomas Bennett was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and from the judgment, and a denial of a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Earl A. Bagby, of Visalia, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Joseph L. Lewinsohn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Jerry H. Powell, of Los Angeles, for the People.

JAMES, J. The defendant was charged with the crime of assault with a deadly weapon. The jury returned a verdict finding him guilty as charged in the information. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

[1] The crime, as described in the information, consisted in the firing of a shotgun at Maggie Scuffi in the county of Tulare in September, 1917. The complainant testified that she resided on a ranch at the time in question, and residing with her was a woman called Mrs. Bradley; that on the day of the alleged assault defendant drove up to the gate in front of the ranch house and asked for Mrs. Bradley; that the latter went out to the buggy, and, after some moments had passed, complainant heard Mrs. Bradley say, "My God, Tom, don't;" that she went to the door, and saw that the defendant had Mrs. Bradley by the throat, choking her; that the complainant then started to go to the assistance of the woman, when defendant pointed a shotgun at her face and said, "If you come another step, we will all go together"; that in the meantime Mrs. Bradley had gotten hold of the barrel of the gun and forced it up, and that complainant rushed in and also seized the weapon; that the two women begged the defendant to give up the gun, but that he refused, although upon the solicitation of Mrs. Bradley he did take a shell out of the gun; that Mrs. Bradley then turned and walked into the house. Complainant testified further as follows;

> "Then I said a few words to him about threatening to burn my property and do me harm that way, and then he drove out of the yard and started to go towards town, and I went into the house, and after I turned to go into the door he turned back again and drove in front of my place, and just a minute I looked through the door that he had just passed through, in front of the door, and had the gun pointed at an angle, and I stepped into a room where Mrs. Bradley had fell down crying, and he shot the gun through the screen."

The testimony of witness Mrs. Bradley was corroborative of that given by the complainant.

Defendant testified at the trial, admitting his presence at the Scuffi ranch on the day in question, and also admitting that he discharged a shotgun on that occasion. He stated that he went there for the purpose of persuading Mrs. Bradley to leave the home of Maggie Scuffi, as he did not think it a fit place for her. When asked why he discharged the weapon, he stated that he did it to "put the fear of God in the heart of Maggie Scuffi." He denied having aimed the gun at the door, stating that he aimed it upward, but that, as the mare hitched to the buggy suddenly started, the muzzle of the gun was pulled down.

From this brief statement of the evidence, it will at once be perceived that there was no lack of proof to sustain the verdict as found by the jury; in fact, it would be difficult to reconcile any other verdict than that returned with the evidence adduced before the jury.

In support of his appeal defendant relies mainly upon alleged errors of the trial judge committed in the giving and refusing of instructions. The court, we think, sufficiently advised the jury as to the law to be taken into consideration in arriving at a verdict. The defendant in several paragraphs points out specific objections made to the instructions as given and to alleged error in refusing certain instructions offered on the part of the defendant.

It is argued in the brief that the jury was not sufficiently apprised of the elements of offense of assault with a deadly weapon; that the jury was not sufficiently apprised that in order to constitute the offense it was necessary for it to find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant had the ability to do the bodily injury attempted; that the jury was not sufficiently apprised of the purpose for which evidence of the acts of the defendant prior to the time of the alleged assault was admitted; that the crime of simple assault, included within the charge of assault with a deadly weapon, was not sufficiently defined. Examining the charge as given by the court, we find that the jury was instructed very fully as to the necessity that the proof should show the commission of the offense beyond all reasonable doubt, and that the presumption of innocence attached at every stage of the case and "to every fact essential to a conviction." The crime of simple assault was defined in the language of the Code in the instructions. The jury was told that the charge made by the information included within it the lesser offense of assault.

[2] An instruction was also given pertinent to the facts of the occurrence in the yard preceding the time that the defendant drove away and before he fired the shot. That instruction advised the jury that:

> "The pointing of an unloaded gun at the prosecuting witness accompanied by a threat, without any attempt to use it otherwise, is not an assault with a deadly weapon, and cannot sustain a conviction for an assault for want of present ability to commit a violent injury on the person threatened in the manner attempted."

The fact appeared to be, as testified to by the defendant himself, that at the time he first pointed the gun at Maggie Scuffi it was not loaded, as he had discharged it while on his way to the place when he fired at a rabbit. He testified that he reloaded it as he drove out of the yard before the shot was fired through the screen door. The point that the court did not specifically advise the jury as to the limited purpose for which the evidence of the occurrence was admitted is without force.

[3] We think that the acts of the defendant while at the ranch of Maggie Scuffi on the day of the alleged assault were so closely connected as to constitute one transaction; that proof of all of such acts was proper to be made, as showing the res gestæ. By the instruction of the court the first part of the controversy, whereat the gun was only pointed at Maggie Scuffi, was eliminated from consideration.

It is our opinion that the defendant was rightly convicted on abundant proof, and that he had a fair trial.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BLAKE v. CRAIG et al. (Civ. 2376.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 21, 1918.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES ⟹468 — DEFAULT — PLEADING.

In action on a note under which holder could declare whole amount due if interest remained unpaid for 30 days, where complaint alleged that principal and interest was due, and filing mark showed complaint was filed more than 30 days after alleged default, default was sufficiently shown.

2. BILLS AND NOTES ⟹129(2)—MATURITY—NONPAYMENT OF INTEREST.

Where holder of note had option to declare entire amount due on default in payment of interest, mere filing of complaint for entire amount was sufficient notice that holder had availed himself of option to deem obligation due.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Foreclosure proceeding by Zeila O. Blake against Frank Craig, Hattie B. Craig, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Barrows, of San Francisco, for appellants. Harry F. Sullivan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of foreclosure of a mortgage, and is taken on the judgment roll alone.

[1] From the allegations of the complaint it appears that, if any of the quarterly installments of interest falling due under the terms of the note set forth in the complaint should remain unpaid for 30 days, the principal should forthwith become due at the election of the holder of the note. It also appears from the complaint that a certain installment of interest was not paid when due, but that pleading does not allege that 30 days had elapsed since said interest became due, or that the plaintiff had elected to deem the whole note due and payable, and it is contended by the defendants on this appeal that for these reasons their demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. The complaint, however, alleges that the principal, with a certain amount of interest, was due and unpaid; and by turning to the filing mark on the complaint it is learned that in fact the complaint was filed more than 30 days after the alleged default in the payment of the interest. This fact is also shown by admissions in the defendants' answer.

[2] As to the omission of the plaintiff to aver that she had elected to regard the whole amount of the principal as due on the failure of the defendants to pay the interest within 30 days after a certain installment thereof became due, we think it sufficient to say that the filing of the complaint was of itself a sufficient notice that the plaintiff had availed herself of the option to deem the obligation due.

There is no merit in the defendants' point as to their special defense, nor in the objection to the amount of counsel fee allowed by the court.

The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 15, 1918.)

1. Insurance 🔑435 — Liability Insurance—Accident Not Covered.

Policy against liability imposed by law on insured, contractor for carpentry and mason work on telephone company's building, and resulting from negligence of contractor or subcontractor engaged in work, did not cover accident to passenger in street through negligence of employé of independent contractor.

2. Insurance 🔑514 — Liability Insurance—Failure of Insured to Defend—Resort Against Insurer.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by Robert Henry Wilson, as executor of the last will and testament of James A. Wilson, deceased, against the London Guarantee & Accident Company, Limited, a corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hugo D. Newhouse, James Alva Watt, and Watt, Miller, Thornton & Watt, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Linforth & Herrington and Walter H. Linforth, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. The essential facts of this case, as they appear to us, are very simple. The defendant, on July 24, 1906, wrote for the plaintiff's testator, James A. Wilson, and for the Pacific States Telephone & Telegraph Company, what is called an "Owner's Contingent Liability" accident insurance policy. It was provided therein that:

> The defendant company "hereby agrees to indemnify Pacific States Telephone & Telegraph Company and James A. Wilson * * * against loss from the liability imposed by law upon the assured for damages on account of bodily injuries or death accidentally suffered while this policy is in force by any person or persons during the continuance of the work described in the schedule, and resulting from the negligence of any contractor or subcontractor engaged in such work."

The schedule referred to contained the following statement:

> "All work under supervision of James A. Wilson who lets contract and does carpenter and mason work himself. This policy covers contracted work only."

This provision was inserted for the purpose of bringing Wilson within the terms of this owner's policy. The building involved belonged to the telephone company, not to Wilson. One of the contracts on the building was let to the Roebling Construction Company. On the 15th day of November, 1906, and while this latter company was performing work on the building, one of its employés negligently let a heavy plank fall from the window of the building into the street. The plank struck the foot of O. R. Cole, who was passing along the street at the time, and crushed three of his toes. Cole recovered judgment against Wilson. Wilson paid the judgment and sued the defendant on the policy. The trial court decided against him, and he appeals from the judgment.

A great many questions are argued in the briefs of this case and were presented at the oral argument; but it seems to us that the answer to a single question, if in the negative, is decisive of the case, and that question is, whether this accident is covered by the policy.

[1] We think it is not. It will be observed that the policy insured against liability imposed by law upon the assured and resulting from the negligence of a contractor or subcontractor engaged in work on the building. It was stated at the argument that it was difficult to imagine a case which would be covered by this policy. That may be true, but we are not called upon to do more than decide whether the facts of this case bring it within the terms of the policy. The Roebling Construction Company was an independent contractor. There is nothing in the record to show that it occupied any other position than any other independent contractor. This being so, the law imposed no liability upon Wilson for the negligence of the construction company or its employés. There are other provisions in this policy, but none which extend its protection to Wilson beyond that afforded him by the clause thereof quoted.

It is not improper, perhaps, in this connection, to state the reasons why Wilson did not defeat the claim of Cole, as upon the record in this case it seems he ought to have been able to do. Cole was injured on the 15th day of November, 1906. On or about the 17th of February, 1907, he began his action against Wilson and the Roebling Construction Company and served Wilson with the summons and complaint. Wilson forwarded these papers to the insurance company. On the 19th day of February, 1907, the company returned the summons and complaint to Wilson, and notified him in writing that it refused to defend the action, and denied all liability. This accident not being covered by the policy the insurance company was strictly within its rights in refusing to defend it. Wilson did not appear in the action at once, and on the 1st day of March, 1907, his default was entered, and on the 29th day of March, 1907, judgment was taken against him in the sum of $6,300. From then until the 15th day of June, 1907, nearly three months later, he took no steps whatever in the action, but on the last-mentioned date served upon Cole's attorneys a notice of motion to set aside the default and the judgment based thereon upon the grounds, among others, that the default was entered on account of his excusable neglect. Voluminous papers were filed upon this motion, and it was finally denied. Wilson appealed to the Supreme Court, and that court sustained the trial court. Thereupon he paid the judgment, as has been said, and began this action against the defendant.

[2] No good reason appears in the record why he should not have defended the case. His contention that he could not do so because of a provision in the policy to the effect that he would not interfere with litigation, but would leave the conduct of the same to the insurance company, does not excuse him, because the insurance company promptly notified him that it would not defend the action, and it was his duty to himself, and he had the legal right of course to make the legal defense which, according to his affidavit of merits filed upon the motion to set aside his default, he was advised and believed he had. This court cannot make a contract of insurance for him at this late day covering this liability, nor can it assist him to avoid the effects of his own remissness in not defending the action begun against him, by giving him a judgment against the insurance company to which his policy does not entitle him.

The judment is affirmed.

PER CURIAM. Appeal from an order modifying an interlocutory decree of divorce in respect to allowance of alimony. It appears from the record that on November 3, 1915, Eleanor Matthews, the plaintiff, obtained an interlocutory decree of divorce from her husband, Hugh Matthews, upon the ground of extreme cruelty. Summons was served personally upon defendant, who made no appearance. By the decree the defendant was ordered to pay to the plaintiff $125 monthly as a permanent allowance, beginning November 8, 1915. On April 22, 1916, the defendant moved to modify the decree in this respect. On June 27, 1916, the court made an order reducing the allowance to $100, and from this order the plaintiff appeals.

Three points are urged for reversal: (1) That the court had no power to modify the decree, unless it appeared on the hearing of the motion that the circumstances of the parties had changed since the original decree was made. (2) That the parties had entered into an agreement with reference to alimony, which the court had no authority to modify. (3) That the decree should not have been modified, for the reason that the amount allowed therein was and is proper.

In support of his position the attorney for appellant has furnished us with an instructive and carefully prepared brief upon the legal questions involved and upon which he relies for reversal; but we are of the opinion that all of these points resolved themselves into questions of fact, which, under conflicting evidence, having been determined adversely to appellant, such determination is conclusive here.

[1] The question whether there was a sufficient change in the circumstances of the parties accruing since the decree was amply shown by the evidence. It affirmatively appears that plaintiff had acquired an interest in improved real property from which she derived an income.

[2] With reference to the existence of the agreement relating to the amount of alimony to be allowed, no evidence was presented aside from the affidavits of plaintiff and defendant. These were conflicting on the subject. The existence of the agreement, therefore, merely presented another question of fact. True, there is no express finding on the subject; but this must be presumed, in the absence thereof, in support of the judgment.

What we have said with reference to the foregoing questions applies with equal force to the third point relating to the question of proper allowance. As above shown, a different and changed condition in the circumstances of the parties had occurred since the rendition of the decree. All of these questions were, under conflicting evidence, addressed to the sound discretion of the court. There is no claim or showing that this discretion was arbitrarily exercised or abused.

For the reasons given, the order appealed from is affirmed.

BURDELL et ux. v. ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL.

(Civ. 2308.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 20, 1918. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court.)

CHARITIES 🔑45(2) — NEGLIGENCE — LIABILITY.

A hospital not run for profit, and which in fact did not make any profits, was not liable to a pay patient for negligence of its employés, where no negligence was shown in employment of incompetent employés.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Victor O. Burdell and Helen E. Burdell, husband and wife, against the St. Luke's Hospital, a corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Samuel T. Bush, of San Francisco, for appellants. Chas. S. Wheeler and John F. Bowie, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

ZOOK, Judge pro tem. In this action for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff Helen E. Burdell through the negligence of defendant's servants the court directed a judgment for defendant, from which plaintiffs appeal.

The evidence showed that plaintiff, Mrs. Burdell, entered defendant's hospital as a paying patient and was charged the regular rates of the hospital for the services rendered to her. The injuries complained of were alleged to have been sustained through the negligence of nurses employed by the hospital, but no evidence was offered to show that defendant was negligent in employing incompetent or careless nurses, or in omitting to use due care in the selection of its staff. The articles of incorporation of defendant stated that the purpose for which it was formed was the founding and maintenance of a hospital in San Francisco for the relief and care of such sick persons as might desire its benefits, and that its object was not pecuniary profit. It also appeared from the evidence that the hospital buildings were the gift of charitable persons to the corporation; that poor and needy persons, without distinction of race or creed, were admitted to the hospital and treated without charge, the percentage thereof varying from 7 to 15 per cent. of the total number of patients; that although the other patients paid fees for the services rendered them, no profit was made, or attempted to be made, from that source; that in the four years preceding the trial the expenses of operating the hospital exceeded the amount taken in as fees by more than $18,000, a large part, but not all, of which was the money lost by taking in poor patients; that the trustees charged with the conduct of the affairs of the hospital served without pay, and that the only persons receiving any compensation were the hospital staff, consisting of the superintendent, nurses, and attendants.

Upon this showing the lower court was clearly correct in directing a verdict for defendant under the rule laid down in Thomas v. German Gen., etc., Soc., 168 Cal. 183, 141 Pac. 1186, where it is said that:

> "Where one accepts the benefit of a public or of a private charity he exempts by implied contract the benefactor from liability for the negligence of the servants in administering the charity, if the benefactor has used due care in the selection of those servants."

The fact that plaintiff paid the regular rates charged by the hospital for paying patients does not take the case out of the operation of this rule, for it is apparent that the rates were not charged with a view of making a profit from her, and the moneys received from paying patients were not in fact sufficient to meet even the ordinary operating expenses of the hospital, without considering any interest upon the amount invested in the buildings. It is clear, therefore, that plaintiff was to some extent the beneficiary of the charity for which defendant corporation was organized, and comes within the rule quoted.

Judgment affirmed.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from an amended judgment in an action in ejectment and from an order refusing to vacate such judgment.

A brief statement of the facts involved will be conducive to a clearer understanding of the three appeals now pending in this court between these parties in regard to certain property which is the subject of their contention.

Prior to the 10th day of November, 1906, and to the commencement of any of the actions (three in number) pending between these parties, plaintiff's assignor, Richard Bradley, was the owner of two pieces of real property situated in San Francisco. On the date mentioned Bradley made a conveyance of one of these parcels—designated in the record as the Gough street property—to the defendant, who was at that time single and bore the name of Mrs. E. R. Buxton. The conveyance was in trust for certain purposes, and the property was to be reconveyed to Bradley upon demand. Thereafter, desiring to procure a decree establishing title to these two pieces of property under the so-called McEnerney Act, and appreciating that it would be more economical to attain this object by one action rather than two, Bradley conveyed to the defendant the parcel of land designated in the record as the Butchertown lot, with the alleged understanding in this instance, as in the other, that the property would be reconveyed to him. Prior to these transactions the defendant was engaged to marry Bradley, and they were in fact married about three years after the conveyance to her of the Gough street property. Later they became estranged, and Mrs. Bradley commenced an action for divorce against her husband. About this time she denied her trust relation to the properties, claiming to be the owner of both parcels, and that as to the Gough street piece she had paid Bradley a certain sum for it. On April 9, 1911, Bradley's assignee (plaintiff) commenced an action against the defendant to enforce the alleged trust as to this parcel. Thereafter, in June, 1911, the plaintiff, not being content to rest on that equitable suit alone, and believing too that a certain deed made by the defendant reconveying the lots ought under the attending circumstances be deemed to have been delivered to Bradley, in which event the equitable suit would fail, commenced a second suit—the present one—counting on a legal title to both lots.

[1] That it is proper to maintain these two actions concurrently is not disputed. O'Connor v. Irvine, 74 Cal. 435–441, 16 Pac. 236; South S. B., etc., Co. v. S. B. Nat. Bank, 127 Cal. 245–247, 59 Pac. 699. In a third suit, filed February 27, 1915, plaintiff sought to enforce the trust as to the Butchertown parcel and to compel its reconveyance by defendant. The status of this case is not before us.

As to the trust suit, which was filed first, a demurrer to the complaint was sustained, but upon appeal the order sustaining the demurrer was, in 1915, reversed. 165 Cal. 237, 131 Pac. 750.

The present action, being the second one commenced, was tried first; the trial being had before the court sitting with a jury. The verdict went for the defendant, and judgment thereon was entered in her favor on April 7, 1914. On October 6th of that year the trial judge signed an order amending this judgment, which order was not filed or entered in the judgment book until June 21, 1915. In the meantime the parties went to trial in the trust suit, involving the equitable ownership of the Gough street property. Judgment therein went for the plaintiff, and the same was entered in June, 1915. The appeals are here on separate records, and will be separately considered.

With this introductory statement we will now review the record in the first action tried, namely, the action in ejectment covering both pieces of property.

The complaint in this action was in form an ordinary complaint in ejectment, in which it is alleged that on and ever since the 20th day of January, 1908, the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the two parcels of land already several times referred to, and that on that date the defendant unlawfully and without right or title entered into possession of the premises and ejected the plaintiff, and has ever since unlawfully withheld the possession thereof from the plaintiff. The prayer was for the restitution of the premises and for damages. In defendant's third amended answer and cross-complaint she first denied the material averments of the complaint, and alleged that she is the owner and in possession of the property involved. She next set forth a matter of special defense, which is unimportant on this appeal. Finally, by way of cross-complaint, she alleged that there was another action pending between the same parties covering the Gough street property, referring to the action to enforce a trust as to that parcel. She also made the usual averments appropriate to an action to quiet title, setting forth in part that the plaintiff asserted a claim to that property adverse to her title, that such claim was wholly without right and was subject to her title, and that she was the owner of the property and entitled to the possession thereof, and prayed that her title be quieted. To this cross-complaint the plaintiff filed an answer, denying the material allegations thereof.

The cause was tried, and after the testimony was all in and the court had instructed the jury it was stipulated by the parties, at the suggestion of the trial judge, as we understand the matter, that the fate of the issues raised by the cross-complaint and answer thereto should be governed by the verdict of the jury upon the issues framed by the complaint and answer; that the verdict on these issues should be regarded as a determination in favor of the prevailing party on all the issues raised by all the pleadings. The jury found for the defendant. One week later, on April 7, 1914, and after a discussion with counsel for the plaintiff as to the scope of the stipulation, counsel for the defendant caused a judgment to be entered in favor of defendant in accordance with the tenor of the verdict and without reference to the intent, whatever it may have been, of the stipulation. Six months later, however, and without notice to the plaintiff, counsel for the defendant obtained from the trial judge an order amending the judgment, incorporating therein the stipulation entered into by the parties at the conclusion of the trial. The amended judgment was made to read in accordance with the prayer of defendant's cross-complaint, and her title to both pieces of property was quieted against all claims of the plaintiff. Eight months after the order amending the judgment was made and fourteen months after the original judgment was entered, the amended judgment was filed. Thereafter, a motion to set aside the amended judgment having been denied, this appeal was taken.

Notwithstanding the issues that the pleadings may be said to have raised, a review of the record shows that the case was tried exclusively upon the issues framed by the complaint and answer, the important one being as to whether or not the defendant had reconveyed the property to Bradley. Plaintiff showed that the defendant, being the legal owner of the two parcels of property on May 5, 1908, did about that time put in a safe deposit box, to which she gave Bradley access by sending him a key thereto, a deed of conveyance to him of those parcels duly acknowledged; that thereafter Bradley on two different occasions looked at the deed, held it in his hands, and replaced it in the box, from which it was thereafter taken and destroyed by the defendant. The latter, on the other hand, testified that she bought the Gough street property from Bradley for a valuable consideration, and that the deed of conveyance claimed by plaintiff to have been delivered to Bradley by her was put in the box as stated, but with the understanding that it was to be deemed delivered to him only in case he survived her. She further testified that this arrangement had been rescinded on account of a loss of confidence in Bradley which she suffered after her marriage to him, whereupon she removed and destroyed the deed.

It appears that some evidence crept into the record briefly disclosing the circumstances pro and con under which the parcels of property were conveyed to the defendant, but the sole contested question in the case in its last analysis was as to whether or not from the facts narrated it should be held that there had been a delivery to Bradley of the deed which had been placed by the defendant in the safe deposit box. No evidence was introduced for the purpose of showing, nor was the case tried on the theory, that the defendant had and plaintiff did not have the equitable title to the property

The record affirmatively shows that throughout the trial no mention was made of the equitable issue raised or purported to be raised by the amended answer and cross-complaint of the defendant and plaintiff's answer thereto, until just before the case was submitted to the jury, when the suggested stipulation heretofore referred to was made by the parties. Under these circumstances it would appear, granting that the stipulation is as broad in its scope as claimed by the defendant, that plaintiff's consent thereto was an excusable inadvertence. Indeed, its possible scope was, apparently, not understood by either party until shortly after the verdict, when it occurred to defendant's counsel that perhaps they were entitled to a judgment in the terms of the amended judgment, and they asked for a stipulation permitting such a judgment to be entered; but counsel for the plaintiff took the position that such a judgment would not be supported by the evidence, that therefore it would be nugatory, and, if entered, they would at once appeal from the same. Defendant's counsel at the time acquiesced in this view, and caused to be entered a judgment in accord with the verdict of the jury. Six months later, however, counsel for defendant, without notice to plaintiff, procured an amended judgment in conformity with the terms of the stipulation referred to, and fourteen months thereafter caused the same to be filed; a decision having meanwhile been rendered in the trust suit in favor of plaintiff.

From what has been said it follows that the verdict on defendant's cross-complaint, if given the scope claimed for the stipulation, is not supported by the evidence in the case.

[2] But there is another point fatal to the amended judgment. Granting that the court could amend the original judgment without notice and while an appeal was pending, granted that on the pleadings the issue as to plaintiff's equitable claim was presented to the jury for its consideration, and granting that there was evidence on such issue, upon which a verdict in favor of the defendant could have been based, still we think the part of the judgment giving defendant the relief prayed for in her cross-complaint cannot be sustained, for the reason that the issues which it raised, and the relief therein demanded, were purely equitable, so that the verdict on the cross-complaint was merely advisory. The authorities on this question are numerous and uniform. They are all to the effect that in an equity case, or on an equitable issue, the verdict of the jury must be expressly adopted by the court in some unmistakable manner, and findings made by it in conformity to such verdict or in rejection of it, or else the judgment will be reversed as having nothing to support it in such a case or on such an issue. See Waring v. Freear, 64 Cal. 54, 28 Pac. 115; Learned v. Castle, 67 Cal. 41, 7 Pac. 34; Haggin v. Raymond, 67 Cal. 302, 7 Pac. 721; Bell v. Marsh, 80 Cal. 411, 22 Pac. 170; Cummings v. Ross, 90 Cal. 68, 27 Pac. 62. An inspection of the record in the present case discloses that no such findings were ever made by the court; and it appears that they were never waived by the appellant, and that the court did nothing in the way of adopting the verdict of the jury so as to give its judicial sanction to the decision. Under these circumstances that part of the amended judgment which gave effect to the stipulated verdict on the cross-complaint has no legally sufficient findings to support it, and it must be reversed for want of such findings.

[3] Finally, it remains to be noted that the cross-complaint, in terms, sought to have the title quieted to the Gough street property only, and no relief could therefore be granted thereunder so far as the Butchertown parcel was concerned. The amended judgment purports to grant such relief. Furthermore, even if such relief were permissible under the pleadings, there is no evidence in the record to sustain it. As to this lot the defendant did not claim to have bought it, as she did with reference to the Gough street lot; and the uncontradicted evidence is that it was conveyed without consideration to defendant by Bradley for the purpose of permitting one decree to be obtained covering both lots, as before stated, and upon the obvious understanding that she should reconvey it to him when that object had been accomplished.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the Bradley Company, a corporation, against Emma R. Bradley, formerly Emma R. Buxton, also known as E. R. Buxton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 173 Pac. 1009, 1013.

Charles Baer, of San Francisco, for appellant. Stoney, Rouleau & Stoney and Orville C. Pratt, Jr., all of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff declaring defendant an involuntary trustee of certain real property and ordering an accounting.

The facts pertinent to this appeal, outside of those stated in the course of this opinion, are fully set out in case No. 2364, 173 Pac. 1009, bearing the same title as the present one and this day decided by this court, and to which reference is made.

The complaint alleges, and the court found, that one Richard Bradley, respondent's predecessor in interest, owned a lot on Gough street, in San Francisco, on November 10, 1906; that he desired to borrow money on said property, and, in order to do so without appearing himself as the borrower, he made a conveyance thereof to the defendant in order that she might borrow money upon it for him; that on said date, without receiving any consideration therefor, he conveyed the same to her by a grant, bargain, and sale deed, and that she orally promised and agreed to take and hold said property in trust for him, and to borrow money by mortgage upon it, and on demand to reconvey it to him; that at said time and for a period prior thereto defendant was and had been the confidential agent of Bradley; and that said conveyance was made in implicit reliance upon the confidential relations existing between Bradley and the defendant. The complaint also averred that defendant refused to reconvey, and had repudiated said trust, and prayed that defendant be declared an involuntary trustee, and that she be compelled to account for the rents and profits of said real property. Other details are set forth in the complaint, but the foregoing is sufficient for a consideration of the case. The facts alleged are specifically denied by the answer, which avers that the conveyance was made for the purpose of transferring to the defendant the title to said property in fee simple absolute without any conditions, qualifications, or limitations, and not for the purposes alleged in plaintiff's amended complaint. As just shown, the theory of plaintiff's case was based upon the existence of a confidential relationship between Bradley and the defendant. As to this it is to be noted that at the time of the conveyance they were not husband and wife, but were married about three years later.

[1-3] Under the statute of frauds it is the general rule that parol evidence cannot be received to prove that a deed absolute on its face was given in trust for the benefit of the grantor. Where, however, by means of an oral promise made without any intention of performing it, one obtains an absolute deed without giving any consideration therefor, it is a case of actual fraud, and the statute of frauds is not a bar to relief. Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525-527, 21 Pac. 984, 4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162. But this case does not fall within that exception to the general rule. It is claimed, however, that it falls within the exception to the rule declared in Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189, to the effect that, if a grantee by means of a parol promise to reconvey obtains an absolute deed without consideration from one to whom he stands in a confidential relation, the breach of the promise is constructive fraud, although at the time it was made there was no intention not to perform. Dimond v. Sanderson, 103 Cal. 97-102, 37 Pac. 189. See, also, Feeney v. Howard, supra; Adams v. Lambard, 80 Cal. 426, 22 Pac. 180. The law, from considerations of public policy, presumes such transactions to have been induced by undue influence.

With the law as thus stated, the parties to this appeal are in accord, the only serious dispute between them being as to whether or not the evidence in this case sustains the finding of the trial court, to the effect that at the time of the conveyance in question there existed a confidential relationship between Bradley and the defendant.

[4] Before considering that point, it may be well to say that the evidence in the record abundantly supports the finding of the trial court that the conveyance was made by Bradley to the defendant upon the understanding that the property was to be held in trust and to be reconveyed to the grantor upon demand. Bradley lived in Porterville; the defendant in San Francisco, where the property was situated. According to the former's testimony, after the conflagration in San Francisco in the year 1906, he felt disposed to do what he could to aid in the rehabilitation of the city, and accordingly decided to build upon the lot in question, but did not have the ready money with which to do so. Being connected with a bank in Porterville, he deemed it ill-advised to appear in the capacity of a borrower, so he made a grant, bargain, and sale deed of the lot to the defendant, upon the understanding that she would borrow a certain sum of money from the Hibernia Bank on her note, giving as security therefor a mortgage on the property, and at any time thereafter, upon demand, would reconvey it to him. According to the remainder of the evidence, including numerous letters from defendant to Bradley, addressed to him at Porterville, it appears that she succeeded in obtaining the suggested loan, and then proceeded, according to an evident arrangement between them, to superintend the construction of the proposed building according to plans and specifications submitted to and adopted by Bradley. All the contracts for the erection of the building were submitted to him by defendant for his approval. Many of the payments on account of the work were made by his personal checks. Other payments were made by her out of the borrowed money, and none were made without his knowledge and consent. After the building was finished the rents to be charged for the various stores and flats into which it was divided, and the selection of an agent to care for the property, were decided by him. Contemplated reductions in rent were submitted by defendant to him. In this connection she said in one of her letters: "Let me know your prices." In another she said:

> "After attending to a little business of my own I went to the Hibernia Bank to look after your business"—referring to the Gough street building.

In a third letter speaking of certain alterations in the structure, she wrote:

> "He asked my opinion but I could not commit myself, but told him he should have to notify you. * * * It is hard for me to do or say anything when you are the one to be suited."

These are but instances of many similar expressions by the defendant in her letters to Bradley covering a period of about two years. During that time all her acts and conduct with reference to the property were consistent with the claim of Bradley, and inconsistent with her present claim of ownership.

[5, 6] Coming now to the assertion of defendant that the evidence does not sustain the finding of the court that at the date of the conveyance defendant was Bradley's confidential agent, and that he was induced to make the deed by the confidence which he reposed in her, and the belief thereby engendered that she would perform her promise to reconvey to him upon demand, a letter written by her to Bradley prior to the conveyance shows that at that time Bradley must have reposed great confidence in the defendant and that they entertained for each other a strong affection. That this condition existed at the time of the conveyance in November, 1906, is shown in nearly all of her many letters written while the building on Gough street was in course of construction and thereafter. While those letters were, in part, of a business nature and business-like, they still indicate that the relations between the parties were close, intimate, and confidential. According to her own testimony, for several years prior to the conveyance she and Bradley were engaged to be married, and they in fact were married in March, 1909. From the facts narrated it certainly cannot be held that their relations were not confidential, nor that defendant was not the confidential agent of Bradley at the very time of the conveyance of the property. There are certain relationships from the existence of which the law infers special confidence, such as those of husband and wife, parent and child, guardian and ward, counsel and client, etc.; but it also exists in numerous cases where the facts proven will warrant the inference. Brown v. Mercantile T. & D. Co., 87 Md. 377, 40 Atl. 256; Thomas v. Whitney, 186 Ill. 225, 57 N. E. 808, 810; Stepp v. Frampton, 179 Pa. 284, 36 Atl. 177, 179. If these parties had been married at the time of the creation of the trust, the law would have presumed the relationship to be confidential, and the oral trust, therefore, enforceable; yet here the evidence shows that the confidence reposed was greater before than after marriage. We think that the trial court's conclusion that there existed at the time of the conveyance a confidential relationship between the parties is abundantly supported by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

Stoney, Rouleau & Stoney and Orville C. Pratt, Jr., all of San Francisco, for appellant. Charles Baer, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. In this action plaintiff sought to have the defendant declared an involuntary trustee for the plaintiff of certain real property described in the complaint, and to compel a conveyance thereof to the plaintiff, and an accounting for its rents and profits since February 28, 1910. On the main issue in the case judgment went in favor of the plaintiff, ordering in its favor a conveyance of the property. Defendant appealed therefrom, and said judgment has this day been affirmed by this court. Plaintiff also took an appeal from said judgment, being dissatisfied with that portion thereof which, as the result of the accounting had, awarded to the defendant the sum of $800.21, and gave to her a lien upon the real property for that amount, and this is the appeal which is now before us.

The sole point made by plaintiff is that this provision of the judgment is not supported by the findings.

Summarized, the findings show that prior to February 28, 1910, the defendant held the property described in the complaint in trust for the plaintiff; that on that date she repudiated her trust; that since that time down to June 18, 1915, when the court's decision was made and filed, she had received as rents for the property certain sums of money, and had made various disbursements on account thereof, with which she was duly debited or credited; that aside from the collection of these rents by her she had during the period mentioned occupied and used a flat constituting part of the real property; and that the reasonable value of such use and occupation was the sum of $1,600. The court, however, in its conclusions of law did not charge her with this $1,600.

In this regard, we think, the court committed an error as a matter of law, and that the judgment, instead of awarding to the defendant as the result of the account so taken the sum of $800.21, should, upon the findings in favor of the plaintiff, have decreed the payment to it by the defendant of the sum of $799.79.

It would seem to be too clear to require the citation of authority that a trustee, who "fraudulently refuses" to reconvey property to its legal owner and who repudiates the trust, is not entitled to use or occupy any part of the trust property free of charge; but, if the citation of authority be deemed necessary, see Fricker v. Americus Mfg. Co., 124 Ga. 165, 52 S. E. 65; sections 2273, 2275, Civil Code.

Defendant does not controvert this as a correct statement of a legal principle, but contends that plaintiff is not in a position to avail itself of this rule of law on the face of the record. There is no merit in her contention in this behalf that the findings relied upon by plaintiff are of probative facts. They are true ultimate facts. It is clear from these findings, which are quite full, that the court struck an erroneous balance by failing to charge the defendant with the rental value of over five years of that part of the trust property which she occupied in defiance of and to the exclusion of plaintiff.

It appearing from the face of the record that the court committed error in not charging the defendant with the amount which it found to be the value of her use and occupation of part of the premises, and that the error is susceptible of correction by this court without requiring a new trial of the issues, it is ordered that the judgment appealed from be modified in the following particulars, namely: That the conveyance to the plaintiff ordered by the judgment shall be made free and clear of any lien in favor of the defendant; that the portion of said judgment which decrees that the defendant owes nothing to plaintiff and that the plaintiff is indebted to the defendant in the sum of $800.21 shall be stricken out; and that said judgment shall provide that the plaintiff shall recover from the defendant the sum of $799.79. As thus modified, the judgment is affirmed.

HUNT v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (L. A. 5490.)

1. COUNTIES 🔑65—OFFICERS—TERM—STATUTES—"TENURE."

Los Angeles County Charter, making office of county treasurer an appointive office in classified service of county, and providing that all persons in classified service, "whether holding by election or by appointment, shall hold their positions until discharged, reduced, promoted or transferred," does not affect term of office of county treasurer elected before charter went into effect; article 12, § 56, and Const. art. 11, § 7½, providing that charter shall not affect "tenure of office" of officer so elected, the word "tenure" meaning the fact, manner, or means.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Tenure.]

2. COUNTIES 🔑67—OFFICERS—REMOVAL.

Los Angeles County Charter, making office of county treasurer an appointive office in classified service of county, and providing method of removal from office of person in classified service, is not applicable in its provisions as to removal of such persons, to a county treasurer elected prior to adoption of charter, who, having been elected under general laws of state, may be removed before expiration of term under Pen. Code, § 758 et seq., providing for removal of officers from office.

3. STATUTES 🔑64(7)—PARTIAL INVALIDITY.

The fact that Pen. Code, § 770, providing for an appeal to Supreme Court from a judgment or decree of removal from office under sections 758–772, providing removal of civil officers otherwise than by impeachment, was declared unconstitutional, does not invalidate the remaining provisions of sections 758–772; the unconstitutional section being an independent provision.

In Bank. Application for writ of prohibition by John N. Hunt against the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles and others. Alternative writ heretofore issued discharged, and proceeding dismissed.

Arthur Keetch, of South Pasadena, and A. I. McCormick, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Thomas Lee Woolwine, Dist. Atty., and George E. Cryer, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondents. A. J. Hill, County Counsel, and Robert B. Murphy, Asst. County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. By this proceeding a writ of prohibition is sought to restrain the superior court of Los Angeles county from trying petitioner, the treasurer of said county, on a written accusation presented by the grand jury of said county, charging him with willful misconduct in office, as such treasurer. The proceeding against him was instituted under the authorization given by section 758 et seq. of the Penal Code of the state, a general law of the state providing for the accusation and trial in the superior court of public officers for misconduct in office, and a judgment of removal from office in the event of conviction. The proceeding against petitioner was strictly in accord with the provisions of these sections. The claim is that this state law has no application to petitioner by reason of the alleged fact that he is an appointive officer, holding his office under the provisions of the county charter of the county, which provides the sole means and method by which appointive officers may be removed, thereby superseding the Penal Code provisions. If this claim be well based the superior court is without jurisdiction of the proceeding against petitioner. The attorneys for the respective parties have presented with great ability their respective views as to the validity under our Constitution of any county charter provisions purporting to provide an exclusive method by which county officers may be removed, and also as to the true meaning of the complex and confusing provisions of the Los Angeles county charter in regard to the matter of the removal of officers and employés. They have ignored certain suggestions of the county counsel of Los Angeles county filed by him as amicus curiæ, which, in view of the allegations of the petition for prohibition, appear to us to be well based and to necessarily lead to the conclusion that the charter provisions relied on have no application to petitioner, and that as to him the general law of the state as to removal from office for misconduct in office is applicable.

The county charter was framed and adopted under the provisions of section 7½ of article 11 of our Constitution, going into force in June, 1913. Up to that time the county had operated under the general laws of the state relative to counties and their government. At that time petitioner was the treasurer of such county, having been regularly elected to the office under such laws, at the general election in November, 1910, for a term of four years commencing on the first Monday of January, 1911, and, according to our statutes and decisions, to hold thereafter until his successor was legally selected and had qualified. By the charter certain offices which were previously elective, including that of treasurer, were made appointive offices, the appointment to be made by the board of supervisors. By provisions contained in the article on civil service, officers elected by the people and certain other positions were placed in what was called the "unclassified service," which was free from civil service supervision. It was then provided that "the classified service shall include all other positions now existing or hereafter created," which would include the office of treasurer. As to the classified service the article contains various provisions which it is claimed establish a method of discharge, removal, and reduction in rank. Section 37 (in this article) provides:

> "All persons in the county or township service holding positions in the classified service as established by this article, at the time it takes effect, whether holding by election or by appointment, and who shall have been in such service for the six months next preceding, shall hold their positions until discharged, reduced, promoted or transferred in accordance with the provisions of this article. * * *"

It is apparently petitioner's theory that he is holding his office solely under the provisions of this section, and without any other appointment or qualification whatsoever. He simply alleges his election as hereinbefore stated, his qualification under such election and entering upon his duties in January, 1911, that he continued as such treasurer to the taking effect of the charter, and that "ever since the time said charter took effect * * * has continued to be and to act as such treasurer of said county, and is now such treasurer, under and by virtue of the provisions of said charter," and during all said time has held a position in the classified service of the civil service of said county. There is no suggestion that he has been appointed to the office by the board of supervisors, or that, having been so or in any other way appointed, he has qualified under such appointment.

[1, 2] Section 37 of article 9 of the Los Angeles Charter, considered without regard to other provisions of the charter and the provisions of our Constitution relative to such charters, might be taken as lending support to a theory that a person holding an office by election at the time the charter took effect, which office was made appointive by the charter, and placed in the classified service, continued to hold such office thereafter under the charter without the necessity of further appointment or qualification. But section 11 of article 3 of the Charter clearly requires an appointment by the board of supervisors of "all county officers other than elective officers." And section 56 of article 12 of the Charter provides as follows:

> "Nothing in this charter is intended to affect, or shall be construed as affecting the tenure of office of any of the elective officers of the county or of any district, township or division thereof, in office at the time this charter goes into effect, and such officers shall continue to hold their respective offices until the expiration of the term for which they shall have been elected unless sooner removed in the manner provided by law. * * * But the successors of each and all of such officers shall be elected or appointed as in this charter provided, and not otherwise."

And section 7½ of article 11 of the Constitution declares that it shall be competent in such a charter "to provide" "for sheriffs, county clerks, treasurers, * * * auditors, * * * for the election or appointment of said officers," etc., with the express provision "that any such charter shall not affect the tenure of office of the elective officers of the county, * * * in office at the time such charter goes into effect, and such officers shall continue to hold their respective offices until the expiration of the terms for which they shall have been elected, unless sooner removed in the manner provided by law." The word "tenure" denotes in law the fact, manner, or means of holding, and as applied to the holding of an office has been held synonymous with "term of office." The words "shall not affect the tenure of office," etc., used in the constitutional provision, prohibit not only the shortening of the tenure or term of office of any of the officers described, but also the extension of such tenure or term of office. To provide that such an officer shall continue to hold indefinitely after the expiration of the term for which he is elected, until removed for cause, is necessarily to provide that his tenure or term of office shall be extended, which would be in direct conflict with the constitutional provision. We think, however, that the charter taken as a whole clearly contemplates that as to elective officers made appointive by its provisions, appointment of successors must be made at the expiration of the respective terms for which they were elected. Whether section 37 of article 9 of the Charter is effective to give such elected officers any preferred right in the matter of the appointment is a question not here involved and need not be discussed. But it does seem plain to us that until the appointment and qualification of a successor to an elective officer in office at the time the charter went into effect, such elective officer continues to hold his office solely by virtue of his election. His tenure of office is that prescribed by the general laws under which he was elected, and under those laws he holds, unless removed in accordance therewith, until the appointment of a successor in the manner provided by the charter, and the qualification of such successor. Such tenure cannot be affected by any provision of the charter as to removal, and as to that matter the general laws of the state still apply.

[3] In view of what we have said but one other point remains for consideration. Section 770, Penal Code (contained in the chapter entitled "Removal of civil officers otherwise than by impeachment," and including sections 758 to 772), providing for an appeal to the Supreme Court from a judgment or decree of removal from office "under any provision of this chapter," was held to be unconstitutional in People v. McKamy, 168 Cal. 531, 143 Pac. 752. It was held therein that in view of certain provisions of our Constitution no appeal to the Supreme Court or to a District Court of Appeal could be authorized by the Legislature in such a case, the same not being one "prosecuted by indictment or information." It is contended that this section was so essential to and a part of the scheme provided by the chapter for the removal of officers by accusation that the whole chapter must now be held to be invalid. This very question was the sole question presented to us by an application for transfer from the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District of the matter of Hamilton v. Superior Court, L. A. No. 5375. This application was denied September 20, 1917, without any opinion being filed. The court concluded that the section purporting to give a right of appeal in such cases was an entirely independent provision, the invalidity of which in no way affected the validity of the remaining provisions of the chapter. To this conclusion we adhere.

The alternative writ of prohibition hereinbefore issued is discharged, and the proceeding dismissed.

LEWIS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (L. A. 5489.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1918.)

In Bank. Application for writ of prohibition by Walter A. Lewis against the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles and others. Alternative writ discharged, and proceeding dismissed.

Edwin A. Meserve and Shirley E. Meserve, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Thomas Lee Woolwine, Dist. Atty., and Geo. E. Cryer, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This proceeding is in all material respects the same as Hunt v. Superior Court, L. A. No. 5490, 173 Pac. 1097, this day decided, the petitioner herein being the auditor of Los Angeles county.

For the reasons given in the opinion filed in the Hunt Case, the proceeding must be dismissed. The alternative writ of prohibition heretofore issued herein is discharged and the proceeding dismissed.

MESMER & RICE et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 8462.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1918.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⟹404—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACTS—EVIDENCE.
Where, in the proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission, it was agreed that the commission's physician examine the servant and report whether his disability was due to injury or disease, his report founded in part on the reports of assistants held competent evidence under the agreement.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⟹417(5)—REVIEW—APPLICATION—PRESUMPTION.
Where an application to the Industrial Accident Commission to have evidence stricken was never formally acted upon, it must be assumed to have been denied.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT ⟹417(8) — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—EVIDENCE—EXCLUSION OF CUMULATIVE EVIDENCE.
An award of the Industrial Accident Commission cannot be set aside for error of procedure in admitting incompetent evidence which was merely cumulative, where there was other evidence ample to support the findings.

In Bank. Application by George Walter Wilson to the Industrial Accident Commission for award for injuries alleged and suffered in course of his employment by Mesmer & Rice. From an award for applicant, Mesmer & Rice and the Georgia Casualty Company made application for review against the Commission and George Walter Wilson. Award affirmed.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, and R. T. Lightfoot and Lee Utley, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The Industrial Accident Commission, in a proceeding duly instituted by respondent Wilson, made an award in his favor against petitioners as compensation for injuries alleged and found to have been suffered by him in the course of his employment by petitioner Mesmer & Rice. Petitioners seek by means of a writ of review to have this award annulled.

On the trial before the commission it was stipulated that Wilson received an injury, and that such injury arose out of and happened in the course of his employment. The only question apparently was as to the nature, extent, and duration of the disability caused thereby. The claim of petitioners before the commission was that the disability for which compensation was sought was due to a certain disease with which it was claimed Wilson was afflicted, rather than to the injury confessedly received by him at the time of his accident. A great deal of evidence was introduced before the referee by the respective parties on this issue, and it is not claimed here that there was not sufficient evidence to support the conclusion that the disability for which compensation was awarded was due to the injury. The claim is that the award is void because made before all the evidence was taken, and because of the reception of evidence of unsworn reports of certain doctors, without notice to petitioners.

It appears that, at the close of the taking of the evidence before the referee, it was suggested by Wilson's attorney that the physician of the commission examine Wilson and determine definitely for the information of that body whether his disability was due to the disease. This suggestion was acceded to by the attorney for the petitioners. The record fairly shows that, although the latter at first requested that the examination should be made under certain specified conditions, including the holding of the applicant in a hospital under the direction of Dr. Southworth "for a period of six or eight weeks, or such time as Dr. Southworth should determine," it was finally understood that Wilson was to submit himself to an examination by Dr. H. E. Southworth, the physician of the commission, who was to take whatever measures he might deem necessary to reach a conclusion, and that his report was to be made to the referee, to be used by the Industrial Accident Commission in arriving at a conclusion, and that upon such examination and report being made the case was to be submitted for decision. Such, in effect, was the order of the referee, expressly assented to by all parties. The report of Dr. Southworth was presented, accompanied by the reports to him of two doctors whom he had in consultation with him in the case. One report (from Dr. Ide) was a report of certain symptoms of Wilson as shown by an examination, without any expression of conclusion except as to prospect of recovery and idea of proper treatment. The other (from Dr. Johnson) was simply a report of the result of a Wasserman test, the answer being "negative." The written report of Dr. Southworth stated that Wilson had been under his attention for "the past many days" in a hospital, that he had Drs. Ide and Johnson in consultation and inclosed their reports to him, that a urinalysis revealed nothing abnormal, that during the time of his observation he was unable to associate any systemic disorder which might produce local head symptoms such as complained of by the patient, and that he was of the opinion that the disturbance is local and the result of injury.

[1] There is no good basis for a claim that the award was made before all the evidence had been taken. As we have seen, the undertaking of all parties was that the matter was to be submitted for decision upon receipt of the report of Dr. Southworth. No further evidence was to be taken. Petitioner's real grievance is that Dr. Southworth submitted to the commission with his own report, and as a part thereof, the reports to him of two assistants whom he had called in to make certain examinations, and to give to him the result of those observations for his own use in coming to a conclusion, and that these reports were thus made evidence in the proceeding. It cannot fairly be disputed that, in view of the understanding that he was to take whatever measures he deemed necessary to reach a conclusion, he had the right to employ assistance to make certain observations as to Wilson, including a serological examination, and to report the result for his information in observing Wilson, and in coming to a conclusion. This he did, and upon their reports to him and his own personal observation of the case, continued "for many days," he made his own report to the commission. There can be no doubt that his report was, in view of the understanding of the parties, competent evidence to be considered by the commission, and that it, together with the evidence actually introduced on the hearing before the referee, furnished full support for the conclusion of that tribunal.

[2, 3] We may assume for the purposes of this decision that the written reports of Drs. Ide and Johnson to him, which he submitted with his report, were not competent independent evidence for the consideration of the commission, and that the application of the petitioners to the commission made March 15, 1917 (two months before the award was made), that the same be stricken out and withdrawn from the record, should have been granted. This application apparently was never formally acted on and must be assumed to have been denied. But the failure of the commission to reject the incompetent evidence could not affect its jurisdiction to make the award. The proceeding in review is not an appeal. The award "cannot be set aside for errors of procedure only, or for insufficiency of the evidence, where there is substantial evidence to support the findings, or for rulings upon the admission or exclusion of evidence, amounting only to error and not affecting the jurisdiction." Massachusett Bonding, etc., Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 168 Pac. 1050. Independent of the evidence alleged to be incompetent, there was ample evidence to support all the findings. This is not disputed. So it cannot be claimed that the commission was without jurisdiction to make the award because of an absolute want of proper evidence to support the findings of fact essential to such jurisdictions, as was the case in Carstens v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 578, 158 Pac. 218, and Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 171 Cal. 324, 153 Pac. 24. The situation here is not such, in our opinion, as to warrant an annulment of the order upon the principles stated in the opinions in those cases. At most, we have here a refusal on the part of the commission to strike out incompetent evidence which was merely cumulative of other evidence, and in no way essential to support the conclusion of the commission. It may further be noted that, in view of the report of Dr. Southworth, the other reports were of no substantial importance.

BARNES v. DISTRICT COURT OF APPEAL, SECOND APPELLATE DIST.

(L. A. 5629.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 3, 1918.)

1. Attorney and Client 🔑52 — Disbarment—Proceedings.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 290, 291, providing that, if disbarment proceedings are upon information other than that of the court, accusation must be in writing and verified, refers back to section 289, which provides that proceedings under section 287, subds. 2, 3, and 4, specifying grounds of disbarment, may be taken on information of another, and has no application to section 287, subd. 1, specifying as ground of disbarment conviction of crime involving moral turpitude.

2. Attorney and Client 🔑39—Disbarment—Conviction of Crime.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subd. 1, providing that an attorney may be disbarred for conviction of crime involving moral turpitude, an attorney may be disbarred for conviction of such crime, although conviction is not had in a court of state disbarring him.

In Bank. Application by E. M. Barnes for writ of review against the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District. Proceedings dismissed, and order affirmed.

E. M. Barnes, of Los Angeles, in pro. per. Bowen & Bailie, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is a proceeding to review and annul an order of the District Court of Appeal of the Second District directing that the name of E. M. Barnes be removed from the roll of attorneys, and that his license to practice law in this state be revoked.

Barnes was admitted to practice in this state by an order of the Supreme Court made in the year 1880. On March 21, 1910, he was convicted in the District Court of the United States for the district of Alaska for the crime of mailing an obscene and lascivious letter. In February, 1918, after due notice to him in that behalf, an attorney acting for the Bar Association of Los Angeles County, appeared in said District Court of Appeal and moved for an order disbarring Barnes from practice in this state as an attorney, basing the motion upon the ground that Barnes had been convicted, as aforesaid, of said crime, and that a copy of the record of said conviction had been filed with said court. Barnes, although having been served with said notice, failed to appear in opposition to the motion, and thereupon the District Court made the order now sought to be annulled removing him from the roll of attorneys.

The complainant claims that the District Court of Appeal has no jurisdiction to make an order removing or disbarring an attorney because of his conviction by a court outside of this state of a crime involving moral turpitude, unless an accusation is made against him in writing, duly verified by oath of some person, as prescribed by sections 290 and 291 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Section 287 prescribes five grounds for the removal or the suspension of an attorney after his admission to practice. The first ground is the only one here involved. The introductory clause and the first subdivision of the section read as follows:

> "An attorney or counselor may be removed or suspended by the Supreme Court, or any department thereof, or by any District Court of Appeal, or by any superior court of the state, for either of the following causes, arising after his admission to practice:
> "1. For conviction of a felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, in which case the record of conviction shall be conclusive evidence."

Sections 288 and 289 are as follows:

> "288. In case of the conviction of an attorney or counselor of a felony or misdemeanor, involving moral turpitude, the clerk of the court in which such conviction is had shall, within thirty days thereafter, transmit to the supreme court a certified copy of the record of conviction."
> "289. The proceedings to remove or suspend an attorney and counselor, under the first subdivision of section two hundred and eighty-seven, must be taken by the court on the receipt of a certified copy of the record of conviction. The proceedings under the second, third, or fourth subdivisions of section two hundred and eighty-seven may be taken by the court for the matters within its knowledge, or may be taken upon the information of another."

Then follow sections 290 and 291, the former providing that, "if the proceedings are upon information of another, the accusation must be in writing"; the latter that the accusation must be verified by the oath of some person to the effect that the charges therein contained are true.

It will be seen that the provisions of section 287 vest in the district court jurisdiction to make an order such as that complained of upon the ground that the attorney has been convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude, and that in such cases the record of conviction is conclusive evidence. Jurisdiction is thereby given positively. The only question which permits of doubt is the manner of its exercise. Section 288 does not require the clerk of the court in which a conviction is had to transmit a certified copy of the record to the District Court of Appeal. Consequently the jurisdiction of the District Court of Appeal to disbar an attorney for that cause does not depend upon the transmission of such copy by the clerk of the court in which the conviction is had. Obviously section 288 applies only to crimes committed in this state and to convictions in the state courts. The Legislature would have no authority to require the clerk of a court in another state, or of a court of the United States sitting in this state, to perform any act whatever, and the scope of that section must be confined to the officials of this state. The jurisdiction of the District Court to disbar for this cause under section 287 does not depend upon the procedure given in section 288, but, as we have said, is given to it in positive terms and without qualification.

[1] Section 289, in prescribing the procedure for a removal under subdivision 1 of section 287, requires the court to which such jurisdiction is given to take the proceedings necessary for that purpose upon the receipt of a certified copy of the record of conviction. No accusation is necessary in such a case; for the provisions of sections 290 and 291 requiring a written accusation when the proceedings are "upon the information of another" refer only to the provisions of section 289 on that subject, and that provision applies exclusively to proceedings to disbar or suspend under the second, third, and fourth subdivisions of section 287, and do not apply to subdivision 1. There being no other provision of the Code prescribing the procedure to be followed in the District Court of Appeal for the removal of an attorney under subdivision 1 of section 287, the case falls within the scope of section 187, which provides that, when jurisdiction is conferred upon any court by the Code, and the course of proceeding is not specifically pointed out by the Code, or by statute, such court may adopt any suitable process or mode of proceeding which may appear most conformable with the spirit of the Code. It appears from the record here that the authenticated copy of the record of the District Court of the United States for the District of Alaska showing the conviction of Barnes of the aforesaid crime was duly filed in the District Court of Appeal. This, under section 289, was sufficient to give that court jurisdiction to proceed. Thereupon, following section 187, the court proceeded to adopt a mode of proceeding, that is, when an attorney, one of its officers, presented to it a proposed notice of motion to remove Barnes for that cause, to be made on February 5, 1918, it authorized the service of such notice on Barnes and directed that it be served at least three days before the time fixed therein for the making of the proposed motion. This notice was duly served upon Barnes, and in pursuance thereof the motion was made. It cannot be said that as a matter of law the period of three days was so unreasonable or oppressive that the court thereby deprived itself of jurisdiction to proceed. It is not contended that such is the case. It follows that the court had jurisdiction to make the order and that the proceeding adopted was sufficient to give jurisdiction of the person of Barnes.

[2] There is no force in the argument that the provision of section 287 for disbarment on the ground that the attorney has been convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude is confined to convictions had in the courts of this state. The language of section 287 is general, and it vests concurrent jurisdiction thereof in the Supreme Court, the District Courts of Appeal, and the superior courts. No provision whatever is made for the filing of a copy of the record of conviction in any court except the Supreme Court. The reasons which induced the Legislature to prescribe this as a ground for disbarment are as potent when applied to a conviction in a court of another state, or in a court of the United States, as when applied to a conviction in the courts of this state. It was not because of the particular court which adjudges the attorney guilty, or the place where it sits, that the Legislature saw fit to make that a cause for disbarment, but because of the bad moral character of such attorney, which the Legislature deemed was conclusively proved by such record of conviction. No reason appears for the conclusion that the section should be held to apply only to convictions in the courts of this state.

The proceeding is dismissed, and the order of the District Court is affirmed.

Action by J. D. Thomas against A. Otis Birch and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

SLOSS, J. A demurrer to the second amended complaint having been sustained, and the plaintiff declining to amend further, judgment was entered in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff appeals.

The complaint in question alleges that during 1910 and 1911 the plaintiff was the owner of 650 shares of the capital stock of Menges Oil Company, a corporation having an outstanding capital stock of 90,000 shares. The defendant Birch was a director of said corporation, and its president and general manager. As such officer, he employed the defendant Good as superintendent, and Birch and Good were in actual charge and control of the operation of the company's property. The Menges Oil Company was the owner of 20 acres of land in Orange county, and was engaged in producing oil and gas, and in developing new wells thereon. On February 7, 1911, the corporation had partially developed said land by drilling four wells, which were then producing about 400 barrels of oil per day. The land, with the machinery and equipment belonging to the corporation, and the oil and gas produced by the four wells, made the outstanding stock worth not less than $2 per share. For some months prior to February 7, 1911, the corporation had been engaged in drilling an additional well, designated as well No. 5. During these months all of the profits derived from the four producing wells, amounting to about $75,000, were expended in drilling well No. 5. On or about said 7th day of February, 1911, well No. 5 had been drilled to a depth of about 4,000 feet, and was actually finished and completed, but was not open for production, "though it had been actually bored into and had reached a very rich and productive oil sand, capable of producing oil to the average amount of 2,600 barrels of oil per day, for many years thereafter, of the average value of $1.25 per barrel, and also large quantities of gas of the value of at least $500 per day, but that plaintiff did not then know of said completion and great value of said well No. 5." The defendants Birch and Good had personal control of well No. 5, and had actual knowledge of the facts regarding the well and its value. Birch, together with members of his family, owned a majority of the stock of the corporation, and thereby exercised actual control thereof. The defendants, knowing the value of the property of the corporation, and of well No. 5, conspired together to mislead and defraud the minority stockholders, including the plaintiff, and induce them to sell their stock to Birch for an inadequate consideration. For this purpose they instructed the other employés of the corporation to give to the stockholders no information regarding the condition of the property, and particularly of well No. 5. At meetings of the stockholders and directors of the corporation held shortly prior to February 7, 1911, Birch, for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff and other stockholders to sell their stock, stated that it would be necessary to levy large assessments upon the stock of the corporation in order to enable it to continue its development work. At the time of such statements the debts and expenses caused by the drilling of well No. 5, and placing it in a condition to produce oil and gas, had been paid out of the funds of the corporation. In order further to conceal the true value of well No. 5, and prevent the plaintiff and other minority stockholders from ascertaining its true productive value, the defendants represented that such value was very uncertain and problematical, and that the said well would probably be of very little value, thereby causing the plaintiff and other minority stockholders to believe that their stock was worth no more than $2 per share. The defendant Birch further represented to plaintiff and other minority stockholders that if they would sell their stock at $2 per share they would receive its reasonable value, and would avoid the necessity of paying assessments, and thereby said Birch would be enabled to induce an oil operator of large means to purchase the stock, and furnish the corporation with sufficient capital to develop its property. All of said statements were false and fraudulent, as defendants well knew, and were made with the purpose of inducing the plaintiff and other minority stockholders to sell their stock at $2 per share. Plaintiff and such other minority stockholders believed said statements, and were thereby misled and defrauded. In order to inform himself as to the condition of the property, the plaintiff, about and just prior to February 7, 1911, made inquiries of one Porter, the secretary of the corporation, regarding the condition of the property, including well No. 5, and was informed by Porter that the value and productiveness of said well No. 5 were very uncertain and problematical, and that the value of plaintiff's stock was $2 per share, all of which statements plaintiff believed and acted upon in the sale of his stock. The statements so made by Porter "were made from information and statements given to him by the said defendants" for the purpose of having them given to the plaintiff, and Porter made the statements to the plaintiff in good faith. The defendants instructed the drillers and other employés of the corporation not to give the plaintiff or other minority stockholders any information relative to the condition of the property, and they did not give any such information. By said action the plaintiff and other minority stockholders could not gain any information as to the true condition and value of well No. 5 at the time plaintiff sold his stock, and for many months thereafter.

The pleading goes on to allege that plaintiff had long been associated with the defendant Birch, and had faith in his integrity, and believing his statements, agreed on February 7, 1911, to sell his 650 shares to Birch, or others represented by him, for $2 per share, "said sale being conditioned upon the payment of one-fourth of said amount on or before the 18th day of April, 1911, and giving a note for the balance of said purchase price, * * * the said note and stock to be held in escrow until final payment was made," and if payments were not made, the stock to be returned to plaintiff. The shares were then, in fact, worth $50 each by reason of the boring and development of well No. 5. On or about April 18, 1911, Birch, in accordance with the agreement for the sale of the stock, made payment therefor, and took the stock, which had been deposited in escrow. Plaintiff could not, at said time, i. e., on or about February 7, 1911, ascertain the facts as to the true condition of well No. 5, because until the well was opened for production no one but those engaged in the drilling could know whether the well had been drilled into productive oil sands. The defendant Birch obtained an agreement for the purchase of the last outstanding minority stock of the corporation about March 13, 1911, and immediately thereafter, i. e., on or about March 20, 1911, the defendants opened well No. 5 for production, and permitted oil and gas to flow therefrom, "but that said defendants did not permit the fact that said well had been opened for production to become known until some time thereafter, and that this plaintiff did not learn of said fact until on or about the 10th day of April, 1911, and that the great value of said well and the greatly increased value of the property of said corporation did not become known to this plaintiff until after he had learned of the opening of said well No. 5 for production as aforesaid; that immediately upon the said opening of said well No. 5 for production it commenced to produce more than 2,600 barrels of 28 gravity oil per day, of the value of more than $1.25 per barrel, and gas of the value of not less than $500 per day, and that ever since the said time said well has continued to produce oil and gas in said quantities and of said value."

It is further alleged that the plaintiff had no knowledge or information of any of the fraudulent acts and concealments on the part of the defendants until April, 1913, when he was told thereof by Porter and other minority stockholders. About the same time he was also informed by a man who had been in the employ of the corporation during the drilling of the well that at the time of the purchase from plaintiff the defendants knew that well No. 5 had been drilled into rich oil sand, and that the defendants were then preventing the well from producing oil and gas, and concealing its true condition. This, it is averred, was the first information procured by plaintiff as to the fraudulent acts and concealments on the part of the defendants.

After acquiring the stock of plaintiff and others, Birch and his associates caused the corporation to transfer all of its property to another corporation, the Birch Oil Company, owned and controlled by the defendants, and on or about August 19, 1911, caused the Menges Oil Company to be dissolved. Thereby it became impossible for the plaintiff to rescind the sale of his stock. The complaint sets up a further transfer of the property under the direction of Birch, for the purpose of impeding plaintiff in his efforts to recover his stock. The prayer of the complaint is for damages in the sum of $31,200, based upon the difference between the purchase price and the alleged true value of $50 per share.

The demurrer specifies a number of grounds, and the respondents argue earnestly in support of each. In our view, one ground of demurrer, at least, is well taken, and the others do not call for discussion.

We have given a rather full statement of the complaint for the purpose, primarily, of showing that the plaintiff's charges of fraud, however frequently reiterated and variously phrased, all revolve around the central point of the condition, the productivity, and the value of well No. 5. The essence of plaintiff's claim is that he consented to sell his stock at $2 per share because he was kept in ignorance of the fact that well No. 5 was capable of producing oil and gas in such volume as to make the stock of the company worth $50 per share.

[1-3] The "agreement" which, as the complaint alleges, the plaintiff was induced to make on February 7, 1911, did not at that time deprive him of any interest in the stock. It is alleged that plaintiff agreed to sell his shares to defendant at $2 each, upon the condition of the payment on or before April 18, 1911, of one-fourth of the purchase price, and the giving of a note for the balance, the note and the stock to be held in escrow. There was, so far as the complaint shows, no agreement by Birch to buy or to pay. He was merely given the privilege, for a limited time, of purchasing the stock at a given price. It is not alleged that he gave any consideration for this right. The transaction was, in other words, a mere grant, without consideration, of an option to buy the stock. So long as Birch did not exercise the option by making the payment within the time limited, he had assumed no obligation, and the so-called agreement was therefore not binding upon either party for want of mutuality. 13 C. J. 331. "An agreement for an option not based upon consideration is simply a continuing offer which may be revoked at any time." 21 Am. & Eng. Encyc. 929. The rights of the parties (pending payment or notification of acceptance on the part of Birch) are not affected by the allegation that the stock was placed in escrow. There must be a binding contract to support an escrow (Fitch v. Bunch, 30 Cal. 208; Miller v. Sears, 91 Cal. 282, 27 Pac. 589, 25 Am. St. Rep. 176; Holland v. McCarthy, 173 Cal. 597, 602, 160 Pac. 1069), and plaintiff could recall his stock from the depositary so long as he had the right to revoke his offer of sale. A binding contract arose for the first time when Birch, on April 18, 1911, made payment and took the stock. But the plaintiff's own pleading alleges that on April 10, 1911, eight days before payment of the purchase price, he learned that well No. 5 had been opened for production, and the further allegations, fairly construed, amount to an admission that he then learned all about the well and its value and the effect of its development upon the value of the shares. At that time it was still within his power to revoke the option and retain his stock. Instead of so doing, he allowed the defendant to go on and consummate the purchase, took the agreed price, and then, after a lapse of some three years, charges fraud in a transaction which he voluntarily carried into effect, after full knowledge of the facts. This he cannot do. Strong authority may be cited for the view that, even if there had been a contract of purchase and sale, binding upon both parties, the seller could not, where he discovered the fraud while the contract remained wholly executory, deliver the property and receive the purchase price, and still maintain an action for damages for the fraud. McDonough v. Williams, 77 Ark. 261, 92 S. W. 783, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 452, 7 Ann. Cas. 276; Thompson v. Libby, 36 Minn. 287, 31 N. W. 52; Baird v. Mayor of N. Y., 96 N. Y. 567, 576. In Thompson v. Libby, supra, the court said:

> "To allow a person who has discovered the fraud while the contract is still wholly executory to go on and execute it, and then sue for the fraud, looks very much like permitting him to speculate upon the fraud of the other party. It is virtually to allow a man to recover for self-inflicted injuries."

It is not necessary, for the purposes of the present case, to go so far. Whatever may be the rule where the parties have entered into a contract which upon its face binds both, it should certainly be held that a party who has been induced by fraud to give an option terminable at his pleasure must, if he discovers the true state of facts before the option has, by acceptance or payment, ripened into a binding contract, exercise his right of revocation, or else be deemed to have waived the fraud.

It follows that the complaint failed to state a cause of action, and on this ground, without regard to other points made by the respondents, the ruling of the court below must be upheld.

The judgment is affirmed.

WHITING-MEAD COMMERCIAL CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION. (L. A. 5581.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 3, 1918.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑371—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION—INJURIES "ARISING OUT OF EMPLOYMENT."

Such acts as are necessary to the life, comfort, and convenience of the servant while at work, though strictly personal to himself and not acts of service, are incidental to the service, and injury sustained in their performance arises out of the employment.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑373—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION—INJURIES "ARISING OUT OF EMPLOYMENT."

Where a servant employed in wrecking buildings was burned while lighting a cigarette by the match igniting a turpentine soaked bandage on his hand, the injury was one arising out of the employment; the indulgence in tobacco satisfying a natural want and being necessarily contemplated by the employer.

In Bank. Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913 p. 279), by Miguel Duarte, opposed by the Whiting-Mead Commercial Company employer. There was an award by the Industrial Accident Commission, and the employer brought a writ of review, and the award was affirmed, and the matter was transferred to the Supreme Court. Award affirmed.

R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The District Court of Appeal for the Second Appellate District issued a writ of review to test the validity of an award of compensation made by the Industrial Accident Commission. The proceeding resulted in a judgment affirming the award. Upon application of the employer the matter was transferred to this court. Our further examination has led us to a concurrence with the conclusions of the District Court of Appeal. We, therefore, adopt the opinion of that court, prepared by Works, Judge pro tem., as a correct statement of the facts and an adequate treatment of the questions of law arising on those facts. The opinion reads as follows:

> "The Whiting-Mead Commercial Company was engaged in the business of wrecking houses, and Miguel Duarte was one of its workmen. While at work on one of the company's jobs Duarte ran a nail into the palm of his right hand, but the wound was not so severe as to cause him to cease his work, although the hand had to be bandaged. Twice during the day, once at noon and once at about 3 o'clock, the bandage was soaked with turpentine by an agent of the company in an endeavor to alleviate the pain caused by the nail wound. Soon after the second application of the turpentine, Duarte temporarily ceased his labor and struck a match for the purpose of lighting a cigarette. The saturated bandage was ignited by the match, and the hand was seriously burned. Duarte applied to the Industrial Accident Commission for compensation on account of the disability resulting from the burn, and an award was made in his favor. The petitioner now asks that the award be annulled.
> "At the time he was burned Duarte was in the course of his employment as a workman of the company, but it is contended that the injury did not arise out of the employment. There are many decided cases which bear more or less directly upon the question here presented. In one of them (Martin v. Lovibond & Sons, 7 B. W. C. C. 243), a drayman employed by a firm of brewers was run down by an automobile and killed. His hours of employment were from 8 in the morning until 9 in the evening, or later. During his working hours he took no meals at home. On the day of his death he left his team at the side of the street, and crossed the way for the purpose of refreshing himself at a public house with a glass of beer. He was in the public house about two minutes. While crossing the street to return to his dray he was killed. Compensation was allowed. In two cases (Archibald v. Ott, 77 W. Va. 448, 87 S. E. 791, L. R. A. 1916D, 1013; Keenan v. Flemington Coal Co., 5 F. 164, St. of Sess.), compensation was awarded for the result of accidents suffered while employés had left the actual performance of their work to procure drinking water. In another case (Carinduff v. Gilmore, 7 B. W. C. C. 981), a girl who was employed on the top of a threshing machine stopped her work to partake of refreshment provided by her employer, and suffered an injury while so engaged. Compensation was awarded. In one case (Northwestern Iron Co. v. Industrial Commission, 160 Wis.

633, 152 N. W. 416), it was held that an employé, injured while warming himself during a labor which subjected him to the cold, is entitled to compensation. In at least three cases (Cook v. Manvers Main Collieries, 7 B. W. C. C. 696; Elliott v. Rex, 6 W. C. C. 27; Zabriskie v. Erie R. Co., 86 N. J. Law, 266, 92 Atl. 385, L. R. A. 1916A, 315), compensation was allowed for injuries suffered by employés during absence from actual work in response to calls of nature. In a California case (Brooklyn Mining Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 172 Cal. 774, 159 Pac. 162), a miner was proceeding from one working place in a mine to another, passing over the surface of the ground from shaft to shaft in order to reach the second point. The day was very hot, and he paused in the shade of an ore bin to rest. The bin collapsed and killed him. Compensation was awarded.

[1, 2] "From these cases there is deducible a rule which is thus stated in one of them (Archibald v. Ott): 'Such acts as are necessary to the life, comfort, and convenience of the servant while at work, though strictly personal to himself, and not acts of service, are incidental to the service, and injury sustained in the performance thereof is deemed to have arisen out of the employment. A man must breathe and occasionally drink water while at work. In these and other conceivable instances he ministers unto himself, but in a remote sense these acts contribute to the furtherance of his work. * * * That such acts will be done in the course of employment is necessarily contemplated, and they are inevitable incidents. Such dangers as attend them, therefore, are incident dangers. At the same time injuries occasioned by them are accidents resulting from the employment.' Are we to place the use of tobacco in this list of ministrations to the comfort of the employed? Is its use necessarily contemplated in the course of such an employment as that in which Duarte was engaged? The petitioner, in answering these questions in the negative, places great dependence in the argument that tobacco is used to appease a self-created appetite and not a natural appetite. The argument does not appeal to us. In an endeavor to determine what indulgences of human beings are responsive to the demands of natural, what to unnatural, appetites, we should be carried to the depths of biological and physiological research. Such labor is not necessary. We have the tobacco habit with us, and must deal with it as it is. It will not do to say that mankind would be better for a lack of the weed, even if that statement be true. Tobacco is universally recognized to be a solace to him who uses it, and it may be that such a one, unless he finally shakes off the habit, cannot perform the labors of his life as well without it as with it. In the present war one of the constantly recurring calls upon the public of the world is for tobacco for the comfort of the participants in the conflict. Nor are the books without their cases to the substantial effect that the employer must expect the employed to resort to the use of tobacco as a necessary adjunct to the discharge of his employment. McLauchlan v. Anderson, 48 Sc. L. Rep. 349, 4 B. W. C. C. 376; Manson v. Forth & Clyde S. S. Co., [1913] W. C. & I. Reps. 399; Chludzinski v. Standard Oil Co., 176 App. Div. 87, 162 N. Y. Supp. 225.

"The award is affirmed." [1]

The case of Haller v. City of Lansing (Mich.) 162 N. W. 335, L. R. A. 1917E, 324, may be cited as an additional authority supporting the views expressed above.

The award is affirmed.

We concur: MELVIN, J.; ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; RICHARDS, Judge pro tem.

WILBUR, J. I concur. In concurring I think it proper to say that although petitioner claims in its answer and argument that the applicant should have been denied compensation on the ground that his injury was the result of his own willful misconduct in violating a rule of the employer prohibiting workmen from smoking, the record contains no evidence tending to show the existence of any such rule, and we cannot, therefore, question the validity of the commission's finding that the injury was not caused by the willful misconduct of the employé.

[1] Prior to the action of the Supreme Court on rehearing the District Court of Appeal denied a rehearing and handed down the following per curiam opinion:

"In its petition for a rehearing of this cause the employer again insists upon a distinction between those cases in which an employé pauses in his work to perform some necessary and natural act and those in which the cessation of work is for an indulgence in some act merely pleasant or convenient to the employé, or, as petitioner puts it, to satisfy the demands of an unnatural appetite. In denying the application for a rehearing it is perhaps well for us to say that there may be this difference between the two classes of cases: In those of the second class mentioned, including cases of indulgence in the habit of smoking, the employer may have the right to forbid indulgence during working hours by reasonable rules and regulations. We cannot see that there is any further distinction between the two classes. In this case the business of the employer was not conducted under any such rule or regulation.

"The application for a rehearing is denied."

JAMES, J. Appeal is taken from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the principal sum of $750, the alleged debt being one represented by the promissory note of defendant Andrew J. Roberts, which note was indorsed by the second defendant to the plaintiff. It is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff and H. L. Hutchinson, in August, 1913, were the owners of an option to purchase certain real property and that this option was sold and transferred to defendant F. M. Roberts in consideration of the transfer to the plaintiff of the promissory note first mentioned. The defendants set up several defenses, the substance of which is that an arrangement was consummated between plaintiff, Vandelinder, and F. M. Roberts for the formation of a copartnership to handle the property described in the option agreement, and that the parties mentioned were to form a corporation for the disposal of the property, and that a newspaper published by defendant F. M. Roberts was to advertise the land among the negro population; further, that as a part of the consideration Hutchinson and Vandelinder were to pay debts of F. M. Roberts then existing against his newspaper plant in the sum of $750, which they did not do; and, further, that it was understood and agreed that the maker of the note here sued upon would not be required to pay the same in money.

[1] The only contention made on behalf of appellants requiring consideration here is that the evidence was insufficient to support the findings and judgment of the court. Unfortunately for appellants, when we consider the transcript of the testimony, we are at once confronted with the fact that there was some substantial testimony to support all of the findings made by the trial judge. As the record reads on the printed page, it does appear that there was a great deal of evidence offered on behalf of defendants which tended strongly to support their defense. Statements made by Hutchinson in the presence of the defendants, before trial, were corroborative of defendants' claims. However, plaintiff, Vandelinder, testified positively and directly that he had originally paid $500 of his own money for the option; that Hutchinson had no real interest therein; and that there was no agreement or understanding waiving payment of the note or making the same conditional. He testified that the option contract was made and delivered to defendant F. M. Roberts. The question here is not whether we would have come to the same conclusion as the trial judge did upon the evidence as it is shown in the transcript. Appellate courts are not permitted to disturb a judgment where the determination of the facts is the issue presented, except where the evidence to the point is all one way; the question then becomes one of law as to what judgment is indicated therefrom.

[2] The point that the court erred in refusing to admit a letter signed by Hutchinson alone, which expressed the condition that out of stock to be issued by the corporation which was to be formed $750 worth was to be sold to cover the note to the plaintiff seems to be without merit. The note sued upon was admittedly indorsed to plaintiff, Vandelinder. It was his property; so that any statement made by Hutchinson to defendant F. M. Roberts could not bind the plaintiff. Furthermore, the statement made in this letter was not inconsistent with an understanding that Vandelinder should be paid the face of the note. It seems that the proposed corporation, in aid of which formation the efforts of F. M. Roberts were to be contributed, was never organized.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SANSOM. (Cr. 598.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 4, 1918. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 1, 1918.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW ⚿97(1)—ATTEMPT TO PASS FORGED CHECK—PLACE OF OFFENSE.

Under Pen. Code, § 27, providing that all persons who commit any crime in whole or in part within the state are liable to punishment under its laws, where defendant from Mexico mailed forged check on Arizona bank to bank in California, which sent check for collection to bank in Arizona, he was guilty of forgery by attempt to pass check, knowing its true character, and with intent to defraud, denounced by section 470.

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿190—INFORMATION CHARGING OFFENSE—CONVICTION OF ATTEMPT.

If forged check mailed by defendant from Mexico to bank in California for collection from bank in Arizona on which it was drawn had failed to reach bank in Arizona, under Pen. Code, §§ 1159, 664, defendant could have been convicted, under information charging uttering of check, of attempt to commit offense of uttering.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

H. B. Sansom was convicted of uttering a forged check, and, from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Guy Eddie and Chas. R. Morfoot, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Joseph L. Lewinsohn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Jerry H. Powell, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. Forgery—the defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The information in this case charges that, on or about the 18th day of October, 1917, at the county of Los Angeles, state of California, the defendant had in his possession a check in writing for the payment of money, and then and there, knowing the same to be a forged check, did willfully, etc., utter, publish, and pass the said check with the name of Alice G. Sowle falsely signed thereon as true and genuine, with the intent then and there and thereby to cheat and defraud the said Alice G. Sowle, the Bank of Bisbee, a corporation, and the Continental National Bank, a corporation.

At all times mentioned herein Alice G. Sowle had on deposit in the Bank of Bisbee the sum of $5,512.76. The check in question called for that sum, and was made payable to the order of Continental National Bank. On the 17th day of September, 1917, the defendant, under the name of Herndon McNeil, opened an account in the Continental National Bank. On or about the 18th day of October, 1917, the Continental National Bank received by mail the check in question, together with a letter signed by the defendant under the name Herndon McNeil. That letter was dated Tia Juana, Mexico, October 16, 1917, and instructed the bank as follows:

> "I hand you a check of Alice G. Sowle for $5,512.76 payable to yourselves, which kindly collect and credit my account with the proceeds. Mail the receipt for the check and advice of payment to me at General Delivery, Los Angeles."

The bank forwarded the check to the Bank of Bisbee, Ariz., and that bank refused payment on the ground that the check was forged. The evidence shows that in fact it was forged.

We will state defendant's principal ground of appeal in the words of his counsel, as follows:

> "It is the contention of the defendant that no crime was committed within the jurisdiction of the state of California, for the reason that as far as the proof shows the check was mailed from Tia Juana, Mexico, and, if forged, was presumptively forged there and sent to the bank in Los Angeles, with such instructions to the said bank as would require the said bank as the agent of the defendant to mail the check to Arizona for collection, so that there could be no uttering of the said check in California, and that the uttering did not take place until the check was presented to the Bank of Bisbee, in the state of Arizona, for payment. So that neither one of the elements necessary to constitute the offense as charged in the information against this defendant was consummated or carried out in California. Defendant raised the question of venue on a motion for an instructed verdict in the trial of this cause and by a motion in arrest of judgment and for a new trial. All of these motions were denied."

The bank did not keep the envelope in which it received the letter from the defendant, and there is no testimony stating what place of mailing was shown by postmark on the envelope.

Defendant contends that the court erred in instructing the jury that the mailing of the check by the bank at Los Angeles to Bisbee, Ariz., constituted an uttering of the check in California. The instruction is as follows:

> "If you believe the evidence of the prosecution, that under such evidence the Continental Bank was the agent of the defendant, and if you have a reasonable doubt whether or not such bank did any overt act toward passing or uttering the forged check, if any, you must give the defendant the benefit of that doubt, if any. If, however, you believe beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant, knowing the said check to be false, forged and counterfeited, mailed the same to said Continental Bank at Los Angeles, Cal., with the intent and design that said bank should pass and utter the same by causing it to be presented to the Bank of Bisbee, of Bisbee, Ariz., and if you further believe beyond all reasonable doubt that the said Continental Bank, upon receiving the said false, forged, and counterfeited check, if any, did in Los Angeles county, state of California, place the same in the United States mails, addressed to the Bank of Bisbee, at Bisbee, Ariz., with postage prepaid, and with the intent and for the purpose of causing the same to be presented to the said Bank of Bisbee, then you are instructed that you should find the defendant guilty, and that it is wholly immaterial whether any one was defrauded or not, and is likewise immaterial where the defendant was when he caused said forged check to be placed in possession of the said Continental Bank, if he did so."

Section 27 of the Penal Code of California provides that "all persons who commit, in whole or in part, any crime within this state" are liable to punishment under the laws of this state. In People v. Botkin, 132 Cal. 232, 64 Pac. 286, 84 Am. St. Rep. 39, the case then before the Supreme Court was stated as follows:

> "Defendant, in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, sent by the United States mail to Elizabeth Dunning, of Dover, Delaware, a box of poisoned candy, with intent that said Elizabeth Dunning should eat of the candy and her death be caused thereby. The candy was received by the party to whom addressed, she partook thereof, and her death was the result. Upon these facts may the defendant be * * * tried for the crime of murder in the courts of the state of California?"

The court then quoted section 27 of the Penal Code, and stated its conclusion as follows:

> "The acts of defendant constituted murder, and a part of those acts were done by her in this state. Preparing and sending the poisoned candy to Elizabeth Dunning, coupled with a murderous intent, constituted an attempt to commit murder, and defendant could have been prosecuted in this state for that crime, if, for any reason, the candy had failed to fulfill its deadly mission. That being so, those acts being sufficient, standing alone, to constitute a crime, and those acts resulting in the death of the person sought to be killed, nothing is plainer than that the crime of murder was in part committed within this state. The murder being committed in part in this state, the section of the law quoted declares that persons committing murder under those circumstances 'are liable to punishment under the laws of this state.' The language quoted can have but one meaning, and that is: A person committing a murder in part in this state is punishable under the laws of this state, the same as though the murder was wholly committed in this state."

[1, 2] So here, when the defendant caused his agent to send, and it did send, the forged check to the Bank of Bisbee to be paid by that bank, and the check so sent was received by the Bank of Bisbee, then, if not before, he was guilty of forgery by an attempt to pass the check, knowing its true character, and with intent to defraud. Pen. Code, § 470. And if for some reason the check had failed to reach the Bank of Bisbee, defendant could have been convicted, under the information in this case, of an attempt to commit the offense. Pen. Code, §§ 1159, 664; People v. Oates, 142 Cal. 12, 75 Pac. 337. "That being so, those acts being sufficient, standing alone, to constitute a crime," and those acts resulting in the actual completion of the crime charged, "nothing is plainer than that the crime of" forgery "was in part committed within this state," and the defendant is liable to punishment as provided by section 27 of the Penal Code, because he did commit, in part, a crime within this state. We think that the instruction in question was a correct statement of the law.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

WOOD & TATUM CO. v. BASLER.

(Civ. 1847.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 29, 1918. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 26, 1918.)

1. BROKERS 🔑41—RIGHT TO COMMISSIONS—RATIFICATION OF ACTS.

The principal ratifying, with agreement to pay the stipulated commission, the broker's sale on terms different from those originally authorized, such agreement is enforceable.

2. BROKERS 🔑54—RIGHT TO COMMISSIONS—ABILITY OF CUSTOMER—ESTOPPEL.

The principal accepting the customer procured by the broker is estopped, in the absence of fraud of the broker, to deny his ability and willingness to complete the purchase.

3. EVIDENCE 🔑474(13)—CONCLUSIONS—PECUNIARY ABILITY.

A customer procured by broker may testify that he is able to pay his portion of the purchase price, a matter peculiarly within his knowledge.

4. EVIDENCE 🔑502—CONCLUSION—PECUNIARY ABILITY—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

The adverse party deeming the testimony of a customer procured by a broker, that he is able to pay his part of the purchase money, a conclusion or mere opinion of the witness, it is open to him to test it on cross-examination as to the facts.

5. BROKERS 🔑85(7)—ACTION FOR COMMISSION—EVIDENCE.

For the purpose of showing what specifications of supposed infirmities in title were directed to the principal's attention, the written opinion of the customer's attorney as to the title is admissible in a broker's action for commissions.

6. INTEREST 🔑46(1)—COMMISSIONS—DUE DATE—DEMAND.

Within Civ. Code, § 1917, allowing interest from the time money is due, broker's commissions, payable on demand, are due when demand is made.

7. INTEREST 🔑67—COMMISSIONS—PRESUMPTION—DEMAND.

Relative to time from which to compute interest, it will be presumed broker's commissions, simply shown to have been demanded, were demanded the last moment before filing complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by the Wood & Tatum Company against W. H. Basler. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Elliott & Atkinson and R. Platnauer, all of Sacramento, for appellant. Dunn & Brand, of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for the recovery of a broker's commission for the sale of certain real property, and plaintiff had the judgment from which the appeal has been taken.

Plaintiff, being a real estate firm, entered into a written agreement with defendant on December 13, 1911, whereby the former secured an option for the purchase of certain real property, and the next day this was supplemented by another agreement signed by defendant, providing that:

> "In consideration of the services to be rendered and the expense to be incurred by the Wood & Tatum Co. in promoting the sale of the real property hereinafter described, I hereby employ said Wood & Tatum Co. to sell and to have the exclusive right to sell for me all that certain real property," etc. * * *

The property and the terms of sale were therein described, and in the last clause it provided:

> "And I agree to allow said Wood & Tatum Co. a commission of five thousand dollars out of the purchase price of said property."

By virtue of these agreements, W. G. Wood, president and manager of plaintiff, endeavored to form a syndicate to purchase the property, and he took three well-known citizens to the property and introduced them to defendant as prospective purchasers with himself. Finally, the four agreed to purchase the land on somewhat different terms from those presented in the original agreement of sale, and a written notification of this was given to defendant by said Wood. As to this, the latter testified:

> "At the time I served the notification on Mr. Basler, I paid him $600. Prior to the time of this notification I told him that I was syndicating the property; that I was interesting a number of gentlemen for its purchase. I explained to him that I had these various gentlemen interested, and that I had figured on making them purchasers. I told him the prospective purchasers were Mr. Mitau, Mr. Snell, Mr. Lindley, and myself. That was before the notification of April 22d."

The written notification appears in the transcript, and to it is attached the following:

> "Approval. I hereby approve the sale of my property above described and acknowledged receipt of deposit of six hundred dollars and agree upon receipt of the balance of initial installment to convey the same to purchaser with a perfect title, free and clear of incumbrances, except as above.
> "I also agree to pay Wood & Tatum Co. on demand a commission of five thousand dollars.
> "W. H. Basler."

It is upon this promise to pay that the action was brought.

We may say, generally, that we find nothing in the proceedings opposed to good conscience or to public policy. Regarding the evidence, as we are required under the rule, we conclude that there was no overreaching, no misrepresentation, no concealment, nor fraudulent conduct in any respect on the part of respondent.

[1] We can see no reason why it was not entirely competent for the parties to voluntarily change the terms of sale, as seems to have been done, and we recognize no legal obstacle to the enforcement of the agreement as finally reached. Nor do we think there is any merit in the contention that no consideration exists for the promise to pay the $5,000.

The consideration results from the services performed in securing purchasers for the land upon terms that were agreeable to and ratified by appellant. It is a matter of no consequence that in the beginning somewhat different terms were contemplated. The ratification by appellant of the contract made by respondent was the same in effect as though prior to the performance of the services a similar change in the contract of sale had been agreed upon by plaintiff and defendant. If A. authorizes B. to sell the former's property for $10,000 and promises to pay him a commission of $1,000, and the latter secures a purchaser for $9,500, and A. approves the sale and agrees to pay B. a commission of $900, could there be any doubt of the sufficiency of the consideration for the promise? Of course, if Basler had not appoved of the change in the terms of sale, it could not be maintained that the agent had earned any commission, but we have no such case.

[2] As to the extent of the services required of an agent to entitle him to his commission, the rule is well settled and no elaboration is called for. We find in the record ample evidence to show that the parties were able, willing, and ready to complete the purchase, and the failure of the consummation of the sale was due to the neglect of appellant to perfect his title. And, it may be added that appellant is estopped from objecting to the qualifications of the proposed purchasers for the reason that the evidence brings the case clearly within the principle announced in 4 R. C. L. p. 309, as follows:

> "Once the customer procured by the broker is accepted by the employer, the latter is thereafter estopped from denying the purchaser's ability or willingness to complete the contract, inasmuch as he is not bound to accept the offer of such person without a reasonable opportunity to inquire and satisfy himself in relation to it. Consequently his acceptance should estop him from denying anything against this claim except fraud on the part of the broker in inducing the acceptance."

See, also, Carrington v. Smithers, 26 Cal. App. 460, 147 Pac. 225.

As we have seen, plaintiff notified defendant of the sale of the property, and informed him who were the purchasers. These parties were all known to the defendant. Defendant knew that plaintiff was trying to form a syndicate of these parties to take over the land, and he knew at the time of the notification of the sale just what interest in the property each one of these parties was to purchase. With knowledge of these things, defendant accepted the deposit of $600, approved of the sale in writing, and promised to pay the said commission of $5,000. He thereby accepted said purchasers upon his own responsibility, and could not thereafter dispute their capacity and disposition to make the purchase.

[3, 4] Some of the rulings of the court are criticized, but they are hardly of sufficient moment to justify specific notice.

We can see no objection to the action of the court in permitting the proposed purchasers to testify that they were able to pay their respective portions of the purchase price of the property. That was a matter, of course, peculiarly within the knowledge of the witness, and the testimony simply amounted to a statement by the witness that he owned available money to apply to such purpose. There is no practical difference between asking a witness whether he is able to pay $1,000 for the property and whether he has $1,000 available for such purpose.

If appellant deemed the statement a conclusion or a mere opinion of the witness, it was open for him to test it on cross-examination as to the facts. And, we may add that this was done with at least some of the parties. The ruling was in line with the case of Healy v. Visalia R. R. Co., 101 Cal. 593, 36 Pac. 125, and other decisions.

[5] An objection is urged because the written opinion of an attorney as to the title of and to the property was received in evidence. But it was the duty of the proposed purchasers, if they desired to require of defendant to convey a perfect title, to call his attention to the defects that he might have an opportunity to correct them. But the purchasers were dependent upon their attorney for such information, and the said opinion was admissible for the purpose of showing what specifications of supposed infirmities were directed to the attention of appellant. It does not explicitly appear that this opinion was read or shown to appellant, but it is a fair inference that his attorney was made acquainted with its contents in order that the proper correction might be made. It is not claimed that said opinion was binding upon appellant, or that the court might not have found, contrary to such opinion, that there was a good title, and therefore the proposed purchasers were in default. As to this, however, it may be said that appellant virtually admitted that a suit was necessary to adjust the matter, and that he would have his attorney attend to it. It may be added that no attempt was made to dispute the soundness of said opinion as to the defects in the title, and the case seems to have been tried upon the theory that said imperfections were conceded, and that no effort was ever made by appellant to remedy the situation. Indeed, his defense to the action was based upon entirely different grounds.

Some other points are made, but with the exception of one to be noticed, they are without substantial merit.

[6, 7] As we have seen, the promise was to pay $5,000 on demand. It would not be due, therefore, until demand was made or suit was brought. There is evidence in the record that a demand was made upon appellant, but the precise time does not appear. It would therefore probably be presumed that it was not made until the last moment before the filing of the complaint. Trumpler v. Cotton, 109 Cal. 257, 41 Pac. 1033.

Hence interest should have been computed from this date, which was September 24, 1914 (section 1917, Civ. Code; Taber v. Piedmont Heights Building Co., 25 Cal. App. 230, 143 Pac. 319). But the court allowed interest from December 22, 1912. This was error, and the judgment is excessive to the extent of $614.10.

However, it is not necessary to reverse the judgment on account of this error. It is true that there is no finding of any demand or when the complaint was filed, but it is entirely clear from the transcript that the complaint was filed on said date, to wit, September 24, 1914, and it is a mere matter of computation to determine the amount of the interest from that date.

The judgment is therefore modified so as to provide for the recovery of $5,000 and of $283.90 interest, instead of $898, and as thus modified it is affirmed, neither party to recover costs.

LUTTON v. RAU et al. (Civ. 2156.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 4, 1918. Rehearing Denied July 1, 1918.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷907(4)—PRESUMPTIONS.

On appeal on the judgment roll with a meager statement of facts, the court must assume that the evidence was sufficient to support the determination of the judge as to all matters except those specifically covered by the stipulation of facts.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⚷79(2)—ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE—LIABILITY.

An occupant of real property, holding possession by bare assignment of the lessee, assumes to the lessor only such obligations as arise out of the privity of estate as distinguished from those arising upon privity of contract.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⚷208(2)—PAYMENT OF RENT—COVENANT.

A covenant to pay rent runs with the land in whosesoever hands it may be.

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⚷208(2)—ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE—LIABILITY FOR RENT.

An assignee of a lessee, in the absence of express contract, remains liable only for the payment of rent during the period of his occupancy, and may terminate his liability by reassignment.

5. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⚷231(2)—ACTIONS FOR RENT—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for rent against the tenant's assignee, an assignment from such assignee to a third person was properly excluded, since it would not aid plaintiff in making out his claim against the defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by William Lutton against William F. Rau and others. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ray Howard, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Cates & Robinson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. In this action judgment of nonsuit was entered against the plaintiff, who has appealed. The suit was brought for the purpose of enforcing a demand for rent alleged to be held against the respondent Rau as assignee of the codefendants named herein of a lease to certain storerooms located in the city of Los Angeles. The lease was made by the assignor of plaintiff with defendants Roggy & Runge, a copartnership. It was alleged that this lease was afterwards assigned to respondent, who entered upon and occupied the premises, and who later attempted to assign his rights to other persons. It was to recover rents accruing subsequent to the last alleged assignment that the action was brought. Judgment by default was entered against the lessees Roggy & Runge.

[1] The appeal being presented upon the judgment roll and a meager statement of facts, we must assume that the evidence was sufficient to support the determination of the trial judge and insufficient to support the issues tendered by the plaintiff in his complaint as to all matters except such as are specifically covered by the stipulation of facts.

[2] We are required to assume, then, under the pleadings and judgment, that when Roggy and Runge assigned to respondent Rau, Rau entered into no contract, either with his assignors or the lessor, affirmatively binding himself to fulfill the covenants of the lease, other than such obligations as would by implication be imposed upon him because of his entry and assuming possession of the leased premises. It is well-established law that an occupant of real property, holding possession by bare assignment of the lessee, assumes to the lessor only such obligations as arise out of the privity of estate as distinguished from those arising upon privity of contract. Washburn on Real Property (6th Ed.) vol. 1, §§ 682, 683; also section 1205, vol. 2.

[3] A covenant to pay rent is deemed to be a covenant running with the land; that is, covenant concerning the land itself, in whosesoever hands it may be. Allen et al. v. Culver, 3 Denio (N. Y.) 284; Salisbury v. Shirley, 66 Cal. 223, 5 Pac. 104; Bonetti v. Treat, 91 Cal. 223, 27 Pac. 612, 14 L. R. A. 151.

[4] An assignee of a lessee, in the absence of express contract, remains liable only for the payment of rent during the period of his occupancy, and may terminate his liability by reassignment. Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, vol. 1, pp. 987, 988; Fletcher et al. v. McFarlane, 12 Mass. 43.

[5] The only reference to evidence received or offered at the trial is that found in one paragraph of the stipulated statement of facts. It appears that the plaintiff offered in evidence a written assignment made by respondent to one Tyler, wherein it was recited that respondent Rau, upon a certain consideration, assigned to Tyler all his interest in "lease of room at No. 524 South Spring Street, together with," etc. We are obliged to look to the judgment of nonsuit, which contains recitals not presented in the form of findings of fact, in order to be apprised that this alleged assignment was actually offered in evidence. In the recitations referred to it is set out that the assignment was offered, and that an objection thereto was sustained. Conceding that the record is in sufficient form to properly present the objection, we are of the opinion that no error was committed in refusing to allow the instrument of assignment to be introduced in evidence. We do not think that, under the authorities hereinbefore cited, the production of such an assignment would aid the plaintiff in making out his claim against the defendant for rent which accrued subsequent to the date of the transfer of possession of the premises from respondent to the last holder.

The judgment is affirmed.

McMANUS v. RED SALMON CANNING CO. (Civ. 2384.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 2, 1918.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑907(1) — Presumption—Evidence.

Where the court refused to pass on certain issues on the mistaken assumption that plaintiff had no standing in court under a former decision, it could not be presumed that there was no evidence on other issues or that the evidence produced was unfavorable to plaintiff.

2. Death 🔑8 — Action for Wrongful Death—What Law Governs.

An action for wrongful death is governed by the law of the jurisdiction where the tort was committed.

3. Death 🔑35 — Transitory Action — Wrongful Death.

An action for wrongful death is a transitory action, which may be maintained in any jurisdiction where defendant is found unless such forum in enforcing the remedy would conflict with express provisions or general policy of law of its own jurisdiction.

4. Courts 🔑95(2) — Rules of Decision — Statutory Action—Construction of Laws of Other State.

In considering a statutory remedy, such as an action for wrongful death created by the law of a foreign jurisdiction, the court will adopt the construction of the statute given to it by the courts of that jurisdiction.

5. Statutes 🔑174, 175—Wrongful Death —Foreign Statute—Construction.

If a foreign statute giving an action for wrongful death has never been construed in the foreign state, the court of another jurisdiction will construe it as it would a like statute of its own state.

6. Death 🔑32—Wrongful Death—Right of Action—Foreign Statute.

Section 1185, Comp. Laws Alaska 1913, codified under Act Cong. Aug. 24, 1912, § 19, gives a right of action for wrongful death to the personal representatives of a decedent for the benefit of the estate, any recovery to be administered as other assets, and applied to creditors and expenses of administration.

7. Death 🔑35—Action—Foreign Statute —Conflict with State Statute.

Section 1185, Comp. Laws Alaska 1913, codified under Act Cong. Aug. 24, 1912, § 19, giving a right of action for wrongful death to the personal representatives for benefit of estate, the proceeds to become assets of the estate, is contrary to the policy of the laws of California.

8. Death 🔑95(3) — Action for Wrongful Death—Damages.

The California statutory action for wrongful death was created for the benefit of decedent's relatives having the right to look to him for support, and damages thereunder are limited to their actual pecuniary loss.

9. Death 🔑9—Foreign Statute—Repeal.

Section 1185, Comp. Laws Alaska 1913, codified under Act Cong. Aug. 24, 1912, § 19, giving an action for wrongful death, was repealed by Laws Alaska 1913, c. 45, §§ 1, 4, as to cases between employer and employé, which provide remedy for an employé's wrongful death in accord with spirit of California law.

10. Death 🔑35 — Death of Employé — Foreign Law—Construction.

Laws Alaska 1913, c. 45, §§ 1, 4, providing a remedy for employé's wrongful death according to the spirit of the California law, not construed in any Alaska case, will be construed following the California statute as an act for compensation of dependents.

11. Appeal and Error 🔑1178(8)—Remand —Amendment—Necessary Allegation.

Where action for wrongful death brought under the Alaska statutes was disposed of on an erroneous ruling on a question of jurisdiction alone, plaintiff, as a matter of substantial justice, should be permitted to amend to supply a necessary allegation if possible.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action for wrongful death by Peter McManus, Jr., as administrator of the estate of John McManus, deceased, against the Red Salmon Canning Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals upon the judgment roll. Reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

F. R. Wall, of San Francisco, for appellant. F. V. Keesling and T. G. Crothers, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

ZOOK, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal upon the judgment roll from a judgment for defendant in an action for the wrongful death of plaintiff's intestate, John McManus. The complaint alleges that defendant, a California corporation, hired decedent at San Francisco, as a seaman and also to do shore work for it on a voyage to Alaska; that on July 17, 1915, while decedent was working in a pile-driving crew for defendant near Naknek, Alaska, he was struck by a block that fell from defendant's pile driver, and was killed; that the accident was caused by defendant's negligence in using a block and strap known to it to be defective; that, under two statutes of Alaska, which are pleaded at length, an action for wrongful death may be brought by the personal representative of the decedent, and plaintiff is the administrator of decedent's estate, duly appointed by the superior court for the city and county of San Francisco; that decedent left no wife or child, but both his parents are living; and that by reason of his death "his estate" had suffered damage in the sum of $9,999.

Defendant's demurrer having been overruled, it filed its answer, and the cause went to trial on April 3, 1916, and on April 8, 1916, it filed an amended answer, which, in addition to a denial of negligence, set up a plea to the jurisdiction, based upon the original opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of North Alaska Salmon Co. v. Pillsbury, rendered a few days before the trial. In that opinion the Supreme Court held that, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, the Industrial Accident Commission had exclusive jurisdiction to award compensation to a person, employed here to work in California and Alaska, for injuries received in the course of his employment beyond the territorial jurisdiction of California. In the case at bar the lower court, evidently assuming that this decision disposed of the whole case, made its findings of fact bringing the case within the rule of the decision, "without passing upon any of the other issues in said cause" (so the findings read), and accordingly gave judgment for defendant on the sole ground of its want of jurisdiction to try the case.

As the original holding in North Alaska Salmon Co. v. Pillsbury was later reversed by the Supreme Court on rehearing (174 Cal. 1, 162 Pac. 93, L. R. A. 1917E, 642), when it was finally held that the Industrial Accident Commission was without jurisdiction to award damages for injuries received beyond the territorial jurisdiction of its state, the ruling of the lower court was admittedly erroneous; but respondent's counsel contend that the judgment should nevertheless be sustained on other grounds.

[1] Their first contention is that, as the findings support the judgment and the evidence taken on the trial is not before this court, every presumption is in favor of the judgment, and that this court cannot go into the matter of errors not appearing on the record. But, in the case at bar, the court expressly refused to pass on the issues of negligence and the amount of damages sustained, upon the assumption that plaintiff had no standing in court at all under the decision referred to, and that it would be an idle act to find on any issue other than those necessary to bring the case within the scope of that decision. Therefore it cannot be presumed that there was no evidence on the other issues, or that the evidence produced was unfavorable to plaintiff. The only reasonable inference to be drawn from the findings is that there was some such evidence, which the court, for the reasons stated, declined to consider at all.

Respondent's next contention is that plaintiff's alleged right of action for the wrongful death of his intestate, as given by the statutes of Alaska, is contrary to the policy of the law of California, and will not be enforced here. The statutes pleaded by plaintiff are section 1185 of the Compiled Laws of Alaska 1913, codified by authority of the Act of Congress of August 24, 1912, c. 387, § 19, 37 Stat. 518, and chapter 45 of the Session Laws of the Territory of Alaska for 1913, approved April 30, 1913. Section 1185 reads as follows:

> "When the death of a person is caused by the wrongful act or omission of another, the personal representatives of the former may maintain an action therefor against the latter, if the former might have maintained an action, had he lived, against the latter for an injury done by the same act or omission. Such action shall be commenced within two years after the death, and the damages therein shall not exceed ten thousand dollars, and the amount recovered, if any, shall be exclusively for the benefit of the decedent's husband, * * * wife, and children, him or her surviving; and when any sum is collected it must be distributed by the plaintiff as if it were unbequeathed assets left in his hands, after payment of all debts and expenses, of administration, and when he or she leaves no husband, wife, or children, him or her surviving, the amount recovered shall be administered as other personal property of the deceased person; but the plaintiff may deduct therefrom the expenses of the action, to be allowed by the proper court upon notice, to be given in such manner and to such persons as the court deems proper."

Chapter 45 of the Session Laws of 1913 is entitled "An act to fix the liability of employers for personal injuries sustained by their employés," and the parts thereof material to this discussion are as follows:

"Section 1. That every person, association, or corporation engaged in the business of manufacturing, * * * building, or other business or occupation carried on by means of machinery or mechanical appliances shall be liable to any of its employés, or in the event of his death, to his personal representative for the benefit of his widow and children, if any, if none then for his parents, if none, then for his next of kin dependent upon him, for all damages which may result from the negligence of * * * its or his or their officers, agents or employés, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency due to its or their negligence in the machinery, appliances and works."

"Sec. 4. That no action shall be maintained under this act unless it be shown that there exist beneficiaries as provided in section 1 hereof. * * *"

[2-6] It is settled law that an action for wrongful death, like other actions on tort, is governed by the law of the jurisdiction where the tort was committed, and, as it is a transitory action, it may be maintained in any jurisdiction where the defendant is found (Ryan v. North Alaska Salmon Co., 153 Cal. 438, 95 Pac. 862), unless the court where the suit is brought, in enforcing the remedy, would be acting in conflict with the express provisions or the general policy of the law of its own jurisdiction (11 Cyc. 663). It is also a well-established rule that, in considering a statutory remedy, such as an action for wrongful death, created by the law of a foreign jurisdiction, the court will adopt the construction of the statute given to it by the courts of that jurisdiction. Osborne v. Home Life Ins. Co., 123 Cal. 610, 612, 56 Pac. 616. But, if the statute has never been construed in the state of its origin, the court will construe it as it would a like statute of its own state. 36 Cyc. 1104. Examining these Alaska statutes in the light of the rules above given, we find that section 1185 has been construed by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, which has appellate jurisdiction in cases arising in Alaska, in the case of Jennings v. Alaska Treadwell Gold Mining Co., 170 Fed. 146, 95 C. C. A. 388. It was there held that section 1185, like the Oregon statute from which it was originally taken, confers a right of action for wrongful death on the personal representative of the decedent for the benefit of the estate, and that any damages recovered become assets of the estate, to be administered like any other assets. The creditors and the expenses of administration are to be paid out therefrom, if necessary, the balance going to the heirs, if there are any; and, in default of heirs, the state takes by escheat.

[7, 8] We fully agree with counsel for respondent that this right of action, created by section 1185, is contrary to the policy of the laws of California, for our Legislature in creating the action for wrongful death, which was unknown at common law, followed the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act, adopted by Parliament in 1846, and our courts have adopted the construction given that act in Great Britain and in those states which have similar laws, namely: That the action for wrongful death has been created for the benefit of those relatives of the decedent who have the right to look to him for aid and support, and that the damages to be given are limited to the actual pecuniary loss suffered by those relatives by being deprived of such aid.

Therefore, if appellant's right of action rested on section 1185 alone, we would be compelled to hold that the action could not be maintained, for it would not be in accord with the policy of our laws to make a resident of our state pay damages for the death of decedent where no one was shown to have suffered any pecuniary loss thereby.

[9, 10] But the second statute pleaded, chapter 45 of the Session Laws of Alaska for 1913, which is a later enactment than section 1185, presents the matter in an entirely different light. Section 1 of that act gives the right of action against the employer for wrongful death of an employé to his personal representative "for the benefit of his widow and children, if any, if none for his parents, if none then for his next of kin dependent upon him," and section 4 provides that the action shall not be maintained unless it be shown that there are beneficiaries such as are described in the clause just quoted. We are satisfied that this act in effect repeals the provisions of section 1185 in so far as cases between employer and employé are concerned, and provides a remedy for the wrongful death of an employé which is in full accord with the spirit of our law. The language quoted is almost identical with that used in section 1970 of our Civil Code, which provides that the action may be maintained "for the benefit of the widow, children, dependent parents, and dependent brothers and sisters, in order of precedence as herein stated," and the objectionable features of section 1185 are therefore eliminated from the later act. As this later statute has never been construed in any Alaska case, so far as we have been able to ascertain from an examination of all of the cases reported in the Federal Reporter since its passage, and as its provisions so closely resemble our own statutes on the subject, it is our duty to construe it as we do our own statute as an act for the compensation of dependents.

[11] We therefore feel that appellant should be given an opportunity to present his case on the merits on a new trial, provided that he can show that the parents of decedent on whose behalf the action was brought were in fact dependent upon him for support and suffered pecuniary loss as a result of his death. We appreciate that there was no allegation of the parents' dependency in the complaint, but in view of the fact that the defendant's demurrer was overruled, and the case went to trial and was disposed of on an erroneous ruling on a question of jurisdiction alone, we think that as a matter of substantial justice plaintiff should be permitted to amend to supply this allegation, if he can do so.

It is ordered that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

We concur: KERRIGAN, J.; BEASLY, Judge pro tem.

CONNELL v. McGAHIE et al. (Civ. 2263.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 5, 1918.)

1. NEW TRIAL ⇨7—DEFAULT JUDGMENT.

Where judgment was rendered by default in favor of the cross-complainant on plaintiff's failure to answer the cross-complaint, the court was without power to grant a motion for new trial as to the issues raised by the cross-complaint.

2. EASEMENTS ⇨61(8) — PLEADING — SUFFICIENCY.

In action for damages for trespass and injunction restraining further trespass, cross-complaint, claiming easement in land, referred to as "Ackerman's Cove," alleged to be the property described in the complaint, sufficiently described the lands.

3. PLEADING ⇨21—CONTRADICTORY ALLEGATIONS—EASEMENTS.

In an action for damages for trespass and for injunction to restrain further trespass, cross-complaint was not contradictory by reason of its setting up a private easement in the cross-complainant and a public easement in the use of the navigable waters which were the subject of the action.

4. PLEADING ⇨147 — CROSS-COMPLAINT — RIGHT TO ASSERT.

Where plaintiff sued for trespass upon clam bed in navigable waters, defendant's alleged easement in the same waters, and his prayer that his easement be established, showed that the relief demanded thereby affected the property to which the action related, within Code Civ. Proc. § 442, and entitled him to file a cross-complaint, in view of Civ. Code, § 809, entitling an occupant of any estate in a dominant tenement to maintain action to enforce the easement.

5. JUDGMENT ⇨28—SCOPE—EFFECT OF PARTIAL INVALIDITY.

Where plaintiff sued for trespass in navigable waters, where he maintained a clam bed, and defendant set up his own private easement and the easement of the public for fishing and navigating, though the judgment included a declaration of both easements, the declaration of a public easement being unwarranted, it was nevertheless valid as to the private easement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth M. Connell against Robert J. McGahie and John P. Reed and others, wherein Reed and others filed a cross-complaint. On the death of Michael Connell, Elizabeth M. Connell, as administratrix, was substituted in his stead. From judgment for the cross-complainants, the administratrix appeals. Affirmed.

Henry F. Marshall and Walter J. Thompson, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Thos. P. Boyd, of San Rafael, and R. J. McGahie, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment declaring certain land subject to an easement and prohibiting interference with the same.

The complaint alleged ownership in plaintiff of certain tideland lots situated in Marin county, to which he deraigned title from the state by deed to his predecessors from the board of tideland commissioners. Upon these lots clam beds had been established, and to protect the clams from predatory fish plaintiff had erected and maintained fences thereon. He complained that the defendants had trespassed upon the property, broken down his fences, thereby admitting the predatory fish to the clam beds, to the consequent destruction of the clams, for which he sought damages and an injunction against future threatened injury.

To this complaint defendants filed a joint answer and cross-complaint, bringing in also another party defendant. The defendant Ackerman in his cross-complaint pleaded that his codefendants, the Reeds, were the owners of the upland, known as "Strawberry Point," surrounding "Ackerman's Cove," which, it appears from the pleadings, is the name by which plaintiff's lands are known, and were also the owners of a private easement to construct and maintain a wharf across the tidelands and out into the waters of "Ackerman's Cove," and a further right to the use of the waters of San Francisco Bay covering the cove for landing and mooring purposes for 150 feet on either side of the wharf, with the right of way from the end of the wharf across the waters of San Francisco Bay covering the cove to the channel of the bay. He further alleged that the wharf had been erected and maintained many years prior to the commencement of the action, and that cross-complainant was a tenant of the Reeds, renting one acre of land from them bordering on "Ackerman's Cove," together with the private easement above referred to; that he had erected a residence and boathouse on the leased premises, and engaged in the business of fishing and renting boats; and that plaintiff had destroyed the wharf and prevented its rebuilding, and had built a fence across "Ackerman's Cove," thereby obstructing access to his leased land and destroying his business. He also averred that the waters covering Ackerman's Cove are part of the navigable waters of the state, and that plaintiff had only a public right of fishing and navigation thereon common to all citizens.

This pleading in substance contains all the allegations of the other pleadings of the defendants, and the recital of the facts contained therein is all that is necessary for a discussion of the case. To this cross-complaint plaintiff interposed a demurrer, which was overruled, and, plaintiff failing to answer, his default was regularly entered, and, evidence being introduced in support thereof, judgment was entered by the court in favor of said cross-complainant. No separate judgment upon the default was ever entered; it being incorporated in the final judgment between all the parties.

Upon the pleadings of the other defendants the case went to trial, and judgment was against plaintiff and in favor of cross-complainants. The court found that plaintiff was the owner of the land described in the complaint, but that it was subject to two easements: One, in favor of the Reeds for a right of way for a wharf and the use of the navigable waters of the bay of San Francisco; and the other, a public easement for the use of those waters for navigating, hunting, and fishing. As conclusions of law the court found that the Reeds were entitled to $100 damages, that they were the owners of the private easement claimed by them, and that an injunction issue restraining plaintiff from interfering with the private easement, or from maintaining a fence on any of his land which interfered with the free use of the waters of Ackerman's Cove for hunting, fishing, or navigating. Formal judgment followed, in which it was also decreed that defendant and cross-complainant Ackerman have judgment from plaintiff for the sum of $970 damages, and that he have an order removing fence, and a permanent injunction restraining plaintiff from ever erecting any fence or obstruction upon his lands, and, further, that an injunction issue against plaintiff from in any manner obstructing the free use of the waters covering the lands by citizens of the state for the purpose of hunting, fishing, or navigation. A motion for a new trial was had, which was granted, "except as to the issues raised by the cross-complaint of Ackerman." From this order plaintiff has appealed.

[1] It is the claim of plaintiff that the judgment, in so far as the same rests upon such cross-complaint, should be reversed. As we view the record, the only question that is presented for our consideration is the sufficiency of the pleading to support the judgment. Aside from this question, it is first urged as ground for reversal that the court erred in inserting in the order granting the new trial the proviso excepting from its operation the issues raised by the cross-complaint of Ackerman. In this behalf it is argued that plaintiff's motion for a new trial was both in fact and by legal intendment directed solely to the issues of plaintiff's complaint and the cross-complaints of the Reeds, together with the respective answers thereto, and was not and could not be directed toward the Ackerman cross-complaint, for the reason that a motion for a new trial does not lie to a default judgment. Plaintiff, having failed to answer the cross-complaint of Ackerman, the court was undoubtedly without power to grant the motion for a new trial as to the issues raised by this cross-complaint. It is manifest, however, that the mention by the trial court of the Ackerman cross-complaint was a mere matter of precaution, made for the sole purpose of protecting Ackerman, and in no manner affected his judgment.

[2] As to the sufficiency of the pleading, it is argued by the appellant that the cross-complaint does not state a cause of action, for the reason that it utterly fails to describe the property claimed to be subject to the easement. The land over which the right of way is claimed is there referred to as "Ackerman's Cove," which it is alleged is the property described in plaintiff's complaint. The asserted private easement is not directed to any particular part or parcel of plaintiff's lands, but, according to the allegations, affects the entire tract. Under these circumstances, we are of the opinion that the description designating the lands subject to the easement in the manner indicated is sufficient.

[3] Again, it is contended that the cross-complaint is fatally contradictory, in that it alleges a public easement for the use of alleged navigable waters, and a private easement consisting in part of the same use of the identical waters. We see nothing contradictory in these allegations. They are based upon separate and distinct rights.

[4] Equally without merit is the claim that Ackerman is not entitled to assert a cross-complaint. It is alleged by him that his lessors were the owners of a right of way over the property described in plaintiff's complaint, and that he as lessee had been for more than 17 years in the use and possession of this right. It thus appears that the relief demanded affects the property to which the action relates, and this is sufficient to entitle him to the relief. Code Civ. Proc. § 442. And an occupant of any estate in a dominant tenement may maintain an action for the enforcement of an easement attached thereto. Civ. Code, § 809. See, also, 7 Cyc. Pl. p. 256.

[5] The judgment is further assailed for the reason that a portion thereof prohibits the obstruction of the free use of the waters covering the lands by the residents and citizens of the state for hunting, fishing, and navigating, which portion, it is claimed, is unwarranted. The grant of the tidelands in question from the state to plaintiff's predecessors was under the act of March 30, 1868 (St. 1867–68, p. 716). It is conceded that under the authority of Knudson v. Kearney, 171 Cal. 250, 152 Pac. 541, this portion of the judgment is without warrant and should be eliminated therefrom. This authority, however, in no manner affects the private easement adjudged to exist in favor of cross-complainant. This right was claimed to have accrued to him long subsequent to the date of the grant.

Other points do not require consideration.

For the reasons given, the judgment in favor of Ackerman, modified in the particular indicated, is affirmed; said respondent to recover his costs upon this appeal.

ALLOGGI v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al. (Civ. 2314.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. April 26, 1918. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court June 24, 1918.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⟹204(2)—RESERVATION OF EXCEPTIONS—OBJECTION BELOW.

In an action for the death of a passenger in an automobile struck by defendant's train at a crossing, an assignment of error that the absence of gates or barriers at the crossing was not evidence of negligence because defendant, not being the owner of the track in question, was not obliged to maintain barriers at the crossing, will not be considered in the absence of objection below to such evidence.

2. RAILROADS ⟹348(4) — CROSSING ACCIDENTS—EVIDENCE.

In an action for the death of a passenger in an automobile struck at night by defendant's train at a crossing over a spur track, evidence held to sustain a finding that defendants were negligent in shunting cars without lights and attendants and without warning.

3. RAILROADS ⟹350(26) — CROSSING ACCIDENTS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for death of a passenger in an automobile struck by defendant's train of flat cars at night while crossing a spur track, plaintiff, as the driver of the automobile, was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in attempting to cross without stopping at a point where he would have a clear view of approaching danger, where it did not appear that plaintiff by looking and listening could have seen the cars.

4. RAILROADS ⟹327(8) — CROSSING ACCIDENTS—STOP, LOOK, AND LISTEN.

The driver of an automobile crossing a railroad track is not required to stop, look, and listen at the most advantageous place; all that is required being the exercise of ordinary care.

5. TRIAL ⟹252(22)—FAILURE TO CALL WITNESSES—INSTRUCTIONS.

In action for death of automobile passenger struck by defendant's cars at crossing, an instruction that defendant's failure to call and examine as witnesses employés whose fault caused or contributed to the accident created a presumption that their testimony would be unfavorable to defendant was properly given, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 7, as to instructions on failure to offer evidence, where the two switchmen who were in charge of the train at the time of the accident were present in court during the trial, but were not called.

6. TRIAL ⟹296(4, 5) — INSTRUCTIONS — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for the death of a passenger in an automobile struck by defendant's train at a railroad crossing, an instruction that one is not chargeable with contributory negligence in failing to anticipate the negligence of another, since every one has a right to presume that others will act in a lawful and proper manner, although erroneous, was harmless in view of other instructions given as to contributory negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by Achille Alloggi, administrator of the estate of Leonie Alloggi, deceased, against the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from order denying new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Louis Oneal, of San Jose, Chas. J. Heggerty, of San Francisco, and James P. Sex, of San Jose, for appellants. Bert Schlesinger, of San Francisco, and Fry & Jenkins, of San Jose, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. At about 10 o'clock in the evening of September 19, 1913, the plaintiff, Achille Alloggi, and his wife, Leonie Alloggi, while riding in their automobile along San Salvador street, in the county of Santa Clara, attempted to cross a spur track leading from the right of way of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company into the yards of the Peninsular Railway Company, and in so doing the automobile, which the plaintiff was driving, came into collision with one of a train of several flat cars that was being switched by the defendant, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, across San Salvador street and into the yards of the Peninsular Railway Company. The collision resulted in the death of the wife of the plaintiff. Plaintiff thereafter sued and recovered a judgment for the sum of $10,000 against defendants. From this judgment and from the order denying a new trial, the defendants appeal.

[1] It is contended that the evidence adduced upon the whole case does not suffice to support the finding of the jury, implied from the verdict, that the defendant the Southern Pacific Railroad Company was guilty of negligence which proximately caused the collision. The first point urged in this behalf is that the absence of gates or barriers at the crossing where the collision occurred was not evidence of negligence, because the defendant company was not the owner of the spur track upon which its cars were being switched, and consequently there was no duty imposed upon the defendant company to maintain barriers at this particular crossing. If this point as made was intended to be an assignment of error, the answer to it is that no objection was interposed at the trial to this particular evidence, and moreover the fact that there were no barriers or gates at the crossing where the collision occurred was eliminated from the case and taken from the consideration of the jury by the trial court's instruction (given at the request of the corporation defendant) that, if the jury found from the evidence that the spur track did not belong to the Southern Pacific Company, but was the property of the Peninsular Railway Company, then the Southern Pacific Company could not be held responsible for the failure to maintain gates, barriers, or flagmen at said crossing. The undisputed evidence showed that the Peninsular Railway Company owned the spur track, and presumably the jury followed the instruction of the court and disregarded the fact of the absence of gates, barriers, etc., at the crossing in question.

It is contended that there was no evidence showing, or tending to show, the absence of bells, signals, or other warning of the approach of the train at the time of and at the point where the collision occurred, and that, even if such evidence existed, the absence of such signals could in no wise have contributed to the accident because of the fact that plaintiff knew of the existence, character, and condition of the crossing. The evidence showed that the spur track was being used by the defendant corporation in switching its cars; that the crossing in question, which was used by the general public, was very dangerous on account of a sharp curve which obstructed the view, and also because of lumber piles on the west side of the track, which, according to the testimony of one witness, were 12 feet high along the roadway and extended along the track 200 feet or more. Shortly prior to the collision three flat cars were standing near the crossing. No engine was then attached to these cars. The character of the crossing and the use made of it at the time of the accident are best shown by the testimony of the defendant Foster, the engineer of the defendant company, who, as a witness for the plaintiff, testified:

> "I had been employed in the capacity of engineer since July 27, 1913. On that night I was doing general switching, and was so engaged about 9:30 or 10 o'clock that evening. * * * I was switching on this spur track. Immediately prior to that we were coming in to pick up three cars on the spur track. I couldn't say how close we come to these flat cars here; I couldn't see them. My engine was along in here (indicating point B on the map on the sharp curve). There was four flat cars connected with my engine. As I attempted to make the switch I was looking across to get my signal; I got an 'easy sign' from Foreman Volkers. I was working on signals. I knew I was going in there and get some cars. I knew there were some cars on that spur track with which I was supposed to connect, and in making that switch it was the intention to connect with, and couple up, these cars. Foreman Volkers gave me the signal to take the switch. He is the engine foreman. * * * After receiving his signal I came in. I got an 'easy come ahead sign'; then Foreman Volkers was standing away out and gave me an 'easy come ahead sign' with his lantern. I was just creeping along, and I felt I was striking something. Then the foreman gave me a stop sign, and I stopped. I waited for a few minutes, and then he gave me another 'come ahead sign,' and I put my hand on the throttle and put the steam in the cylinder, and just before we started to move again he gave me an 'emergency stop sign,' to stop before the engine had got started. He came back to me and said: 'We hit an automobile down at the crossing, and we killed a woman, and the wheel of the car is right on the woman's body.' * * * Just before the accident I was coming forward around a sharp curve. I did not see Mr. Bunkers at that time. He was supposed to be working at the end of the train. I didn't see him at that time. * * * I couldn't see Mr. Bunkers, because I was working on the curve at the throttle of my engine. The curve was too sharp to enable me to see him. I had headlights on the engine, both ends, and I was connected with the rear end of those four flat cars. * * * I was new on that job at that time, and I hadn't noticed the pile of lumber along this track before the accident. After the accident I noticed the lumber pile. The lumber was piled up some considerable distance along the track. I could not and did not see Mr. Bunkers at the time of the accident, and do not know just where he was. I do not know whether the brakes were set on those flat cars."

The fact that the brakes were not set on the flat cars at the time of the accident is fairly deducible from this and other evidence, and it elsewhere in the evidence affirmatively appears that there was no flagman at the crossing, and that there were no brakemen on any of the three flat cars which were being shunted across the track. On the other hand, the evidence is conflicting as to whether a bell was rung, how far the lumber piles extended down between the road and spur track, whether the cars were standing still or moving, whether or not they had lights on them, and whether or not the moon was sufficiently bright to have shown the position of the cars and revealed the fact of whether they were standing still or moving at, and prior to, the time of the collision.

[2] The evidence was therefore susceptible of the construction, as the jury evidently found, that the defendants were guilty of negligence in shunting cars over a crossing used by the public, at night, without lights or attendants upon them, and without warning. The familiarity of the plaintiff with the crossing and his knowledge of its dangerous character was a factor to be considered in connection with the question of his contributory negligence, but in and of itself it is of no consequence in the determination of the question of the defendant company's negligence in the first instance.

The plaintiff testified that his wife called his attention to the fact that he was approaching the track; that in response he "kicked off the brake" of his automobile, at which time he was about 75 or 100 feet from the track; that he continued toward the track slowly for a distance of about 20 feet, when he stopped his machine; that he looked up and down the track, but could see nothing, "the light being so uncertain"; that his wife said, "There is nothing doing here; go ahead."

[3] He further testified that, if he had driven up closer, he could have looked further down the track, and because of this fact it is insisted that this case falls within, and must be governed by, the rule that, if the admitted physical facts establish that there was a point where, by looking and listening, plaintiff must have seen the descent of the cars upon him, he was, as a matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross the tracks of the defendant company without first stopping at a point where he would have had a clear view of approaching danger. This contention is answered, we think, by a reference to the state of the evidence upon this phase of the case as to just what was the situation with reference to the physical facts. If the flat cars were disconnected, with no lights upon them, and the moonlight was not sufficiently bright to reveal them, then it cannot be said that, by looking and listening, plaintiff must have seen them. And if, as there is some evidence to show, the cars were standing still and disconnected, assuming that there was sufficient light to have seen them, it does not follow that the plaintiff should be required to conjecture or surmise that the cars might suddenly be shunted backward without notice. Robinson v. Western Pacific R. R. Co., 48 Cal. 409; White v. S. P. Co., 122 Cal. 305, 54 Pac. 956; Chicago Co. v. Sharp, 63 Fed. 532, 11 C. C. A. 337; Ft. Smith, etc., Co. v. Pence, 182 S. W. 568.[1]

[4] The court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury that it was the duty of the plaintiff to stop, look, and listen at the most advantageous place. He was not required to look at the most advantageous place; for this would be putting upon him the burden of not only knowing the most advantageous point, but also of exercising the highest degree of care, while all that was required of him was ordinary care.

[5] Objection is taken to the court's instruction to the jury to the effect that, if the defendant company failed to call and examine as witnesses the employés whose fault caused or contributed to the accident, such failure created a presumption that the testimony of such witnesses would be unfavorable to the corporation defendant. The evidence showed, without dispute, that two of the employés of defendant, Bunkers and Volkers, were charged with the duty of switching; that they were the brakemen in charge of the train; that Volkers was the engine foreman who gave the signal to the engineer to take the switch; that Bunkers' place of duty was at the end of the train, but, as previously noted, Foster, the engineer, testified that, although Bunkers was supposed to be at the end of the train when the signal was given, he (Foster) did not know that such was the fact. The character of the train, the condition of the tracks, and the lights, and the location and doings of the various trainmen were peculiarly within the knowledge of Volkers and Bunkers, and, although not called as witnesses, it was stipulated that they were present in court during the trial of the case. The plaintiff established a prima facie case. The defendant offered very little testimony, practically submitting its case on the showing made by plaintiff. This case, therefore, falls within the well-settled rule that:

> "When the evidence tends to prove a material fact which imposes a liability on a party, and he has it in his power to produce evidence which from its very nature must overthrow the case made against him if it is not founded on fact, and he refuses to produce such evidence, the presumption arises that the evidence, if produced, would operate to his prejudice, and support the case of his adversary." Bone v. Hayes, 154 Cal. 765, 99 Pac. 175; Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 7.

[6] The court gave, at plaintiff's request, an instruction (No. 17) which, among other things, declared that "one is not chargeable with contributory negligence in failing to anticipate the negligence of another, and in not providing against it. Every one has a right to presume that others will act in a lawful and proper manner; consequently the law will not hold it imprudent in a plaintiff to act upon a presumption that the defendant has done or will do his duty." This instruction in the particular quoted, and in so far as it might have been applied to the facts of the case, was error, for:

> "It is not the law of this state that a person approaching a railroad crossing is authorized to assume that the persons operating a train will not in any way be negligent in that operation. * * * Such a rule would abrogate the doctrine of contributory negligence in all such cases." Hutson v. So. Cal. Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 703, 89 Pac. 1094; Herbert v. S. P. Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651; Griffin v. S. P., etc., Co., 170 Cal. 776, 151 Pac. 282, L. R. A. 1916A, 842.

We are satisfied, however, from a consideration of the instructions as a whole, that this general instruction did not operate to mislead the jury; for the correct rule relative to contributory negligence was, in several other instructions, stated and restated, and thereby the effect of the erroneous instruction was palliated, if not entirely negatived. Thus instruction No. 28, given at the request of the defendant, was one of several directed to the point that:

> "One who is approaching a railroad track cannot rely upon the fact that a whistle would be blown or that a bell would be rung, or that lights would be displayed, but he must so approach the track that, even though the whistle were not blown or the bell not rung or that no signals were given, he could stop his vehicle in time to avoid danger."

We are not unmindful of the rule that conflicting and contradictory instructions upon a material phase of the case require a reversal where it cannot be ascertained from the record before us which instruction prevailed or was likely to prevail with the jury. While it is true that the instruction complained of in the present case is erroneous, and in a measure in conflict with several other instructions which correctly stated the rule of law relative to contributory negligence, nevertheless the correct rule of law was so specifically stated and restated to the jury that we feel that the idea in the several correct instructions must have preponderated in the considerations of the jury, and that as a consequence the erroneous instruction neither contributed to nor controlled the verdict.

(37 Cal. App. 423)

THIEL DETECTIVE CO. v. TUOLUMNE COUNTY. (Civ. 1812.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 3, 1918.)

1. DISTRICT AND PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS 🔑 7(2) — AUTHORITY TO HIRE DETECTIVES — STATUTE.

The district attorney of a county, under Pol. Code, § 4307, subd. 2, has authority to incur an expense for detective hire to secure evidence concerning violations of the criminal laws.

2. COUNTIES 🔑197—BOARD OF SUPERVISORS—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS—STATUTE—"COUNTY CHARGE."

Compensation of detectives engaged by the district attorney, being a county charge under Pol. Code, § 4307, subd. 2, the claim must be presented to the board of supervisors, whose duty it is, under section 4041, subd. 12, to examine, settle, and allow all accounts legally chargeable against the county.

3. COUNTIES 🔑206(3)—REJECTION OF CLAIMS—ACTION—STATUTE.

A claim against a county for the compensation of detectives engaged by the district attorney stands on the same footing as other charges that must be presented to the board of supervisors, and, if rejected, the claimant may bring his action in court, as provided by Pol. Code, § 4078.

4. COUNTIES 🔑204(1) — BOARD OF SUPERVISORS—DUTY AS TO CLAIM.

It was duty of board of supervisors of county, when detective company claimed compensation for services under engagement by district attorney, to determine whether services were performed by company, were authorized by district attorney, were necessarily incurred in pursuance of his duty as prosecutor, and whether demand was reasonable in amount.

5. COUNTIES 🔑206(1) — CONTRACT CLAIMS AGAINST—STATUS AS VESTED RIGHTS.

Contract rights with a county, as well as vested rights of property, are placed by Constitution and statutes under protection of courts where questions of law and fact may be finally determined after rejection of claim by board of supervisors.

6. INJUNCTION 🔑76—ISSUANCE OF WARRANT BY COUNTY AUDITOR.

Equity will not restrain a county auditor, a mere ministerial officer, from issuing his warrant upon a claim against the county adjudged by the proper tribunal; the claim being valid on its face, and within scope of statutory authority of board of supervisors.

7. EVIDENCE 🔑83(4)—BOARD OF SUPERVISORS—ACTION AS TO CLAIM—PRESUMPTION.

The board of supervisors of a county, being clothed with quasi judicial functions to pass upon claims against the county, is the appropriate tribunal to pass upon a claim in the first instance, and the court, in suit to enjoin the board from allowing an illegal claim, must presume the board will do its duty and reject the claim.

8. DISTRICT AND PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS 🔑 7(2)—EXPENSE IN DETECTING CRIME—OBLIGATION TO CONSULT COURT.

There is no law requiring the district attorney of a county to consult any court or obtain any order as a prerequisite to incur any expense which he may deem proper in detecting or prosecuting for crime.

9. COUNTIES 🔑206(3) — CLAIM AGAINST — ALLOWANCE BY SUPERVISORS—ATTACK.

Where a claim against the county has been allowed in full by the board of supervisors, if within the jurisdiction of the tribunal, it can be attacked only by a suit in equity on the ground of fraud.

10. COUNTIES 🔑206(1) — CLAIM AGAINST — IMPROPER ALLOWANCE BY SUPERVISORS.

If it is apparent that a county board of supervisors has exceeded its jurisdiction in allowing a claim, its order may be nullified, through an action brought in court, or treated as nugatory by any officer called upon to give effect to the invalid determination.

11. COUNTIES 🔑206(3) — CLAIMS AGAINST — REJECTION BY SUPERVISORS — ACTION AT LAW.

If a claim against a county, within the power of the board of supervisors to allow, has been rejected or allowed only in part, the board's decision is not final, but, by virtue of Pol. Code, § 4078, the claimant may bring action at law, and thus establish his claim.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by the Thiel Detective Company, a corporation, against the County of Tuolumne. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. M. Delameter (Frank W. Street and Horace M. Street, both of Oakland, of counsel), for appellant. Henry G. W. Dinkelspiel and Frank W. Hooper, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from the judgment in favor of respondent for detective services performed for the county by virtue of an agreement with the district attorney. The claim was properly presented to the board of supervisors, and by said board it was rejected. Thereafter, within the statutory period, an action was brought in the superior court, and by said court it was found that plaintiff was employed by the district attorney of the county "to make certain investigations and secure evidence concerning the alleged violations of certain of the criminal laws of the state"; that certain services were performed in pursuance of this employment at an agreed compensation; that in the performance of said services, plaintiff incurred certain expenses incidental to said investigation; that the charges for the same, together with said expense, were reasonable; that they were necessarily incurred in the course of said employment; were a proper charge against the county; and that a claim therefor, properly verified, was filed with the clerk of the board of supervisors, and thereafter rejected by said board.

[1] There is no question of the authority of the district attorney to incur an expense of this character. Subdivision 2 of section 4307 of the Political Code provides that:

"The traveling and personal expenses of the district attorney, incurred in criminal cases arising in the county * * * and all other expenses necessarily incurred by him in the detection of crime and prosecution of criminal cases" are county charges.

That this includes the services of detectives in proper cases is not disputed. He may employ them at the expense of the county when necessary for the detection of persons guilty of crimes or to obtain evidence of their guilt. Rocca v. Boyle, 166 Cal. 94, 135 Pac. 34, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 857.

[2] The compensation therefor being a county charge, the claim must be presented to the board of supervisors, as it is the duty of this tribunal "to examine, settle and allow all accounts legally chargeable against the county," etc. Subdivision 12, § 4041; Political Code; Rocca v. Boyle, supra.

[3] Such claim stands upon the same footing as other charges that must be presented to the board of supervisors; and, if it be rejected, the claimant may bring his action in court as provided by section 4078 of said Code. In that respect the statute makes no distinction between different claims, and the courts are not justified in making any. It is true, as said in Fulkerth v. County of Stanislaus, 67 Cal. 336, 7 Pac. 754, that said provision is general and "applies to all accounts presented against the county." In the Fulkerth Case, the sheriff of the county brought suit to recover compensation for meals furnished to prisoners in the county jail, and it was held that it was for the board of supervisors to determine in the first instance what was a reasonable compensation, but that the determination by said board was no more final than would have been a similar finding in an account for any other proper county charge.

[4, 5] So, herein, it was the province and duty of the board of supervisors to determine whether the services were performed by claimant, whether they were authorized by the district attorney, whether they were necessarily incurred in pursuance of his duty as public prosecutor, and whether the demand was reasonable in amount. But when the claim was rejected, the foregoing considerations all became the subject of cognizance and determination in an action brought in the superior court. To hold otherwise would be to nullify the plain provision of the statute and to oppose the decisions of the Supreme Court. Of course, if the decision of the board is final, that is an end of the matter, and the remedy by an action at law is not available. But the truth is that such contract rights, as well as "vested rights of property," are placed by the Constitution and statutes "under the protection of the courts," where the questions of law and fact may be finally determined. Glide v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 30, 81 Pac. 225.

Appellant, in its contention that the determination of the board of supervisors is final and conclusive, has been misled by certain expressions used by the appellate courts in cases wherein claims had been allowed in full by the board of supervisors. In such instance, the situation is quite different from this, as must be apparent.

To illustrate the distinction, we may refer to some of the leading decisions in this state, wherein it was sought to review the action of the board of supervisors in allowing the claim.

[6] In Colusa County v. De Jarnett, 55 Cal. 373, the action was brought to restrain the defendant as county auditor from issuing a warrant in favor of one Dyas upon a claim in his favor, which had been allowed against the county for legal services rendered by him for said county. The Supreme Court held that there was nothing in the complaint to authorize the interposition of a court of equity. Hence it was plain that the court would not be justified in restraining the auditor, who is a mere ministerial officer, from issuing his warrant upon a claim which had been adjudged by the proper tribunal, the claim being valid upon its face and within the scope of the statutory authority of the board of supervisors.

McFarland v. McCowen, 98 Cal. 329, 33 Pac. 113, is a similar case. The claims therein were for constable fees, and were allowed by the board of supervisors. The auditor refused to draw his warrant for their payment, and the Supreme Court declared that:

> "It is the privilege and duty of the auditor to refuse to draw his warrants upon the treasurer for claims, which, although sanctioned and ordered paid by the board of supervisors, are void upon their face for want of jurisdiction in the board of supervisors, or showing an excess of jurisdiction, or other plain and palpable violation of law."

In the absence of any such showing, it was held that the decision of the board was conclusive, since "there should be an end of litigation in every case, and when a case has once been heard upon its merits and fully determined, it should be held conclusive until reversed, modified, or set aside in the mode prescribed by law."

[7] In the case of McBride v. Newlin, 129 Cal. 36, 61 Pac. 577, the action was brought by a taxpayer to enjoin the board of supervisors from allowing an illegal claim against the county for printing, and also to enjoin the auditor and treasurer from acting officially upon such claim. The following statement made therein is manifestly true:

> "The board of supervisors, being the body clothed with quasi judicial functions, is the appropriate tribunal to pass upon the claim which it is alleged will be allowed. We must presume that the board will do its duty, and if the claim is illegal that it will be rejected."

In County of Santa Cruz v. McPherson, 133 Cal. 282, 65 Pac. 574, the action was to recover money from the defendants to whom it was paid by reason of the allowance by the board of supervisors of the claim of the former against the county for printing. It was held that the action of the board was a conclusive adjudication of the claim, since it was of a subject-matter within its jurisdiction. The action was sought to be justified by virtue of section 8 of the County Government Act (Stats. 1893, p. 347), authorizing and directing the district attorney to institute suit for the recovery of money paid out "without authority of law."

Such claims being, however, within the range of legal county charges, the validity of the alleged indebtedness could not be retried in said suit, and the determination of the board of supervisors manifestly constituted the "authority of law."

County of Alameda v. Evers, 136 Cal. 132, 68 Pac. 475, was a somewhat similar case, and it was held that the action involved a collateral attack upon the order of the board of supervisors, and that:

> "From the decision of the board of supervisors on questions of fact, in regard to matters of which it had jurisdiction, there is no appeal. If the board exceeds its jurisdiction, or allows claims which are illegal upon their face, or in direct violation of law, there is a remedy."

County of Yolo v. Joyce, 156 Cal. 429, 105 Pac. 125, was in principle the same as the last two foregoing citations, and it was held that the action of the board in allowing the claim could not be reviewed in that proceeding.

[8] The contention of appellant herein that the district attorney should consult the board of supervisors before incurring such expense was virtually answered in said decision as follows:

> "There is no provision of the law which requires the district attorney to consult any court or obtain any order therefrom as a prerequisite for his incurring any expense which he may deem proper in the discharge of his duties in detecting crime or prosecuting criminal cases."

It may be said also that there is no provision requiring him to consult the board of supervisors, but the matter is left to his discretion in the first instance. It is true that in the Joyce Case it was declared that his discretion is ultimately to be reviewed by the board of supervisors alone, and when that body determines that the discretion has been properly exercised, that the expense was necessarily incurred by him and the charges fair and reasonable, "that is the end of the matter." But, for the reason already pointed out, the converse does not follow, that where the board rejects the claim "that is the end of the matter."

The case of Victors v. Kelsey, 31 Cal. App. 796, 161 Pac. 1006, involved the question of the authority of the district attorney to incur an expense in securing the testimony of an expert in a criminal case. The board of supervisors allowed the claim, but the treasurer refused to pay it, and it was justly held by this court on appeal, affirming the decision of the superior court of Plumas county, that the board of supervisors acted within its authority in determining that the expense was a just charge against the county, and that the treasurer had no discretion in the matter, but that it was his plain duty to honor the warrant.

[9-11] We think the matter can be summed up in these words: Where a claim has been allowed in full by the board of supervisors, if it be within the jurisdiction of such tribunal, it can only be attacked by a suit in equity on the ground of fraud. If it be apparent that the board has exceeded its jurisdiction in the allowance of the claim, the order may be nullified through an action brought in court, or such order may be disregarded and treated as nugatory by any officer who is called upon to give effect to the invalid determination of the board. If, however, a claim within the power of the board to allow has been rejected, or allowed only in part, the decision of the board is not final, but by virtue of the statute the claimant may bring his action at law and establish his claim against the county as fully and effectively as it could be by a favorable order of the board in the first instance.

We think the appeal, it being upon the judgment roll alone, is without merit, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.
